WATKINS et al. v. KEELE.

L. A. 17331.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 23, 1941.

Courts ⇐92

To extent that there might be any apparent conflict between language used by way of dictum in prior opinion concerning question presented in subsequent opinion, and language used in the subsequent opinion, the views expressed in the subsequent opinion would prevail.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles C. Burnell, Judge.

On petition for rehearing.

Petition denied.

For original opinion of Supreme Court, see 108 P.2d 417. For prior opinion of the District Court of Appeal, see 104 P.2d 389.

Simpson & Simpson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Faries & McDowell, of Los Angeles, amici curiae for appellant.

Stimson & Edwards, Noel Edwards, and Louis Thomsen, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Salisbury, Robinson & Himrod, Freston & Files, Bailie, Turner & Lake, Frank P. Doherty, Gerald E. Kerrin, Frank J. Barry, Girard F. Baker, MacFarlane, Schaefer, Haun & Mulford, John E. McCall, Howard C. Velpmen, Schell & Delamer, all of Los Angeles, DeLancey C. Smith, of San Francisco, and George J. Ford, of Los Angeles (Charles A. Loring and Gordon L. Files, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), amici curiae for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

In the petition for rehearing it is claimed that the decision "overrules without mentioning an identical case involving a mutual will, the Estate of Learned, 156 Cal. 309, 104 P. 315". The Learned case was not called to our attention prior to this petition for a rehearing. A reading of the opinion in Estate of Learned shows that that case did not involve the question presented in the present case and that any language used in that case which may appear to be in conflict with the language used in the opinion herein was not necessary to that decision. The Learned case was correctly decided on the facts before the court and is not overruled by the present case. To the extent that there may be any apparent conflict between the language used in opinion herein and the language used by way of dictum in the Learned case, the views expressed in our opinion in this matter must prevail.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

MORRIS v. RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 108 et al.

Sac. 5345.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 17, 1941.

1. Drains ⇐82(5)
Levees and flood control ⇐25

A reclamation district bondholder, being a "person interested" within statute conferring on person interested right to object to any assessment or reapportionment of such assessment, had right to maintain action to secure annulment of reapportionment. Pol. Code, § 3462.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Person Interested".

2. Drains ⇐79, 88
Levees and flood control ⇐25, 27

The statute relating to subdivision and reapportionment of assessment against tract of land in reclamation district, as such statute read in 1925, permitted reclamation district to subdivide lands purchased by district for delinquent assessments, and to reapportion assessment thereon preparatory to selling the tract in smaller units, as against contention that statute only recognized right of landowner to subdivide and secure a reapportionment, and only permitted a reapportionment when owner had sold or transferred a portion of his tract to a third person and a bona fide partition had taken place. Pol. Code, § 3460, as amended by St.1917, p. 1204.

3. Drains ⇐79
Levees and flood control ⇐25

The statute relating to subdivision and reapportionment of assessment against tract of land in reclamation district must be given a reasonable interpretation. Pol.Code, § 3460.

4. Drains ⇐79, 88
Levees and flood control ⇐25, 28

A county treasurer purchasing tract of land in reclamation district for delinquent assessment becomes owner as "trustee" for holders of reclamation district bonds and for reclamation district, and county treasurer as such trustee has obligation to manage tract and to sell tract for benefit of bondholders and for benefit of district, and if tract is so large that it cannot be readily or at all sold as a single unit, treasurer can subdivide and reapportion assessment and sell tract in smaller parcels. Pol.Code, §§ 3460, 3466a.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Trustee".

5. Drains ⇐67
Levees and flood control ⇐2

The statute providing that any parcel of land in reclamation district purchased by county treasurer for delinquent assessment may be sold by treasurer to any person paying treasurer the amount for which such parcel was bid in at the delinquent sale, while contemplating that parcel purchased shall be the same parcel sold, can be reconciled with statute relating to subdivision of tract of land in reclamation district and reapportionment of assessment against such tract, in view of provision in the latter statute to the effect that the reapportionment shall have the same effect as an original assessment, so that upon reapportionment the smaller parcel of land becomes the "parcel" referred to in the first statute. Pol.Code, §§ 3460, 3480.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Parcel".

6. Drains ⇐18
Levees and flood control ⇐34

The statute, as it read in 1925, permitting reclamation district to subdivide lands purchased by district for delinquent assessments and to reapportion assessment thereon preparatory to selling the tract in smaller units became part of contract of holders of bonds of reclamation district. Pol.Code, § 3460, as amended by St.1917, p. 1204.

7. Drains ⇐67

The 1931 amendment to statute relating to subdivision of tract of land in reclamation district and reapportionment of assessment against such tract did not confer on the county treasurer, as trustee for district, the power to subdivide land purchased by treasurer for delinquent assessments and to secure a reapportionment thereon preparatory to selling the tract in smaller units, but merely clarified such power, which existed under the statute prior to the amendment. Pol. Code, § 3460.

The 1931 amendment to statute relating to subdivision of tract of land in reclamation district and reapportionment of assessment against such tract did not "impair obligation of contract" of holder of bonds of district, even if amendment conferred on county treasurer as trustee for district the theretofore unpossessed power to subdivide land purchased by treasurer for delinquent assessments and to secure a reapportionment preparatory to selling the tract in smaller units, since land was security for bondholders, and security was the same whether land was sold in one large tract or several smaller tracts, in view of statutory requirement that smaller tracts could only be sold for fair market value. PETERS, Justice pro tem.

The defendants appeal from a judgment of the trial court annulling the approval of the Board of Supervisors of Colusa County of a reapportionment by the trustees of Reclamation District No. 108 of a delinquent assessment on a particularly described parcel of land within such district. The main question presented on this appeal can be stated as follows: After a tract of reclamation district land has passed by purchase at a delinquent assessment sale into the ownership of the county treasurer, as trustee for the district, may the tract be subdivided and the assessment on such tract reapportioned, so that the tract may be sold in parcels instead of a unit, against the protest of a bondholder?

Reclamation District No. 108 is located in Yolo and Colusa Counties and embraces about 57,000 acres of land. In 1923 an assessment, known as Assessment No. 5, was properly levied upon the lands within the district. In 1925, pursuant to proceedings had under section 3480 of the Political Code, bonds were issued upon the unpaid portion of this assessment totaling over $3,000,000. Plaintiff and respondent herein, Mary E. Morris, is the owner of about $100,000 of these bonds. All semi-annual calls upon Assessment No. 5 were made within their due dates without substantial delinquencies until about 1929 or 1930. At that time many of the landowners within the district were unable to pay such calls, together with other taxes. As a result, over 23,000 acres of the lands within the district became delinquent, and, as a result, this acreage was purchased at delinquent assessment sales by the county treasurer as trustee of the district. (For a full statement of the financial condition of the district see Morris v. Gibson, 30 Cal.App.2d 684, 87 P.2d 37.) Among the 23,000 acres plus so purchased was Parcel No. 109, containing 3,120 acres, which had been assessed for $197,538.63. This is the parcel involved on this and on a prior appeal. Morris v. Poundstone, 9 Cal. 2d 485, 71 P.2d 262.

The trustees of the district who, under section 3466a of the Political Code, are entrusted with the duty to manage, liquidate and sell the lands bought in at delinquent sale, came to the conclusion that it would be to the best interests of all concerned if the large parcels so bought in were cut up into smaller parcels. The theory of this was that it was very difficult, if not impossible, to secure purchasers for large tracts, but that purchasers for smaller parcels could be secured.

The first attempt of this district to carry this policy into effect resulted in the litigation involved in Morris v. Poundstone, supra. Pursuant to the above-mentioned plan, the trustees, purporting to act under section 3466a of the Political Code, in 1935, offered for public sale, in three separate parcels, 280 acres of the 3,120 acres of Parcel No. 109, after first purchasing the title of the state to these parcels. The tax title of both the state and district were offered for sale at that public auction. Prior to the sale the trustees of the district purported to fix the full market value of the three parcels included within the 280 acres at $10,399.42. At the sale these three parcels were purchased as a unit by Marion Poundstone et al., to whom the county treasurer issued two deeds, one purporting to convey the state title, and the other purporting to convey the district title.

After this sale the purchasers purporting to act under section 3460 of the Political Code, petitioned the trustees of the district to have the balance of the uncalled portion of Assessment No. 5 reapportioned. Mary E. Morris, a bondholder, objected to the reapportionment proceeding. The trial court annulled the reapportionment, and this decision was affirmed by this court. Morris v. Poundstone, supra.

After this decision had become final, the trustees of the district then adopted the procedure leading to the present litigation. Instead of first subdividing, selling, and then reapportioning the assessment, they decided that they would first subdivide, then reapportion, and then sell. Parcel No. 109 was divided into ten parcels of a size which the trustees and the treasurer of the county believed could be readily sold. The board conferred with the state controller, inasmuch as such lands had been sold to the state for delinquent county and state taxes. A subdivision map was filed. The county treasurer then filed a petition with the board of trustees asking them to reapportion the assessment on the subdivided parcel. The trustees thereupon reapportioned the original assessment, with penalty and interest, but not including subsequent calls with interest and penalty. In making the reapportionment the board applied and used the same factors, the same calculations and information that were used in levying the original assessment against Parcel No. 109. Thereafter the board of supervisors, over the objections of respondent, approved the reapportionment. Respondent thereupon filed the present action to secure an annulment of the reapportionment. The trial court entered its judgment granting the relief prayed for. It is from this judgment that this appeal is prosecuted.

tain this action. In Morris v. Poundstone, supra, 9 Cal.2d at page 492, 71 P.2d 262, it was held that a bondholder is a "person interested" within the meaning of section 3462 of the Political Code, which confers on a person interested the right to object to any assessment or reapportionment of such assessment.

The Political Code provides in detail for the issuing of bonds by a reclamation district, and for the powers of the trustees after purchase by the district of delinquent lands. The pertinent sections are fully discussed in River Farms Co. v. Gibson, 4 Cal. App.2d 731, 42 P.2d 95, and Morris v. Poundstone, supra. So far as pertinent here, section 3480, as it read in 1925, the year the bonds involved herein were issued, and substantially as it still reads except for one amendment hereafter referred to, provided that after the formation of a reclamation district and the levy of an assessment which is wholly or in part unpaid, the district may, and on petition of the owners of one-half of the district lands must, order a special election to submit to the landowners the question of the issuance of bonds in an amount equal to the unpaid assessments. The procedure there outlined was followed in the present case. After bonds are issued, it is provided that the county treasurer shall collect the assessments and place the money in a fund for the repayment of the bonds. It is further provided that the lien of any unpaid assessment continues until all of the original bonds and any refunding bond issues have been paid in full. If any assessment installment becomes delinquent, the county treasurer, after due proceedings, offers the land covered by the assessment for sale to the highest bidder, provided his bid at least equals the aggregate sum due on the delinquent installment, with interest and penalty. If no sufficient bid is made, the treasurer is required to bid in and sell the parcel to himself as purchaser, as trustee for the district. Any person interested in the property may redeem it within one year after the date of sale by paying to the treasurer a sum equal to price paid for its purchase, with interest to date of redemption. If no redemption is made the treasurer executes to himself as trustee of the district a deed to the property, free and clear of all encumbrances except state, county and municipal taxes, and any portion of any reclamation assessment remaining unpaid at the date of the sale.

As section 3480 read in 1925, after land had thus passed at the expiration of the period of redemption into the ownership of the county treasurer as trustee of the district, it could be sold by him only upon the purchaser paying the amount for which the treasurer had purchased it at the delinquent sale, with 7 per cent interest from date thereof, together with the amount of all subsequent delinquent installments, with accrued interest and penalties thereon. However, it was also provided that the treasurer, after the collection of the final installment, could sell at public auction to the highest bidder for cash.

The above-outlined plan apparently worked reasonably well until the beginning of the depression. Then, as a result of the recession of real estate values, it frequently happened that the price fixed in section 3480 for the purchase of these lands at the expiration of the period of redemption (full amount paid at delinquent sale, 7 per cent interest, plus amount of all subsequent delinquent installments with accrued interest and penalties) exceeded the fair market value of the property, so that the lands could not be sold.

In order to meet this situation, the Legislature, in 1931, amended section 3480 to further provide that after the lapse of one year from and after the expiration of the period of redemption, such parcel may be sold as provided in section 3466a of the Political Code. As part of the same reform section 3466a was added to that Code. Stats. of 1931, p. 773. It provided that after the lapse of one year from and after the period of redemption of any land sold to the district, or county treasurer as trustee of the district, pursuant to sections 3466, 3480 or 3480a of the Political Code, the county treasurer, when and as directed by the board of trustees of the district, may "sell any land remaining unsold, to the highest bidder for cash. * * * The trustees of the district shall have the right to reject any and all bids and no bid shall be accepted for an amount less than such price as shall be approved by them. No parcel shall be sold for an amount less than the fair market value thereof as such value shall be ascertained by the board of trustees. * * *" The constitutionality of section 3466a of the Political Code was upheld in River Farms Co. v. Gibson, supra.

In Morris v. Poundstone, supra, this court analyzed section 3480 of the Political Code as it read in 1925, and as amended in 1931, and section 3466a, as added to that Code in 1931, and held that those sections did not permit the sale by the treasurer of a part of a tract without first reapportioning the delinquent assessment. The court in that opinion, after holding that the procedure there adopted was improper, specifically refrained from passing on the question as to whether a tract purchased by the treasurer for a delinquent assessment may be first subdivided and the assessment then reapportioned. In that connection, at page 492 of 9 Cal.2d, at page 265 of 71 P.2d, it was stated: "It is true that section 3460 of the Political Code permits a reapportionment of the assessment under some circumstances. We do not need to decide now, the point not being involved, whether the board of trustees and the county treasurer, after a purchase of a tract for a delinquent assessment, but before a resale, such as is provided for by section 3466a, could subdivide the tract and secure a reapportionment. Here the reapportionment was not sought until after the sale. For the reasons already stated, such sale must be held to have been invalid, which necessarily determines that the reapportionment, predicated thereon, was likewise void and was properly annulled."

The specific question presented in this case is whether section 3460 of the Political Code, as it read when the bonds were issued, permitted the district to subdivide lands purchased by it for delinquent assessments, and to reapportion the assessment thereon preparatory to selling the tract in smaller units. If the law did not permit such a procedure, the next question presented is whether a 1931 amendment to that section permitted such reapportionment, and, if so, whether such 1931 amendment is constitutional.

A reading of section 3460 of the Political Code, as it read in 1925, when the bonds here involved were issued, indicates that it conferred on the district as owner of the tract, power to subdivide and reapportion the assessment. After providing that the commissioners appointed by the board of supervisors have power to amend and correct any errors in the assessment list, the section then provided (Stats.1917, p. 1204): "When any tract of land upon which an assessment or assessments shall have been made shall be subdivided into smaller parcels, the board of trustees of the district shall reapportion the assessment or assessments upon such tract in such manner as will charge each of said smaller parcels with a just proportion of assessment or assessments previously made upon said tract so subdivided. Said board of trustees shall file with the clerk of the board of supervisors of the county a list or lists of the charges assessed against each of said parcels. Said reapportionment shall be approved by the board of supervisors in the manner provided in section three thousand four hundred sixty-two of this code. Said lists after such approval shall be filed with the county treasurer of the county and shall have the same effect as an original assessment." (Italics added.)

[2, 3] Respondent urges that this section only recognized the right of a landowner to subdivide and secure a reapportionment, and did not recognize the right of the trustee of the district, after purchase for a delinquent assessment, to subdivide and reapportion. It is also urged by respondent that the section as it then read, and now reads, only permitted a reapportionment when the owner had sold or transferred a portion of his tract to a third person, and a bona fide partition took place. She urges that the law at no time has recognized the right of any owner to subdivide before he has sold or transferred a portion of the larger tract, or, as she puts it, the law has never permitted a "mere paper subdivision". These contentions seem to us to be unsound. We must give the section a reasonable interpretation. It would be a most peculiar arrangement if the owner of a tract was required to sell a portion thereof before he could secure the reapportionment of the assessment. That would effectively prevent him from ever selling. That was what the trustee, as an owner, attempted to do in the case of Morris v. Poundstone, supra. That is exactly the procedure that was held in that case to be invalid. In that connection the court stated (9 Cal.2d at page 491, 71 P.2d at page 265): "A prospective purchaser knows that he must take the land subject to a proportional part of the uncalled portion of the $197,000 assessment levied on the entire tract. Nothing is done by the board of trustees to ascertain the amount of such reapportionment prior to the sale. Until the reapportionment is had, it is impossible for a prospective purchaser to know what even the approximate amount of the reapportionment of the parcels offered for sale will be. How can a prospective purchaser intelligently bid at such a sale?"

[4] The section, it will be noted, does not limit the right of reapportionment to any particular person or to any particular lands. It states "When any tract of land" is subdivided the board of trustees shall reapportion the assessment. After lands are purchased by the county treasurer for a delinquent assessment the county treasurer becomes the owner as trustee for the bondholders and for the district. One of the obligations of the county treasurer as such trustee is to manage, and, if possible, to sell the lands for the benefit of the bondholders and for the benefit of the district. If the parcel so purchased is so large that it cannot be readily or at all sold as a single unit, section 3460 recognizes that the treasurer should subdivide and reapportion the assessment and sell the land in smaller parcels.

[5] It must be conceded that there is language in section 3480 of the Political Code that is hard to reconcile with this interpretation of section 3460. Section 3480, as pointed out in Morris v. Poundstone, supra, provides that any "parcel" purchased by the county treasurer for a delinquent assessment may be sold by him to any person paying him the amount "for which said parcel" was bid in at the delinquent sale. This contemplates that the parcel purchased shall be the same parcel sold. But this language can be reconciled with section 3460 in view of the provision in the latter section to the effect that the reapportionment "shall have the same effect as on original assessment". Upon the reapportionment the smaller parcel of land becomes the "parcel" referred to in section 3480.

[6] If this construction of section 3460, as it read in 1925, is correct, and we think it is, obviously it became part of the contract of the bondholders. Any other construction would lead to absurd results. Admittedly, a landowner before a sale of his land for a delinquent assessment could subdivide and secure a reapportionment of the assessment. The bondholders took their bonds subject to that condition. When the land is purchased by the county treasurer as trustee there is even greater need for such power. The duty of the trustee is to sell the lands, if possible. If the parcel is so large that it cannot be sold, it is imperative that it be cut up in smaller parcels that are more readily saleable. From a practical standpoint this is a benefit to the bondholders. Each smaller parcel must be sold for its full and fair market value. A greater price will normally be secured for a large tract if sold in small parcels than if sold as an entirety.

[7-9] Whatever doubt existed as to whether section 3460, as it read in 1925, permitted the county treasurer to subdivide and reapportion the assessment, that doubt was set at rest by a 1931 amendment to that section. Stats. of 1931, p. 757. By that amendment the following sentence was added to the section: "Assessments and delinquencies thereon on tracts of land which have become delinquent and which have been sold for delinquency pursuant to the provisions of section 3466 or section 3480 of this code, and which have been subdivided, shall be reapportioned in the same manner and with the same effect as if such tract had not been so sold". We do not think that this amendment added anything to the statute. We think this power existed under the original statute. But even if this section as then amended conferred upon the trustee a power he did not theretofore possess, we do not believe that such change in the law would impair the obligations of the bondholder's contract, as urged by respondent. As already pointed out in River Farms Co. v. Gibson, 4 Cal.App.2d 731, 42 P.2d 95, the Appellate Court upheld the constitutionality of section 3466a of the Political Code, added in 1931, which gives the county treasurer the right to sell the delinquent land at its fair market value, even though under section 3480 of that Code, as it read at the time the bonds were issued, the treasurer could only sell for the amount of the delinquencies. The case was relied upon in Morris v. Poundstone, supra, and cited with approval in Morris v. Gibson, 30 Cal.App.2d 684, 87 P.2d 37. The reasoning employed in that case is conclusive on this issue. When land is subdivided and a reapportionment had under section 3460, then under section 3466a each of the smaller parcels can only be sold for its fair market value. The security for the bondholders is the land. The security is the same security whether it is one large tract, or ten small tracts. There is no alteration in the security accomplished by this amendment.

From what has been said, it is clear that under section 3460 the treasurer, as trustee, has the lawful power to subdivide lands purchased by him for delinquent assessments, and to secure a reapportionment thereon.

[10-13] Respondent contends that even if such power existed, the reapportionment here was properly annulled because the procedure prescribed by law was not followed. It is first urged that the map that was filed in connection with the proceeding leading up to the reapportionment did not comply with the Subdivision Map Act, Stats. of 1937, p. 1863, in many respects. It is pointed out that the map that was filed was not signed by the county treasurer, as owner; that the state was a part owner of the tract; and that the state controller had no power to join in making the subdivision; that the certificate of the state controller dedicating certain roadways was not acknowledged. The complete answer to these contentions is that section 3460 of the Political Code does not require the filing of a map at all, and that the so-called Map Act, supra, does not apply to subdivisions of land by a reclamation district, or in fact to subdivisions by any public agency or public officer, where such subdivisions are authorized by law. The definition of subdivider in sub. (h) of section 2 of the Map Act does not include such persons or agencies. A reading of the other sections of the act demonstrates that it was never intended and could not be practically applied to such public agencies. Moreover, as sections 4 and 29 of the act demonstrate, its provisions are aimed at sales of a subdivided tract. In this proceeding no question as to validity of any sale is presented. This case involves simply the validity of the reapportionment on the divided tract. The making and recording of the type of map here involved is permitted under the decision of Colton L. & W. Co. v. Swartz, 99 Cal. 278, 33 P. 878.

[14] It is next urged that the reapportionment was void because certain roadways were not included within the reapportionment, and that the bondholders were therefore deprived unlawfully of this portion of their security. The record shows that two roads designated as "Poundstone Road" and "College City Road" were dedicated as public roads and excluded from the reapportionment. The evidence shows that these are not new roads but are old roads which were in existence at the time of the levy of the original assessment, and had been dedicated as county roads prior to the levy of the assessment. Under the law as it then existed such roads were not assessable. Section 3456c of the Political Code; Reclamation Dist., etc. v. East Bay, etc., Dist., 91 Cal.App. 143, 266 P. 969.

[15] It is also urged that the roadways are not properly described in the reapportionment list. The excepted roadways are permanent and their courses appear on the official maps of the county. The description was sufficient.

[16] The last major contention urged is that the reapportionment was void in that penalties and interest on assessment calls subsequent to April 1, 1930, were not reapportioned. We think that section 3460 requires that they be included. But this defect in the reapportionment proceedings did not warrant the trial court in declaring the entire reapportionment void. The amount of such subsequent installments, together with penalties and interest, is a matter of a mere mathematical calculation from information in the record. The trial court possesses full power to modify the list under such circumstances. Sections 3456, 3460 of the Political Code; Reclamation Dist. No. 673 v. Diepenbrock, 168 Cal. 577, 143 P. 763. Inasmuch as a reversal of the judgment is called for, this and any other such minor defects may be corrected on the retrial.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

O'BRIEN et al., Prison Directors, v. OLSON, Governor.

Civ. 6508.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 15, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 13, 1941.

1. Prisons ⇐7

In investigating charges of misconduct and neglect of duty by prison directors, the governor acted as an "officer exercising judicial functions" within terms of statute authorizing grant of writ of review where such officer exceeds jurisdiction, and governor was not merely executing executive and ministerial authority so as to preclude issuance of certiorari. Code Civ.Proc. § 1068; Const. art. 10, § 1.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Officer Exercising Judicial Functions".

2. Prisons ⇐7

The constitutional provision empowering governor to remove prison directors confers upon governor, as an officer, authority to hear and determine written charges of incompetency in a "judicial" capacity, as distinguished from his executive power. Const. art. 10, § 1.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Judicial".

3. Certiorari ⇐24

In statute providing for writ of review "when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions" has exceeded jurisdiction, the word "inferior" qualifies only the word "tribunal" and not "officer", and hence certiorari may issue to review proceedings of governor. Code Civ.Proc. § 1068.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Inferior".

4. Mandamus ⇐71

Mandamus will lie to compel a governor to perform acts which are purely ministerial in nature and may properly be imposed on other persons or officers.

5. Certiorari ⇐21

The trial and determination of charges against a public officer are "judicial" in nature, entirely separate from governor's ordinary executive duties, and hence certiorari will issue for review of such acts. Code Civ. Proc. § 1068.

6. Mandamus ⇐64

Mandamus or any other appropriate writ may issue against the governor under proper circumstances. Code Civ.Proc. § 1068.

7. Prisons ⇐7

A certiorari proceeding to review acts of governor in removing prison directors from office is governed by the same rules which apply to ordinary proceedings for writ of certiorari. Code Civ.Proc. § 1068; Const. art. 10, § 1.

8. United States ⇐28

All officers are amenable to the law, and not even the President of the United States may arbitrarily remove a public officer, unless he holds his tenure at the will of the Chief Executive.

9. Judgment ⇐585(3)

A judgment against petitioners in prohibition proceeding brought to prevent governor from investigating charges against prison directors or removing directors from office was not "res judicata" of issues in subsequent certiorari proceeding to review governor's removal of directors. Code Civ.Proc. § 1068; Const. art. 10, § 1.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Judicata".

10. Prohibition ⇐1

The writ of "prohibition" will lie only to prevent an inferior tribunal or officer from performing an act not authorized by law, and the writ supplies a preventive remedy to restrain the commission of a future act, not to review an act which has been performed.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Prohibition".

11. Certiorari ⇐1

"Certiorari" is the remedy for reviewing record of an inferior tribunal or officer to determine whether acts were done in excess of or without jurisdiction. Code Civ. Proc. § 1068.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Certiorari".

12. Prohibition ⇐1

A writ of prohibition may not be converted into a writ of certiorari in absence of adequate pleadings and a complete record of the inferior tribunal or officer, including the evidence upon which the acts are actually performed. Code Civ.Proc. § 1068.

13. Prisons ⇐7

In certiorari proceeding to review governor's removal of prison directors, evidence before the governor on directors' failure to prevent illegal corporal punishment of prisoners held not to show that governor exceeded his jurisdiction in finding directors guilty on that ground. Pen.Code, § 681; Code Civ. Proc. § 1068; Const. art. 10, § 1.

14. Prisons ⇐7

In certiorari proceeding to review governor's removal of prison directors, evidence held not to support charges of negligence of directors in employing warden, or in purchasing or supplying food for prisoners, nor of warden's incompetency. Pen.Code, § 681; Code Civ.Proc. § 1068; Const. art. 10, § 1.

15. Prisons ⇐7

In certiorari proceeding to review governor's removal of prison directors, governor could not be deemed to have exceeded his jurisdiction if a single material count of charges on which removal was based was supported by substantial evidence. 16. Constitutional law ⇐70(3)

In certiorari proceeding to review governor's removal of prison directors, court may not question wisdom of statute prohibiting corporal, cruel, or unusual punishment of prisoners, for violation of which the directors were removed. Pen.Code, § 681; Code Civ.Proc. § 1068; Const. art. 10, § 1.

17. Prisons ⇐13

The use of rubber hose or other weapon to suppress a threatened riot or to prevent prisoner from doing bodily harm to an officer or another inmate is distinguishable from deliberate infliction of corporal punishment for past offenses, and is not within inhibitions of statute prohibiting "corporal punishment", but is justifiable. Pen.Code, § 681.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Corporal Punishment".

18. Prisons ⇐7

It was the sole province of governor, sitting in capacity of a judicial officer in proceeding for removal of prison directors, to determine whether prisoners were flogged under circumstances constituting corporal punishment in violation of statute, or merely for purpose of necessary control of inmates, where there was evidence to support either conclusion. Pen.Code, § 681; Const. art. 10, § 1.

19. Prisons ⇐7

In proceeding before governor for removal of prison directors, prisoners testifying concerning illegal corporal punishment, who were incarcerated for felonies, were subject to the ordinary rule of impeachment. Pen. Code, § 681; Const. art. 10, § 1.

20. Officers ⇐72(1, 2)

In investigations of charges against officers whose removal is sought, the judicial tribunal or officer, like a trial jury, has exclusive province of determining credibility of witnesses and weight and sufficiency of their evidence, and reviewing court may not interfere with that province. Pen.Code, § 681; Const. art. 10, § 1.

21. Certiorari ⇐68

A reviewing court may annul a finding of an inferior judicial officer or tribunal on certiorari, only when there is no evidence to sustain a charge. Code Civ.Proc. § 1068.

22. Prisons ⇐7

Where illegal floggings of prisoners occurred frequently for more than a year, it might be assumed that prison directors in exercise of reasonable diligence should have discovered the practice, and were chargeable with constructive knowledge of the practice, as found by governor in removal proceedings. Pen.Code, §§ 681, 1573, 1576, 1578; Const. art. 10, §§ 1, 2, 5.

23. Officers ⇐72(2)

Courts are very reluctant to interfere with governor's action in removing a public officer where there is any evidence to support the charges, either by direct testimony or from reasonable inferences which may be drawn from the evidence adduced. Const. art. 10, § 1.

24. Officers ⇐72(2)

Courts may not question the motive of a governor in removing a public officer, in absence of clear proof of ulterior purpose of governor. Const. art. 10, § 1.

25. Prisons ⇐13

The constitutional and statutory provisions concerning prisons must be read together, as showing that prison directors have authority and duty to see that guards or prison employees do not violate statute against corporal punishment, when directors have either actual or constructive knowledge of such unlawful practice. Pen.Code, §§ 681, 1573, 1576, 1578; Const. art. 10, §§ 1, 2, 5.

26. Officers ⇐66, 118

The rule that public officer is not responsible for acts or omissions of subordinates properly employed by or under him, not in his private service, but as servants of the government, unless he has directed such acts to be done, or has personally cooperated therein, is well established but applicable to liability for torts rather than to liability to removal for permitting violation of statute by subordinates.

27. Officers ⇐118

The doctrine of "respondeat superior" has no application as between a public officer and his subordinates, who are likewise in the public service, unless public officer has directed or countenanced the tortious acts or has cooperated therein.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Respondeat Superior".

28. Officers ⇐66

When superior officers countenance tortious acts by permitting subordinate officers to violate repeatedly a statute specifically prohibiting such acts, whether knowledge of such practice is actual or constructive, such conduct may furnish grounds for removal of superior officers for unfitness or neglect of duty, even though they might not be personally liable for damages for injuries sustained.

29. Prisons ⇐7

In proceeding for certiorari to review governor's removal of prison directors, court had no discretion except to determine whether governor, acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, exceeded his jurisdiction in determining that any one of the charges was supported by some substantial evidence. Code Civ.Proc. § 1068; Const. art. 10, § 1.

Petition for certiorari by A. R. O'Brien and others, members of the State Board of Prison Directors, against Culbert L. Olson, Governor of the State of California, to review and annul proceedings which resulted in petitioners' removal from office.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied; GIBSON, C. J., not participating.

John L. McNab, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

George G. Olshausen and Edward P. Murphy, both of San Francisco (Samuel J. Jones, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

By means of certiorari, A. R. O'Brien and other duly appointed and qualified prison directors, seek to review and annul the proceedings instituted under article X, section 1, of the Constitution of California, which resulted in their removal from office by the governor. The respondent moved to quash this proceeding on the ground that the executive act of the governor in dismissing the officers is exempt from interference by the courts for the reason that he is granted by the Constitution exclusive power and authority to do so.

Each of the petitioners was appointed and qualified, for the term of ten years, as a member of the state board of prison directors. The term of none of the directors, with the exception of that of Donald Kolts, has expired. His term ended January 15, 1940. John Gee Clark is the duly appointed director of penology of the state of California. As such officer, he filed adequate written charges of alleged "misconduct, incompetency and neglect of duty", against each of the prison directors, on October 23, 1939. The accusation contained eighteen separate specifications of inefficiency. The removal of the directors from office was thereupon demanded. The charges were regularly served upon the officers. The specifications of the complaint accused the directors of: Employing and retaining as warden of San Quentin state prison an incompetent person; the lack of proper supervision of the state prisons; a failure to supply and prepare wholesome food for the use of the prisoners; permitting the maintenance of unsanitary conditions in the prisons; employing dangerous machinery in the jute mills; the lack of adequate medical attention to prisoners; a failure to require entries to be made in the warden's prison record of corporal punishments administered to prisoners; and of permission granted for prison guards to inflict corporal floggings and cruel and unusual punishment upon prisoners contrary to the provisions of section 681 of the Penal Code.

A motion to dismiss the accusations was denied. The directors filed their answer to the charges denying the material allegations thereof. On November 3, 1939, a hearing of the charges was commenced before the governor sitting in a quasi-judicial capacity, as provided by article X, section 1, of the Constitution. The respective parties were separately represented by counsel. The hearing lasted for several weeks. Three thousand pages of evidence were adduced. Most of the evidence in support of the charges was supplied by testimony from convicts in San Quentin state prison.

During the hearing of that proceeding, a petition for a writ of prohibition was filed in the superior court of Marin county, on December 27, 1939, seeking to restrain the governor from investigating the charges or removing the directors from office. An alternative writ was then issued by the court requiring the chief executive to show cause why he should not be restrained from ousting the members of the prison board.

A demurrer to that petition, on the ground that the superior court was without jurisdiction of the persons or subject-matter, and that the petition failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, was argued and submitted for ruling on January 11, 1940. Before that demurrer was determined, the respondent in this cause filed his findings April 11, 1940, sustaining most of the material charges which had been preferred against the members of the prison board, and declaring that he would "make an order of ouster at such time, and under such circumstances as may be proper in the premises". June 21, 1940, the judge of the superior court of Marin county sustained the demurrer to the petition for a writ of prohibition. For failure to amend that petition within the time allowed, judgment was rendered against the petitioners in the prohibition proceeding dissolving the restraining order, and determining that they take nothing by that action. Subsequently the governor made an order formally removing these petitioners from office as prison directors, and he thereafter appointed their successors. This petition for a writ of certiorari was then filed.

[1, 2] The respondent contends that the writ of certiorari may not issue under section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure to review the order of the governor of California in removing from office the prison directors, since that act was an exercise of executive and ministerial authority which is exclusively within his province. There is no merit in this contention. In the investigation of charges of misconduct and neglect of duty of prison directors the governor clearly acted under the provisions of article X, section 1, of the Constitution, as an "officer exercising judicial functions". Sec. 1068, Code Civ. Proc.; 4 Cal.Jur. 1071, sec. 38; State ex rel. Kinsella v. Eberhart, 116 Minn. 313, 133 N.W. 857, 860, 39 L.R.A.,N.S., 788, Ann.Cas.1913B, 785. In the case last cited, which was a proceeding to review the order of the Governor of Minnesota in removing from office a county attorney, it is said: "Proceedings for the removal of a public official by the Governor are clearly of judicial character". The constitutional provision above cited confers upon the governor, as an officer authority in a judicial capacity to hear and determine written charges of incompetency, as distinguished from his executive power. After authorizing the governor to appoint five prison directors "who shall hold office for ten years", the last paragraph of that section provides that "The Governor shall have the power to remove either of the directors for misconduct, incompetency, or neglect of duty, after an opportunity to be heard upon written charges".

Section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the issuance of a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings of either an inferior tribunal or an officer in the exercise of judicial functions. That section provides: "A writ of review may be granted by any court, except a municipal, police or justice's court, when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy."

[3] The respondent insists that the preceding section is inapplicable to the circumstances of this case since the chief executive may not be deemed to be a mere "inferior tribunal". That precise contention was disposed of adversely to this respondent in the case of Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 189, at page 212, 2 Am. Rep. 432; which was a petition for a writ of mandamus under section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section contains language very similar to the section we are here required to construe. In the Harpending proceeding a mandate was sought and granted compelling the governor to perform the purely ministerial duty of authenticating a statute which had been adopted by the legislature. It was contended, as it is in the present case, that since the governor was not an "inferior tribunal" the writ should not issue against him. But the court held that "It is obvious that the word 'inferior,' as here used, is a qualification confined to the word 'tribunal'." The court further explained that the word "inferior" was used in the statute merely to designate the class of tribunals against which the writ may issue as distinguished from the courts which are authorized to issue them. It was specifically said that it has no application to the "person" mentioned in section 1085, against whom the writ may issue. With equal force we may say that the term "inferior", as it is used in section 1068, has no application to the word "officer" against whom it is specifically provided the writ of certiorari may issue. It may issue against an officer sitting in a judicial capacity regardless of the station he occupies.

[4, 5] It is true that many authorities have held mandamus proceedings will not lie to control the action of a governor in matters which are strictly and exclusively political or executive in their nature. 105 A.L.R. 1124. On the contrary the authorities from many states, including California, hold that mandamus will lie to compel a governor to perform acts which are purely ministerial in their nature and which acts may properly be imposed on other persons or officers. Harpending v. Haight, supra; State ex rel. Kinsella v. Eberhart, supra; Donnelly v. Roosevelt, 144 Misc. 525, 259 N.Y.S. 356; State v. Frazier, 47 N.D. 314, 182 N.W. 545; 105 A.L.R. 1132, note. The same rule applies to a governor when he is acting in a judicial capacity pursuant to the constitutional provision authorizing him to hear and determine charges of unfitness which have been preferred against prison directors. Certainly the trying and determining of charges against a public officer are judicial in their nature. They are entirely separate and distinct from the governor's ordinary executive duties. Such quasi-judicial duties might just as well have been imposed on the attorney general or any other state officer or court. A review of such a separate judicial proceeding in no way infringes upon the exclusive executive authority which vests in the governor as the chief officer of the state. We are therefore of the opinion the writ of certiorari may properly issue under the circumstances of this case.

[6] It is true that the cases in some other jurisdictions are conflicting with respect to the circumstances under which a special writ may issue to compel the governor of a state to perform acts of a purely ministerial nature. See Blalock v. Johnston, 180 S.C. 40, 185 S.E. 51, 105 A.L.R. 1115, note. California is in accord with the decisions of a dozen other states in holding that mandamus or any other appropriate writ may issue against the governor under proper circumstances. Middleton v. Low, 30 Cal. 596; Stuart v. Haight, 39 Cal. 87; Harpending v. Haight, supra; Elliott v. Pardee, 149 Cal. 516, 86 P. 1087. If a governor were immune from judicial control under all circumstances merely because he is the chief executive of a state, it is apparent that he might arbitrarily remove public officers for political or personal reasons without just cause, and thereby defeat the very purpose of our democratic form of government. State v. Verage, 177 Wis. 295, 187 N.W. 830, 23 A.L.R. 491; State ex rel. Kinsella v. Eberhart, supra; State v. Frazier, 47 N.D. 314, 182 N.W. 545; 52 A.L.R. 24, note. In the Kinsella case, supra, the court quotes with approval the assertion of Chief Justice Field in People ex rel. McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11, that "No officer, however high, is above the law." In the headnote to the brief found in 52 A.L.R., at page 24, upon the subject of the conclusiveness of a governor's findings of unfitness of a public officer as the basis for removing him, it is said:

"While the courts are very reluctant to interfere with the governor's action in removing a public officer, yet there is authority for the view that, if the officer is not subject to summary removal, but can only be removed for cause for reasons specified in the Constitution or statute, he is not without redress through the courts."

[7] In the brief last cited many cases are enumerated in which the writ of certiorari was issued to review the proceedings of governors in removing public officers. We are of the opinion the writ may properly issue under the circumstances of this case to determine whether the governor, sitting in a quasi-judicial capacity, has exceeded his jurisdiction in sustaining the charges which were preferred against the prison directors, and in removing them from office. The situation is governed by the same rules which apply to the ordinary proceedings for a writ of certiorari. 2 Cal.Jur. 1071, sec. 38.

[8] It has been uniformly held that all officers are amenable to the law. Not even the president of the United States may arbitrarily remove a public officer, unless he holds his tenure at the will of the chief executive. In the frequently-cited case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, at page 162, 2 L.Ed. 60, Chief Justice Marshall said:

"The very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury. One of the first duties of government is to afford that protection. * * *

"The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right."

In the case last cited the president of the United States appointed Mr. Marbury as a justice of the peace in the District of Columbia for a definite term of years. His commission was in the custody of the secretary of state for the mere ministerial purpose of affixing the seal and recording the document, when the president's term expired. The succeeding president sought to revoke the appointment of the justice of the peace by directing the secretary of state not to deliver his commission. Marbury asked for a writ of mandamus to compel delivery of his commission of appointment. The syllabi correctly states the principles of law which were decided in that case, as follows:

"The President cannot authorize a Secretary of State to omit the performance of those duties which are enjoined by law.

"A justice of peace in the District of Columbia is not removeable at the will of the President.

"When a commission for an officer not holding his office at the will of the President, is by him signed and transmitted to the secretary of state to be sealed and recorded, it is irrevocable; the appointment is complete.

"A mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a Secretary of State to deliver a commission to which the party is entitled."

In the case of Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 55 S.Ct. 869, 79 L.Ed. 1611, the president's arbitrary removal of a duly appointed member of the Federal Trade Commission, was by a unanimous decision held to be invalid, and a judgment for the commissioner's salary, which accrued after his purported removal from office, was sustained. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States quotes with approval from the Marbury opinion with respect to the remedy of an officer who has been arbitrarily removed without cause by a chief executive. The syllabus of that case also correctly states the principle of law determined, as follows:

"The President's power to remove a member of the Federal Trade Commission is limited to removal for the specific causes enumerated in § 1 of the Federal Trade Commission Act [15 U.S.C.A. § 41].

"The fixing of a definite term for a public officer, subject to removal for cause, is enough * * * to establish a legislative intent that the term is not to be curtailed in the absence of such cause."

In the present case the term of the prison directors is fixed by law at ten years, and the governor is authorized to remove them only for cause after formal charges have been preferred and sustained in a hearing as provided by the Constitution. The writ of review may be properly directed to the chief executive of a state for the purpose of determining whether he acted in a judicial capacity without or in excess of such authority in examining and determining the charges of unfitness which have been preferred against the prison directors as provided by article X, section 1, of the Constitution.

[9-11] The respondent contends that the judgment which was rendered in the prohibition proceeding in Marin county is determinative of the issues of this cause in accordance with the doctrine of res judicata. We are of the opinion the judgment in the prohibition proceeding is not res judicata of the issues presented on this petition for a writ of certiorari. The writ of prohibition was sought to restrain the governor from investigating the charges of unfitness of the prison directors and from discharging them on that account. The writ of prohibition will lie only to prevent an inferior tribunal or officer from performing an act not authorized by law. That writ supplies a preventive remedy to restrain the commission of a future act, and not to review an act which has been performed. State Board of Equalization v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.2d 252, 70 P.2d 482; Traffic Truck Sales Co. v. Justice's Court, 192 Cal. 377, 220 P. 306. At the time judgment was rendered in the prohibition case for failure to amend the petition after a demurrer had been sustained, the governor had not yet completed his investigation of the charges and he had not then dismissed the prison directors. Both of those acts were subsequently performed before this writ of certiorari was issued. The writ of certiorari is authorized for quite a different purpose. It furnishes the remedy for reviewing the record of an inferior tribunal or officer to determine whether the acts which have been performed were done in excess of or without jurisdiction.

[12] A writ of prohibition may not be converted into a writ of certiorari in the absence of adequate pleadings and a complete record of the inferior tribunal or officer, including the evidence upon which the acts are actually performed. Donner Finance Company v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco, 28 Cal.App.2d 112, 81 P.2d 1054; Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903; 4 Cal.Jur. 1022, sec. 4. Since the acts complained of in this action were not performed when the judgment in the prohibition case was rendered, that judgment is not res judicata of this certiorari proceeding.

Assuming that res judicata could be successfully pleaded and proved as an estoppel to this proceeding, which we do not concede, that fact is immaterial in view of our determination of the merits of this cause.

[14] While it is true that the respondent found that nine of the charges were sustained by the evidence which was adduced, he evidently deemed them to be of slight weight, with the exception of those which alleged the authorization of corporal punishment of the prisoners, for he says in his findings: "The matters which in and of themselves seem to require dismissal of the board are nearly all bound up with the practice of inflicting cruel and corporal punishment within the prison." We find no substantial evidence of negligence on the part of the prison board in employing the warden, nor of his incompetency. Nor do we find evidence of negligence on the part of the board in purchasing or supplying food for the use of the prisoners. There is evidence that sour mush was occasionally served to the prisoners and that some other food may at times have been inferior or distasteful. The evidence indicates that those defects occurred from the manner of preparation or from a lack of care in preserving the food, rather than from negligence on the part of the prison board in purchasing the food. Many of the other charges are trivial or lack substantial support of the evidence. They are evidently not strongly relied upon by the governor.

[15] If a single material count, however, is supported by substantial evidence, the governor may not be deemed to have exceeded his jurisdiction in finding the directors guilty of the charges, and we may not then interfere with his conclusions regardless of what we might think of the seriousness of the accusations. There is a conflict of evidence regarding nearly every charge. There is little doubt that some of the prisoners were repeatedly flogged with a rubber hose. There is evidence to indicate this practice continued for more than a year during which time some forty prisoners were flogged. Several prisoners testified to such punishment of themselves and of other inmates of the prison. The guards and other officers testified that the prisoners were flogged only to suppress threatened insurrections or to prevent violent disobedience of prison rules. The guards insisted that the corporal punishment which was administered was necessary to quell riots and to preserve order and control of the institution. It is true that some states authorize corporal punishment of prisoners when it is necessary to preserve discipline and to manage and control unruly and refractory convicts. State v. Revis, 193 N.C. 192, 136 S.E. 346, 50 A.L.R. 98. But the California legislature has prohibited corporal punishment of prisoners in our state institutions under all circumstances. Sec. 681, Pen.Code.

It is apparent that only strict obedience to stern prison rules can possibly hold control over the eight thousand prisoners in California's two state prisons, many of whom are hardened, desperate, incorrigible criminals. Lax control of desperate criminals will inevitably lead to defiance of authority and mutiny of prisoners so as to endanger the lives of the prison officers and the maintenance of our prison system. That very situation has occurred in our California state prisons in recent years.

[16-21] It is true that civilized governments discountenance inhuman treatment of prisoners. In that spirit, section 681 of the Penal Code was enacted to prohibit corporal, cruel or unusual punishment of prisoners. We may not question the wisdom of that statute. It is the law of California, and we are bound to abide by its mandate. There is a distinction, however, between the deliberate infliction of corporal punishment for past offenses, and the use of a rubber hose or other weapon to suppress a threatened riot or to prevent a prisoner from doing bodily harm to an officer or to another inmate of the prison. Clearly, the last-mentioned conduct does not come within the inhibitions of section 681 of the Penal Code. The use of weapons under such circumstances is justifiable and necessary. It was, however, the sole province of the respondent, sitting in the capacity of a judicial officer, under article X of the Constitution, to determine whether the prisoners were flogged with a rubber hose under circumstances constituting corporal punishment in conflict with the statute, or merely for the purpose of necessary control of the inmates. There is evidence to support either conclusion. In applying the foregoing rule regarding the weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses we are mindful of the fact that each of the directors testified he had no personal knowledge that prisoners were being flogged with a rubber hose, and that he was opposed to the infliction of corporal punishment. We also realize that practically all of the witnesses who testified to such deliberate corporal punishment were prisoners who were incarcerated for felonies committed by them, and that they may therefore be subject to the ordinary rule of impeachment. It is also true that two of the convicts subsequently confessed they had perjured themselves in giving their testimony in that regard. But it is unquestionably the rule, applicable to such investigations, that the judicial tribunal or officer, like a trial jury has the exclusive province of determining the credibility of witnesses and the weight and sufficiency of their evidence to prove the charges preferred. With that province we may not interfere. It is only when there is no evidence to sustain a charge that a reviewing court may annul a finding of an inferior judicial officer or tribunal on certiorari. Garvin v. Chambers, 195 Cal. 212, 221, 232 P. 696.

[22-24] The remaining question to be determined is whether the violation of the corporal punishment statute by the guards may be imputed to the directors so as to justify their removal by the governor. We are pointed to no evidence that any of the directors ever had personal knowledge of the practice of flogging prisoners with a rubber hose. The directors testified that they had no such knowledge, and that they neither authorized nor approved corporal punishment. Yet all of the directors had served as such officers for several years during which time it was their duty to regularly attend meetings of the board at the prisons and to superintend the conduct of those institutions. Since floggings occurred frequently for a period of more than a year, it may be assumed that the directors, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, should have discovered that practice on the part of the guards. We are inclined to hold that constructive knowledge of the practice of flogging the prisoners, under the circumstances of this case, would be imputed to the directors, since the respondent has so found. It has been said "courts are very reluctant to interfere with the governor's action in removing a public officer" where there is any evidence to support the charges either by direct testimony or from reasonable inferences which may be drawn from the evidence adduced. 52 A.L.R. 24, note. It has been wisely said that courts may not question the motive of a governor in removing a public officer, in the absence of clear proof of an ulterior purpose on his part.

The law confers upon the prison directors general supervision and management of the state prisons. They become responsible for the conduct of the officers therein. The Constitution and the statutes indicate that fact. Section 2 of article X of the Constitution provides that: "The board of directors shall have the charge and superintendence of the state prisons, and shall possess such powers, and perform such duties, in respect to other penal and reformatory institutions of the State, as the Legislature may prescribe."

Section 5 of the same article provides: "The legislature shall pass such laws as may be necessary to further define and regulate the powers and duties of the Board, Wardens, and Clerks, and to carry into effect the provisions of this article."

Section 1573 of the Penal Code provides that: "For the government and manage- ment of the state prisons", the governor shall appoint five prison directors. Section 1576 of the same code prescribes the duties which are imposed on the directors, including authorization for them to appoint necessary officers and employees of the prison, and to specify the duties which they shall perform. This section also requires that at least three of the directors shall visit the prisons each month, and "oftener if necessary". It compels them to report to the governor "the condition of the prisons" once each year. It also makes it their duty to "prescribe rules and regulations for the government of the prisons".

Section 1578 of the Penal Code prescribes the duties imposed upon the warden. Subdivision 3 of that section declares that it is his duty "to supervise the government, discipline and police of the prisons, and to enforce all orders and regulations of the board in respect to such prisons".

[25] While the statute does purport to confer upon the warden supervision of the conduct of the prisoners, the various provisions of the Constitution and statutes in that regard must be read together, from which it appears that the warden has supervision, subject only to the paramount authority and control of the board, for section 2 of article X of the Constitution, previously quoted, declares that "The Board of Directors shall have the charge and superintendence of the state prisons." Certainly this gives them authority, and we think it imposes upon them the duty to see that the statute against corporal punishment of prisoners is not violated by guards or employees of the prison, when the members of the board have either actual or constructive knowledge of that unlawful practice.

The petitioners, however, seek to invoke the principle which relieves a superior officer of liability for damages for the torts of a subordinate officer who is engaged in the same public service. See Michel v. Smith, 188 Cal. 199, 205 P. 113, 115; Noack v. Zellerbach, 11 Cal.App.2d 186, 53 P.2d 986, 987.

[26, 27] Quoting with approval from the Michel case, supra, the Noack opinion concisely states the rule as follows: "'A public officer is not responsible for the acts or omissions of subordinates properly employed by or under him, if such subordinates are not in his private service, but are themselves servants of the government, unless he has directed such acts to be done, or has personally cooperated therein.' This statement is in accord with the rule uniformly followed in other jurisdictions. 1 A.L.R. 222; 3 A.L.R. 149; 12 A.L.R. 980. In Hilton v. Oliver, 204 Cal. 535, page 539, 269 P. 425, 426, 61 A.L.R. 297, trustees of a reclamation district were held not liable for the negligence of subordinates, the court saying: 'The defendant trustees can be held liable under the facts shown herein only by reason of the application of the doctrine of respondeat superior. This doctrine has no application as between a public officer and his subordinates, who are likewise in the public service, unless the public officer has directed or countenanced the tortious acts to be done, or has cooperated therein.' See annotation in 61 A.L.R. 300."

[28] The doctrine announced in the preceding quotation is well established. It will be observed, however, that those cases involved the liability of superior officers for damages for torts committed by subordinate officers engaged in the same public service. Moreover, numerous cases hold that when the tortious acts of subordinate officers are performed under the direction of the superior officer, or even with his acquiescence or approval, he may be held liable. We assume that when such tortious acts are countenanced by the superior officers by permitting subordinate officers to repeatedly violate a statute specifically prohibiting the acts complained of, whether knowledge of that practice is actual or constructive, such conduct may furnish grounds for removal of the superior officers for alleged unfitness or neglect of duty, even though they might not be personally liable for damages for injuries sustained.

We are of the opinion the present proceeding furnishes ample evidence distinguishing it from facts which would relieve the directors, as superior officers, from responsibility of the wrongful acts of subordinate officers of the prison under the foregoing rule.

[29] We fully realize the seriousness of the removal of the entire prison board for alleged inefficiency in view of the fact that they have rendered valuable service for the state in that capacity for many years without previous criticism. Upon this proceeding for a writ of certiorari we have no discretion except to determine whether the governor, acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, exceeded his jurisdiction in determining that any one of the charges is supported by some substantial evidence. We are satisfied there is substantial evidence to support the finding that the board had constructive knowledge, and therefore became responsible for permitting the guards of San Quentin state prison to administer corporal punishment contrary to law upon many prisoners over a period of several months. We are therefore powerless to interfere with the respondent's discretion in passing upon the charges and dismissing the members of the board.

The order of removal of the officers is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. O'NEAL.

Cr. 3398.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 6, 1941.

Larceny ⇐65

Prosecuting witness' testimony corroborated in part by the testimony of other witnesses sustained conviction of petty theft.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence L. Kincaid, Judge.

Frank W. O'Neal was convicted of petty theft with prior conviction of a felony, and from the judgment of conviction and order denying a motion for new trial, he appeals.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Wm. J. F. Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Gilbert F. Nelson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WOOD, Justice.

Defendant was charged by information with the crime of petty theft with the prior conviction of a felony. He admitted the prior conviction and a jury returned a verdict finding him guilty. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial and now asserts that the evidence is insufficient to justify the conviction.

After banking hours in the afternoon of February 19, 1940, Lorrin Andrews, a lawyer, while in his office in the city of Los Angeles, received from a client an envelope containing a $100 bill and a $50 bill. The envelope was left temporarily on Andrews' flat top desk. At this time defendant came into the office for an interview. Andrews was to appear for defendant in a criminal trial which was set for the following day. After a conversation of a few minutes concerning the approaching trial Andrews was called out of the office for a minute. Upon his return defendant was standing in the doorway. He said to Andrews "I will see you in the morning" and left the office. Andrews thereupon wrote a letter and started to put the money in his safe but could not find the envelope containing the bills. He called defendant's home by telephone but received no answer. The next morning Andrews met defendant at the courtroom and asked him "Where is that money you took off my desk?" to which defendant replied that he had left it at his home and that he had taken it because he was afraid someone else might pick it up while Andrews was out of the office. Defendant assured Andrews that he would return the money upon the completion of the trial which was about to commence. Defendant was convicted at the trial and was immediately sentenced to ten days in jail. Andrews asked defendant to tell him where the money was so that he could get it but defendant promised to bring it to Andrews upon his release from jail. Defendant did not return the money to Andrews but left for Colorado, from which place he was extradited. Defendant was sworn as a witness and denied having been in Andrews' office on the day in question. He also denied having had a conversation with Andrews concerning the money.

The testimony of Mr. Andrews concerning the facts above related, which was in part corroborated by other witnesses, is ample to sustain the conviction. The jury was justified in concluding that defendant had taken the money from Mr. Andrews' desk with criminal intent.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SCHNECK v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

Civ. 11596.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 13, 1941.

Hearing Granted March 13, 1941.

1. Insane persons ⇐33(2)

Orders of superior court appointing guardians of the person and estate of an incompetent person are appealable. Probate Code, § 1630.

2. Insane persons ⇐33(2)

Where woman 43 years of age, who suffered from aphasia but whose mentality was disturbed only about 10 per cent. of the time, during which period she was decidedly incompetent, and at other times being entirely normal, was notified of hearing of application to appoint guardians of her person and estate and was requested to appear in court but refused to do so, petition for writ of review to annul orders appointing the guardians did not lie. Probate Code, § 1630.

3. Insane persons ⇐8, 13, 19

Where alleged incompetent was normal about 90 per cent. of the time and when notified of hearing of application for appointment of guardians for her person and estate refused to attend hearing, trial court, on being informed of facts, had authority to proceed and appoint the guardian, to order a continuance, to issue a bench warrant to compel her attendance, or to go to alleged incompetent's apartment and continue hearing at that place, and court had jurisdiction, and it was its duty as court of chancery, to determine which procedure to adopt.

4. Insane persons ⇐35

The refusal of alleged incompetent, who was normal about 90 per cent. of the time, to attend court hearing on application for appointment of guardians of her person and of estate, after service on her of citation, did not invalidate decree appointing guardians. Probate Code, § 1461; Code Civ.Proc. § 410.

5. Insane persons ⇐35

Orders appointing guardians for the person and estate of alleged incompetent were not defective for failure to recite that she was an incompetent, statute not requiring recital of existence of facts on which court's jurisdiction rests. Probate Code, § 1220.

6. Certiorari ⇐50

A writ of review brings up a complete transcript of the evidence.

7. Certiorari ⇐69

On a writ of review, if an inspection of the record discloses evidence supporting the orders of the trial court, they must be affirmed, regardless of existence of finding.

8. Insane persons ⇐32

Even if trial court should have made a finding that alleged incompetent was an incompetent before appointing guardians for her person and estate, failure to do so was a mere irregularity, not an act in excess of jurisdiction.

9. Insane persons ⇐13

Under statute providing that service in proceedings for appointment of guardians of person and estate of alleged incompetent shall be made in same manner as provided for service of summons, it is not necessary to serve petition on alleged incompetent, notwithstanding complaint is required to be served with a summons, since petition merely advises that an inquiry is to be made and such fact is in effect contained in citation. Probate Code, § 1461; Code Civ.Proc. § 410.

10. Insane persons ⇐33(2)

Where documents attached to a return and answer were not before trial court on date when it made orders appointing guardians of person and estate of an incompetent person, but were filed with return and answer on a subsequent date, they constituted no part of the proceedings of the trial court, and a motion to strike out such documents was, therefore, granted by appellate court.

11. Mandamus ⇐164(1)

A return and answer is proper in proceeding to obtain a writ of mandamus.

Petition by Celia Schneck, an incompetent, by J. W. Ehrlich, her guardian ad litem, against the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and others, for a writ of review to annul orders appointing guardians of her person and estate. The proceeding was transferred to the District Court of Appeal by the Supreme Court, and petitioner moved to strike out a return and answer filed by respondents and certain documents attached thereto.

Motion granted in part and denied in part and orders affirmed.

J. W. Ehrlich, of San Francisco (Roy A. Sharff and Alfred M. Miller, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

Felix Lauricella, Eustace Cullinan, and Cullinan, Hickey & Cullinan, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

On the 14th day of August, 1939, the respondent court made an order appointing a guardian of the person of Celia Schneck, an incompetent person, and on the same date it made another order appointing a guardian of her estate. On October 7, 1940, Celia Schneck, by J. W. Ehrlich, her guardian ad litem, commenced a proceeding in the Supreme Court asking for a writ of review to have said orders annulled. A writ was issued and the respondents filed a return thereto. Later the proceeding was transferred to this court for a hearing and determination.

[1] The petitioner contends (1) the superior court has no jurisdiction to hear proceedings to declare a person incompetent and appoint guardians unless the alleged incompetent is present in court, or her inability to be present is certified to by the affidavit of and a certificate of a duly licensed physician and surgeon; (2) the orders appointing guardians are void because there was no finding that Celia Schneck was an incompetent nor was there any adjudication that she was an incompetent person; and (3) the service upon the alleged incompetent was void because a copy of the petition was not served with the citation. The respondents call to our attention that both of the orders made on August 14, 1939, were appealable orders. Probate Code, sec. 1630. Continuing they assert that it is settled by a long line of decision that certiorari does not lie where there is an appeal or any other plain, speedy and adequate remedy even in the cases where the lower court exceeded its jurisdiction. They assert that the fact a petitioner has allowed his right of appeal to expire does not entitle him to a writ of review, unless there was a lack of notice originally or where the circumstances are aggravated and justify immediate relief. They further claim that the facts in the record before us do not bring this case within any of those exceptions. Postal etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 22 Cal.App. 770, 772, 136 P. 538 et seq. The petitioner answers by citing Grinbaum v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 528, 221 P. 635, 647. That case, like the present, involved a proceeding appointing guardians for an incompetent person. However, the facts are clearly distinguishable. Mrs. Grinbaum had been a resident of San Francisco. While visiting in Europe she became insane. By an order duly made by the proper court in Germany she was adjudged an insane person. A similar order was made by the proper court in the republic of Switzerland. While those orders remained in full force and effect, and while she was still detained in Europe, guardians of her person and estate were appointed by the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco. At no time was any notice or process served on Mrs. Grinbaum in any manner whatsoever. The contention which these respondents make was made in the Grinbaum case. In reply to the contention that Mrs. Grinbaum had another remedy to-wit, an appeal, the court said: "As to the first of these remedies [an appeal], it is conceded that the time has long gone by for its exercise, and it is obvious from the state of this record that the petitioner neither had nor was in any condition to receive notice of the making of such order or of the defects in the same during the statutory time when such appeal might have been taken." Further on in the decision Mr. Chief Justice Wilbur, speaking on the same contention, said: "It clearly appears that, at the time of the appointment of the Mercantile Trust Company, Mrs. Grinbaum was in fact insane, and that she continued to be so for many years thereafter. It further appears that her insanity is of such type that actual notice to her of the pendency of the proceeding for the appointment of a guardian in California would have no effect whatever upon her; that is to say, she was incapable mentally of receiving notice, and whatever form the notice may have taken her mentality was so clouded that she would not have understood or appreciated the nature or effect of the notice." It thus clearly appears that the rule in the Grinbaum case rested on the special facts of that case and brought it within the exception to the general rule. (4 Cal.Jur. 1056.) The Supreme Court has so construed the decision on several occasions. Erickson v. Municipal Court, 219 Cal. 737, 740, 29 P.2d 192; State Board of Equalization v. Superior Ct., 9 Cal.2d 252, 255, 70 P.2d 482; see, also, Ivory v. Superior Court, 12 Cal.2d 455, 460, 85 P.2d 894.

[2] In the instant case the record does not disclose any special circumstances excusing the failure of Celia Schneck to exercise her right of appeal. The facts are quite otherwise. The record shows that she is a woman about forty-three years of age; that some years ago she had syphilis; that she still suffers from the effects thereof; and that one of the effects causes her to suffer from aphasia. That affliction is progressing; however, at the time of the hearing, according to the report made by Dr. Stockton, her mentality was not disturbed excepting about ten per cent of the time. During these mental attacks she was decidedly incompetent. During the remaining ninety per cent of the time she was entirely normal. The record further shows that she was duly notified of the hearing of the application to appoint a guardian. She was requested to go to court but refused to do so. About thirty days thereafter she filed a petition asking to be restored to competency. At least at that time she had full knowledge that the orders under attack had been made and that she fully comprehended the effect thereof. Therefore, as stated above, the instant case does not disclose any special circumstances bringing it within the exception. (4 Cal.Jur. 1056.)

[3, 4] As stated above she was duly notified of the hearing but refused to attend. When the hearing was called on August 14, 1939, Mr. Lauricella, the attorney for the guardian, took the stand as a witness and at once disclosed the fact that Mrs. Schneck was not present, that she had been served with notice and had been requested to attend but that she refused to go to court. Thereupon he asked to be advised what to do in the premises. In order to determine that question the trial court heard Mr. Lauricella and it also heard the testimony of Dr. Firestone, Dr. Hirschfeld, and Mr. Landi, who was applying for letters. Under the circumstances the trial court had the authority (1) to proceed as it did, (2) to order a continuance, (3) to issue a bench warrant to compel her attendance, or (4) to go to her apartment and continue the hearing at that place. It had the jurisdiction and it was its duty as a court of chancery to determine which rule of procedure to adopt. Sullivan v. Dunne, 198 Cal. 183, 189, 244 P. 343. But the refusal of the petitioner, after service of the citation, to attend on the court, did not invalidate the decree. Chaloner v. Sherman, 2 Cir., 215 F. 867, 872, affirmed 242 U.S. 455, 37 S.Ct. 136, 61 L.Ed. 427; Re Moynihan, 332 Mo. 1022, 62 S.W.2d 410, 91 A.L.R. 74, 78. Such statements are not at variance with the doctrine stated in Monks v. Duffle, 163 Ark. 118, 259 S.W. 735. That is an Arkansas decision. In that state the statute (sec. 5829 of Crawford & Moses' Digest) does not provide for the service of a citation, but provides the alleged incompetent shall "* * * be brought before [the] court * * *." Manifestly such statute provides for the most certain kind of notice and also if it is not complied with the court will have acquired no jurisdiction, by notice or otherwise, of the incompetent. The most that can be said is that the trial court possibly erred but not that it exceeded its jurisdiction.

[5-8] The attack that the orders complained of do not recite that Mrs. Schneck is incompetent has no merit. Under the plain terms of the statute, Probate Code, sec. 1220, it was not necessary that said order should recite the existence of facts upon which jurisdiction of the court rested. The effect of a writ of review is to bring up a complete transcript of the evidence. Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 P. 580. If an inspection of the record discloses there was evidence supporting the orders of the trial court they must be affirmed—finding or no finding. Estate of Paulsen, 179 Cal. 528, 530, 178 P. 143. If we assume the trial court should have made a finding that Mrs. Schneck was incompetent failure to do so was a mere irregularity and not an act in excess of jurisdiction. Simon v. Craft, 182 U.S. 427, 437, 21 S.Ct. 836, 45 L.Ed. 1165.

[9] Neither do we find merit in the contention that the petition should have been served on Mrs. Schneck, Section 1461 of the Probate Code is not so worded. It contains the direction that the service should be made "* * * in the same manner as provided by law for service of summons". A summons may be served by delivering a copy thereof. Sec. 410, Code Civ.Proc. True it is that said section directs that a copy of the complaint should be served therewith. If the service is not complete it can be attacked by a motion to quash. 50 C.J. 587. However, no authority is cited to the effect that a failure to serve a copy of the complaint constitutes a want of jurisdiction. It is argued that the same practice should be followed in serving the petition as in serving the complaint. But it is obvious that such is not the fact. A complaint is required to contain a statement of the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action. Information of such contents is necessary for the defendant to prepare his answer. But in a proceeding under Probate Code, sec. 1461, the petition merely advises that an inquiry is to be made. Such fact is, in effect, also contained in the citation.

[10, 11] After the writ was served on respondents they appeared and on November 12, 1940, they filed a full return as commanded by said writ. On December 6, 1940, they filed a document "Return and Answer". That document contains some denials of allegations contained in the petition, some affirmative allegations, and it also has attached to it (1) an affidavit made by Solomon Lande on December 2, 1940; (2) an affidavit made by Dr. Fred Firestone on December 2, 1940; (3) an affidavit made by Laura Sunseri on November 27, 1940; and (4) a photostatic copy of a letter written by Dr. Andrew B. Stockton to the trial judge on November 12, 1940. On December 9, 1940, when this proceeding was called for hearing, the petitioner filed a written motion to strike out said return and answer filed December 6, 1940, and each of said four documents. Said motion was made and submitted. Comparing the dates, it is manifest said documents attached to said answer were not before the trial court on August 14, 1939, when it made the orders complained of, and therefore they constituted no part of the proceedings in the trial court. Those are the specific documents numbered above 1, 2, 3 and 4. As to them the motion is granted. However, the motion as to the return and answer is denied. The petitioner's application was in form both a petition for a writ of review and for a writ of mandamus. On the hearing the application for a writ of mandamus was abandoned. Conceding that a return and answer is improper in a proceeding to obtain a writ of review, such a document is manifestly proper in a proceeding to obtain a writ of mandamus.

The order of the trial court appointing a guardian of the person, and the order appointing a guardian of the estate of the petitioner are affirmed.

1. Executors and administrators ⇐194(6)

That judgment roll in proceeding to set apart land as a probate homestead did not contain an affidavit showing that notice of hearing of petition for order setting land apart as homestead had been mailed or personally served upon petitioner's coexecutrix did not render order setting apart homestead void on its face where judgment roll showed that such notice had been posted as required by law and order recited that notice of hearing of amended petition therein for order setting apart homestead had been given as required by law. Probate Code, §§ 1200, 1242.

2. Executors and administrators ⇐194(2)

Proceedings of probate court with respect to a petition for an order setting apart land as a probate homestead are "proceedings in rem", and jurisdiction to hear and determine a petition for setting apart a probate homestead is acquired by filing of petition and posting of notice as required by law, personal notices not being jurisdictional. Probate Code, §§ 1200, 1242.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Proceedings in Rem".

3. Executors and administrators ⇐194(2)

Although failure to give personal notice to petitioner's coexecutrix of hearing of petition for order setting apart land as probate homestead might have constituted grounds for reversal of order on appeal or for relief under statute authorizing trial court to allow amendments to pleadings, failure to mail or personally serve such notice upon coexecutrix did not deprive probate court of jurisdiction to enter order setting apart homestead. Code Civ.Proc. § 473; Probate Code, §§ 1200, 1242.

4. Executors and administrators ⇐194(6)

A complaint alleging that land set apart as probate homestead for widow was separate property of deceased, that defendants connected with proceedings to set land apart knew that fact, that plaintiff, who was deceased's coexecutrix, had no knowledge as to whether land was community or separate property, and that defendants falsely represented to probate court that land was community property and falsely represented value of estate, and that no notice of proceedings was given to plaintiff as coexecutrix disclosed only "intrinsic fraud" and was insufficient to justify setting aside probate court's order setting apart land as homestead. Probate Code §§ 1200, 1242.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Intrinsic Fraud".

5. Judgment ⇐443(1)

A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction can be set aside in an independent equitable proceeding for fraud only where fraud alleged was extrinsic to matter which was determined by such court.

6. Executors and administrators ⇐194(6)

Where beneficiaries under decedent's will did not file request for special notices of proceedings for order setting apart land as probate homestead, and notice of proceedings was posted as required by law, probate court's order setting apart land as homestead was binding upon beneficiaries without personal notice to them. 7. Judgment ⇐376

A final judgment cannot be annulled merely because it can be shown to have been based on perjured testimony.

8. Pleading ⇐236(1)

Denial of plaintiffs' motions for leave to amend complaint was not an abuse of discretion where it did not appear that complaint would have been sufficient to state a cause of action if proposed amendments had been allowed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Action by Ethel E. Stiebel and others against Elizabeth Clare Roberts and others, wherein the Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association, etc., and others intervened, to set aside an order of the probate court setting apart absolutely to defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts certain lands as a probate homestead upon which defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts thereafter executed a deed of trust to interveners. From a judgment for defendants and in favor of interveners, plaintiffs appeal.

M. J. Rankin, Milo V. Olson, and William C. Day, all of Los Angeles, for interveners and respondents.

SPENCE, Justice.

This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of the defendants and also in favor of the interveners.

Plaintiffs are some of the beneficiaries under the will of Charles H. Roberts, deceased. Defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts is the widow of said deceased and a beneficiary under said will. Defendants Charles Sims and Earl J. Wherry are also beneficiaries under said will and were named as defendants because of their refusal to join with plaintiffs in prosecuting this action. Defendant C. S. Price is an attorney at law who acted as attorney for the executrices.

Plaintiffs brought this action seeking to set aside an order of the probate court setting apart absolutely to defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts a certain lot of land as a probate homestead. After said order had been made, defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts executed a deed of trust upon said lot to secure a note in the sum of $2,500. The interveners obtained leave to file their complaint in intervention in this action seeking to have said deed of trust declared to be a valid and subsisting lien upon said lot and prior to any interest of any of the parties to the action.

Said Charles H. Roberts, deceased, died testate in 1933. In the same year, letters testamentary were issued to defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts, his widow, and to plaintiff Ethel E. Stiebel, his daughter by a former marriage. Defendant C. S. Price was the attorney for said executrices. Said executrices filed an inventory and appraisement and, in 1934, they filed a first account and a report. Thereafter and in the same year defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts individually filed a petition and later an amended petition for an order setting apart a certain lot as a probate homestead. She alleged therein, among other things, that said property was community property; that it consisted of a bungalow court in which she was residing; and that it was impossible to give a description of that portion of said lot upon which the bungalow was situated in which she was residing, and that she therefore selected and designated the entire lot and asked that it be set apart to her as a probate homestead. Said amended petition came on for hearing and was granted on October 10, 1934. The order recited that notice of the hearing of the amended petition had been given as required by law; that the inventory and appraisement had been filed; that no homestead had been selected during the lifetime of the deceased; and that the lot described was community property. It was ordered that said lot be "set apart absolutely as a homestead for the use and benefit of Elizabeth Clare Roberts, the widow of the deceased". In 1936, a motion was made to vacate said order but said motion was denied. It does not appear that any appeal was ever attempted from either the order setting apart the homestead or from the order denying the motion to set aside said order.

The present action was commenced in 1937. All of the foregoing facts were alleged in the complaint and there were many other allegations. Demurrers to the complaint were overruled and defendants answered. The complaint in intervention was filed and an answer thereto was filed. The cause was set down for trial and certain stipulations were entered into by the parties and certain evidence was introduced relating to the facts set forth in the complaint in intervention. When plaintiffs offered evidence in support of their complaint, objection was made on the ground that said complaint failed to state a cause of action. Said objection was sustained. Plaintiffs then moved to amend their complaint by adding as a party plaintiff "Ethel E. Stiebel, as executrix of the Estate of Charles H. Roberts, deceased" and by adding certain further allegations. Said motion was denied. The judgment of the trial court was thereafter entered. With respect to plaintiff's complaint, it was adjudged that said complaint be dismissed and that plaintiffs take nothing by their action. With respect to the complaint in intervention, it was adjudged that the deed of trust was a valid and subsisting lien upon said lot and that the interest of plaintiffs, if any, and the interest of defendants were subordinate thereto. The portion of the judgment relating to the complaint in intervention was based upon findings of fact and conclusions of law theretofore filed. Plaintiffs appealed from the entire judgment.

Plaintiffs contend that the trial court erred in dismissing their complaint and in entering judgment in favor of the defendants and interveners. They claim that their complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action to set aside the order setting apart the probate homestead "on the ground of extrinsic fraud and/or lack of jurisdiction."

We will first consider plaintiffs' contention in so far as it may relate to the judgment in favor of the interveners. It is not alleged that said interveners were parties to any fraud, extrinsic or otherwise, and it is apparently conceded that their deed of trust was valid unless the judgment roll in the proceeding to set apart the homestead showed on its face that the order setting apart the homestead was void for want of jurisdiction in the probate court to make such order.

[1-3] Plaintiffs' claim that such order was void on its face is based upon the fact that the judgment roll in the proceeding to set apart the homestead did not contain an affidavit showing that notice of the hearing of the petition had been mailed or personally served upon Ethel E. Stiebel, the coexecutrix of the petitioner. Probate Code, §§ 1200 and 1242. It appears from said judgment roll, however, that such notice had been posted as required by law and the order setting apart the homestead recited that "notice of the hearing of the amended petition herein for an order setting apart homestead has been given as required by law". It is a sufficient answer to plaintiff's claim to point out that the failure to mail or personally serve such a notice upon a coexecutrix does not affect the jurisdiction of the probate court. The proceedings of the probate court are proceedings in rem and jurisdiction to hear and determine a petition for the setting apart of a probate homestead is acquired by the filing of the petition and the posting of notice as required by law. "The personal notices are not jurisdictional. * * *" 11a Cal.Jur. 151, § 84. Their purpose is not the same as that of a summons but is somewhat similar to that of certain citations. As was said in San Francisco Prot. G. A. v. Superior Court, 116 Cal. 443, at page 453, 48 P. 379, at page 382, "The office of the citation, then, was not like that of a summons, to give the court jurisdiction." While the failure to give such personal notice might constitute grounds for reversal of an order on appeal or for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we conclude that the failure to give such personal notice to the coexecutrix in the instant case did not deprive the probate court of jurisdiction and that the order of the probate court was not void on its face. It follows that judgment must be affirmed in so far as said judgment relates to the interveners and adjudges the validity of said deed of trust.

This brings us to a consideration of the contention of plaintiffs that the complaint stated a cause of action as against the defendants to set aside the order on the ground of extrinsic fraud. In this connection, it may be stated that plaintiffs apparently concede that defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts was entitled to have a homestead set apart for a limited period but they contend that the property was separate property rather than community property and that said defendant was not entitled to have said property set apart absolutely.

The allegations of the complaint were quite lengthy but we believe that the main allegations were that the property set apart was the separate property of the deceased; that defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts and defendant C. S. Price, who had acted for both executrices and who appeared as attorney for defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts individually in the proceeding to set apart the homestead, knew that said property was separate property; that the coexecutrix "had no knowledge as to whether the property belonging to the estate was community or separate property"; that defendants Elizabeth Clare Roberts and C. S. Price falsely represented to the probate court that said property was community property, falsely represented the value of the estate and of the property set apart and falsely represented the impossibility of giving a description of the portion of the lot on which the bungalow was situated in which defendant Elizabeth Clare Roberts was residing; that no notice of said proceeding was ever given to the coexecutrix; and that said proceedings were "concealed from plaintiffs".

[4-7] We are of the opinion that the allegations of said complaint were insufficient to state a cause of action to set aside said order of the probate court. In many respects these allegations were similar to those which were under consideration in Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, at page 693, 46 P. 736, at page 737, where the court said, "A judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction can be set aside in an independent equitable proceeding for fraud only where the fraud alleged was extrinsic or collateral to the matter which was tried and determined by such court; and such is not the character of the fraud alleged in the complaint in this action." See, also, Fealey v. Fealey, 104 Cal. 354, 355, 38 P. 49, 43 Am.St.Rep. 111. The plaintiffs here were beneficiaries under the will of the deceased. It is conceded that they had filed no request for special notices and there was therefore no duty resting upon defendants to give plaintiffs any personal notice of the proceedings. Notice was posted as required by law and the order of the probate court was binding upon plaintiffs without personal notice to them. Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 591, 15 P. 769. Any alleged fraud set forth in the complaint here was not "extrinsic or collateral to the matter which was tried and determined" but was intrinsic fraud which is insufficient to warrant the setting aside of the order under attack. The rule declaring intrinsic fraud to be insufficient has been established in order that there may be an end to litigation for as was said in Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, at page 134, 25 P. 970, at page 971, 27 P. 537, 13 L.R.A.,N.S., 336, 25 Am.St.Rep. 159, "Endless litigation, in which nothing was ever finally determined, would be worse than occasional miscarriages of justice; and so the rule is that a final judgment cannot be annulled merely because it can be shown to have been based on perjured testimony; for, if this could be done once, it could be done again and again, ad infinitum."

[8] Plaintiffs finally contend that the trial court abused its discretion in denying plaintiffs' motions for leave to amend the complaint. We find no merit in this contention. It does not appear that the complaint would have been sufficient to state a cause of action even if the proposed amendments had been allowed and the denial of the motions cannot be held to have constituted an abuse of discretion.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re BURNETT'S ESTATE.

BURNETT et al. v. BURNETT.

Civ. 2908.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 13, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 13, 1941.

1. Executors and administrators ⇐510(12)

The Court of Appeal would proceed on the theory that respective counsel correctly assumed in their briefs that the expression "beteen" in a will meant "between", and that "ayers" meant "heirs".

2. Wills ⇐466

Grammatically, "between" is used when applied to two things and the word "among" is more properly used when more than two are referred to, but this is not necessarily controlling in the construction of a will. Probate Code, § 101.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Among" and "Between".

3. Wills ⇐525

In construing a will dividing property equally "between" testator's wife and seven named heirs, the court is required by statute to determine the testator's real intention. Probate Code, § 101.

4. Wills ⇐525

In interpreting wills and determining whether the beneficiaries receive their share individually or as a class, great stress is laid on the question whether the beneficiaries are named both as a class and as individuals, and if they are named individually, then they share equally.

5. Wills ⇐525

In construing a will dividing property equally "between" testator's wife and seven heirs previously named in the will, the trial court correctly concluded that each beneficiary took a one-eighth share, especially in view of evidence that the testator was 83 years old when he made the will, that all his children were by a prior marriage, that for some time he had received financial aid from them, and that property which he deeded in part to his wife, as stated in the will, was acquired after their marriage. Probate Code, §§ 101, 105.

6. Husband and wife ⇐262(1)

Real property acquired by a testator after marriage was presumptively community property.

7. Appeal and error ⇐1008(3)

Where the trial court's construction of an instrument appears to be reasonable and consistent with the intent of the maker, appellate courts will not substitute another interpretation, though it seems equally tenable.

8. Executors and administrators ⇐104(3)

The commingling of estate funds with the private funds of the executor, or the retention of the funds in his possession, or the deposit thereof with another, does not alone make the executor liable to pay interest thereon; it being necessary to show that he used the money for his own benefit.

9. Executors and administrators ⇐507(3)

Where the evidence, consisting of the executor's testimony alone, may have shown that he commingled estate funds with his own, but did not show any use thereof by the executor, the trial court's findings that the executor should not be charged with interest thereon, were sufficiently supported.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of W. I. Burnett, deceased. From an order settling the final account of the executor, G. C. Burnett, and a decree of distribution, the widow, Lucena Burnett, and others appeal.

Affirmed.

Gaylord & Gaylord, of San Francisco, and W. R. Bailey, of Visalia, for appellants.

Russell & Heid, of Tulare, for respondent.

KLETTE, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal taken by Lucena Burnett, widow of deceased, and by Robert B. Gaylord and Robert B. Gaylord, Jr., her assignees, from an order settling final account and directing distribution of the above-entitled estate. W. I. Burnett died August 5, 1929, at the age of eighty-five. He was survived by his widow, Lucena Burnett, four sons, a daughter, and two grandchildren, who were children of a deceased son. After his death three wills were found, the last of which was as follows:

"Tulare 5 May/192

"This is my last will and testament

"I have deeded to my wife lots 14 & 15 in block 135 one half interest in same also one half interest in lots 21 & 22 on block 70 all in Tulare the other half to my ayers G. C. Burnett Grace Rosson C L Burnett Roy Burnett C M Burnett also Anne & A H. Burnett Junior and all other property to be divided equally b*eteen* my wife and ayers mentioned in this will

"May 5 1927"

This is the third appeal which has been taken from the proceedings had in this estate, the other two having passed upon questions not involved in this appeal. See In re Estate of Burnett, 6 Cal.App.2d 116, 44 P.2d 435; In re Estate of Burnett, 11 Cal.2d 259, 79 P.2d 89.

The decree of distribution made under the last will, dated May 5, 1927, distributes to Robert B. Gaylord and Robert B. Gaylord, Jr., as assignees of the widow, ⅛ of the estate, and to the four sons, one daughter, and two grandchildren each ⅛ of the estate.

It is the contention of the appellants that they, as assignees of the widow, were entitled to receive and have distributed to them ½ of the estate. This claim they base upon the use of the word "between" in the will, which they contend imports a division of the estate into two equal parts, one for the widow, and the other for the named heirs; that, had the testator intended that the widow, and each of the heirs, should receive an equal ⅛ share, he would have used the word "among", instead of the word "between".

[1] Respective counsel, in their briefs, assume that the testator meant "between", when he used the word "beteen", and that he meant "heirs", when he used the word "ayers". The court will accept these meanings of these words as correct.

[2] There can be no question, that in its grammatical sense, the preposition "between" is used when applied to two things, or to two groups of things, and that when more than two are referred to, the word "among" is more properly used. But this is not necessarily controlling.

[3] Section 101 of the Probate Code provides: "A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator." It therefore becomes the duty of the court to determine what the real intention of the testator was.

Appellants, in their brief, have referred to, and have quoted from a number of cases in other jurisdictions, but do not cite any California case. We believe that several California cases are decisive in this matter.

In Re Estate of Morrison, 138 Cal. 401, 71 P. 453, the will provided that the residue of the estate was "to be divided between my sister Mrs. Wann and her daughters and my brother Edward Stettinius". It was contended by Stettinius, that he was entitled to ½ of the estate, and that the other half was to go to Mrs. Wann and her two daughters. The probate court, however, gave each ¼, which decree was upheld by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court here says:

"As applied to persons and things, the word 'between' primarily refers to two, though Webster gives 'among' as a synonym, and in a large number of cases the word is used in wills where a per capita devise or legacy was to more than two. As to the weight to be given to the word 'between', it was said in Haskell v. Sargent, 113 Mass. 341, 343: 'The use of the word "between," strictly implying but two parties to the division, is a slight circumstance favoring the construction to which we incline, though not of much weight in itself, independently of the other considerations mentioned.'"

In Re Estate of Fisk, 182 Cal. 238, 187 P. 958, 959, the provisions of the will were very similar to these being here considered. In determining the effect of the word "between", the Supreme Court said:

"Giving to the word 'between' all the etymological significance to which it is justly entitled, that word alone is hardly sufficient to determine the question involved in the case. We turn, therefore, to a more complete analysis of the clause, the interpretation of which is here involved."

[4] In interpreting wills, and in determining whether the beneficiaries of the will receive their share individually, or as a class, the courts have laid great stress on the question as to whether the beneficiaries are named both as a class, and as individuals. If they are named individually, then they share equally, share and share alike.

This matter was discussed in Re Estate of Murphy, 157 Cal. 63, 106 P. 230, 233, 137 Am.St.Rep. 110. In this estate, the Supreme Court, in reversing a decree of distribution which distributed the estate to the nieces and nephews, as a class, said:

"But, assuming, however, that the language used in the clause in question is capable of two different legal meanings resulting from the testator devising his estate to the four children of his late sister, followed by other words of express devise to each of the children by name and in equal proportions, still this mention of them by name and a devise to them in equal shares will control the description of them as children of his deceased sister. If words, which, standing alone, would be effectual to create a class, are followed by equally operative words of devise to devisees by name and in definite proportions, the law infers from the designation by name and mention of the share each is to take that the devisees are to take individually and as tenants in common, and that the descriptive portion of the clause (children of a deceased sister) is intended merely as matter of identification."

After considering certain evidence taken, the Supreme Court says further:

"We are still remitted to the application of the general rule that when in a devise a class and individuals are both mentioned, and nothing appears from other clauses of the will or extraneous evidence requiring a different construction, the devise will be construed as one to devisees individually and not to them collectively—to them as tenants in common and not to them as survivors of a class."

Referring again to In re Estate of Fisk, supra, the Supreme Court says:

"We are inclined to think that the strong inference to be derived from the use of the word 'between' by the testatrix, who was a cultured woman and well acquainted with the use of language, is overcome by the use of the names of the residuary legatees, and that a consideration of the entire residuary clause shows that she had in mind five individuals to whom the residuary legacies were to go, and that in providing for distribution these individuals thus named were to share alike."

[5, 6] In the instant case, the trial court took certain evidence, under section 105 of the Probate Code. This evidence bears out the conclusion of the trial court, that each of the eight persons named in the will, were to share alike. This evidence shows that the testator was 83 years of age, when he made the will; that for some time prior, he had received financial aid from his children; that he had married appellant, who was not the mother of his children, in 1915, when he must already have been 71 years of age; that the two pieces of property, the ½ interest of which he deeded to his wife, as stated in his last will, was acquired after their marriage and were presumptively community property. The property remaining in the estate, after his death, was his separate property, having been acquired by him prior to his marriage to appellant.

The three wills presented to the court, show the testator was illiterate, and incapable of knowing the shaded distinctions, and meanings of the words "between" and "among". The three wills are almost, if not entirely, without punctuation, and in the first will, the given name of the wife is not correctly spelled. In the last will, the word "between", is spelled "beteen", and the word "heirs", is spelled "ayers".

For the reasons stated, the court is of the opinion, that it was the intention of the testator to divide his estate into eight equal parts, between his wife, his children, and grandchildren, and that the decision of the trial court, in distributing ⅛ of the estate to the assignees of the widow, and ⅛ to each of the named "ayers" is reasonable and correct.

[7] In Re Estate of Bourn, 25 Cal.App. 2d 590, at page 600, 78 P.2d 193, at page 198, the court says: "And it is a well-established principle of law that when the construction given an instrument by a trial court appears to be reasonable and consistent with the intent of the party making it, courts of appellate jurisdiction will not substitute another interpretation even though it seems equally tenable." See In re Estate of Mallon, 34 Cal.App.2d 147, at page 158, 93 P.2d 245; Adams v. Petroleum Midway Co., Ltd., 205 Cal. 221, 270 P. 668.

The second point raised by appellants, is that the executor should be charged with legal interest, compounding annually, on estate moneys, which it is claimed he commingled with his own funds, or used in his own business. The evidence on this point is very unsatisfactory, and consisted of the testimony of the executor alone.

It shows that he, at all times, carried an account in the bank as executor, in which he carried a balance; that he carried an account in his office, in his own books, under the name "G. C. Burnett, Executor of the Estate of W. I. Burnett", or in the Burnett Lumber Company books, as "G. C. Burnett, Executor", where he credited amounts of money received by him for the estate; that about a year before the decree of distribution was made, all of the money was deposited in the bank, under an account as executor, and was there at the time distribution was ordered. The executor stated that he was in a position to pay at any time distribution was made. It does not appear, at any place in the evidence, that the money was used by the executor.

Under this evidence, the trial court found that "it is not true that said Executor should be charged with any interest on said sums" and rendered its decision in accordance therewith.

Appellants rely on the following cases to support their contention: In re Estate of Stott, 52 Cal. 403; In re Estate of Clark, 53 Cal. 355, and Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159, 28 P. 558. In each of these three cases, it clearly appears that the executor not only commingled the funds of the estate with his own, but that he made use of them in his own business, and in one of the cases, the bank account in which the money was on deposit, was twice overdrawn.

The cases cited by respondents, all of which are of later dates than those cited by appellants, apply more directly to the facts of this case. In Re Estate of Sylvar, 1 Cal.App. 35, 81 P. 663, 664, the court said: "In regard to the money having been deposited with, and to some extent used by, Hoffman, it does not appear that the administrator consented to, or was in any way privy to, such use. The administrator never used any of the money himself, nor received anything for its use. We are not prepared to say that an administrator may not deposit the funds of the estate with a private banker or with an individual."

In Re Estate of Sarment, 123 Cal. 331, 55 P. 1015, the Supreme Court, in reversing a judgment allowing interest on funds of the estate, says:

"As he is required by the statute to take into his possession all of the estate of his intestate, and to give bonds for its preservation, it would be inequitable to charge him with interest upon moneys which might at any time be received by him, from the date of their receipt, merely because he had retained them in his possession. * * * The court does not find, nor is there any evidence, that the administrators used the funds of the estate in their own business, or made any profit from their use. The mere fact that one of them mingled the proceeds of the sale with his own funds would not justify charging him with interest thereon, since he had the right to their custody, and there is no provision of law which required him to keep them separate from all other funds." See, also, In re Estate of Mallory, 99 Cal.App. 96, 278 P. 488, to the same effect.

[8] It will thus be seen, that the mere commingling of funds of an estate, with the private funds of an executor, or the retention of the funds in his possession, or the deposit of the same with another, does not of itself make the executor liable to the payment of interest thereon. It must actually appear that he used the money for his own benefit.

[9] Applying these principles of law to the facts in the instant case, we must conclude that the findings of the trial court are supported by the evidence.

For the reasons herein set forth, the order of the trial court settling the final account and the decree of distribution are affirmed. Respondent to recover costs on appeal.

KELSO v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF GLENDALE et al.

Civ. 12189.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 13, 1941.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨79

A city, by adopting a charter, becomes independent of general laws only as to municipal affairs, and in matters of general state concern the general law is paramount. Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8.

2. Schools and school districts ⇐115

The public school system is a matter of general concern and not a "municipal affair", and hence an ordinance was invalid as conflicting with the state law if the ordinance allowed only one month instead of the 90 days limited by statute for the filing of claims for damages against school districts, etc. St.1921, p. 2221, art. 11, § 5; St.1931, p. 2475, § 1; p. 2476; Const. art. 9; art. 11, §§ 6, 8.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Municipal Affair".

3. Counties ⇐24
Municipal corporations ⇐69
Schools and school districts ⇐89

The liability of municipalities, counties, and school districts for tortious acts or omissions of their servants is a matter of general state concern and not a "municipal affair". Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8.

4. Schools and school districts ⇐115

An ordinance requiring the timely presentation of a claim as a condition precedent to an action against the City of Glendale or against any board, commission, officer or employee thereof, does not apply to claims or actions against the Glendale Unified School District, which is a corporate entity distinct from the municipal corporation of Glendale.

5. Schools and school districts ⇐45

A legislative declaration that every incorporated city is a school district does not import into the organization of the school district any of the provisions of the city charter, or limit the powers and functions which, as a school district, it has by virtue of the Political Code.

6. Schools and school districts ⇐115

A city has no power to shorten the time limited by statute for the filing of claims for damages against municipalities, school districts, etc., nor to extend the time fixed by the state law in a matter affecting a school district, since the school district is a separate entity from the city, and is not a "municipal affair", even though occupying exactly or substantially the same territory. St.1931, p. 2475, § 1; Const. art. 9; art. 11, §§ 6, 8.

7. Schools and school districts ⇐115

Members of the board of education of a city are not "city officers" within an ordinance limiting the time for filing claims for damages. St.1921, p. 2221, art. 11, § 5.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "City Officers".

8. Schools and school districts ⇐115

A claim signed by a father and stating that his son named therein, a junior high school student, while leaving school on a certain date at about 3:15 p. m., fell against a century plant on the premises, and that his right eye was punctured and was subsequently removed, and that the son resided with the father at a given address, and that claim was thereby made for a specified amount as damages for the loss of an eye by the son, was sufficient under the statute requiring claims to specify the claimant's name and address, the date and place of the accident, and the extent of the injuries or damages received. St.1931, p. 2475, § 1.

9. Schools and school districts ⇐115

A claim signed and verified by the father, who was described in the verification as the claimant, stating that his son fell against a century plant on the premises of a junior high school and injured his right eye which was subsequently removed, and that claim was thereby made for $25,000 damages for the loss of an eye by the son, was not objectionable as being merely a claim for damages sustained by the father; it being the claim itself rather than the verification which should be looked to.

10. Schools and school districts ⇐89

A board of education or school district, if not liable for injuries to a junior high school student who fell against a century plant on the school premises, would not be liable to compensate his father for any damages sustained by the father.

11. Municipal corporations ⇐812(6)

As regards the sufficiency of a claim for damages against a municipality, etc., in the absence of an intention to mislead, a substantial compliance with the charter requirement is sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. S. Baird, Judge.

Action by Earl C. Kelso, a minor, etc., against the Board of Education of the City of Glendale and others, for injuries caused by falling against a century plant on the premises of a junior high school. The trial court granted a nonsuit on the ground that the claim was not filed within the time prescribed, and from the ensuing judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

W. L. Baugh and Elwood Bowles, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WHITE, Justice.

In an action brought by the minor plaintiff to recover damages for the loss of an eye as a result of his falling against a century plant allegedly maintained in a negligent manner by the defendant school district upon the premises of a junior high school, the trial court, on a stipulated statement of facts, granted a nonsuit upon the ground that the verified claim presented to the defendant school board and school district was not filed within the time prescribed by law, and further, that such claim "was not sufficient in law". From the ensuing judgment that plaintiff take nothing by his complaint, this appeal is prosecuted.

The plaintiff sustained his injuries on November 19, 1936. On or about December 31, 1936, more than one month, but less than ninety days after the date of the injuries, there was presented and filed with defendants a verified claim for damages in words and figures as follows:

"Glendale Unified School District and Board of Education of the City of Glendale,

"411 East Wilson Street,
"Glendale, California
"Gentlemen

"On the 19th day of November, 1936, at about 3:15 P. M., my son, Earl C. Kelso, a student at Wilson Junior High School in Glendale, while leaving school, fell against a century plant which was planted on the side of the pathway leading from the said school to the street. His right eye was punctured and was subsequently removed.

"My son resides with me at 130 North Cedar Street, Glendale, California.

"Claim is hereby made for Twenty-five Thousand Dollars ($25,000.00) as damages for the loss of an eye by said Earl C. Kelso.

"Dated this 31st day of December, 1936.
"(Signed) Claude Kelso."

By the general laws in effect at the time of the accident and when the claim was filed (Stats.1931, p. 2475, § 1; Deering's Gen.Laws, Act 5149; see, also, Stats.1931, p. 2476), it was provided as follows:

"Whenever it is claimed that any person has been injured or any property damaged as a result of the dangerous or defective condition of any public street, highway, building, park, grounds, works or property, a verified claim for damages shall be presented in writing and filed with the clerk or secretary of the legislative body of the municipality, county, city and county, or school district, as the case may be, within ninety days after such accident has occurred. Such claim shall specify the name and address of the claimant, the date and place of the accident and the extent of the injuries or damages received."

There was also in force at all times herein pertinent ordinance No. 1664 of the City of Glendale, providing in section 1 thereof in part as follows:

"No action shall be brought against the City of Glendale, or against any board, commission, officer or employee thereof because of any act omitted or committed by it or him within the scope of its or his employment by the City of Glendale, on any claim or demand for money or damages whether founded in contract or in tort, unless a verified claim in writing therefor shall have been presented to the proper board, commission or officer thereof, as provided by the charter of said City, and to the board, commission, officer or employee against whom it is intended to bring action, within one month from the time of the maturing of the obligation or occurrence of the injury upon which such claim or demand is based, and such claim shall have been rejected in whole or in part.

"If such claim is founded in tort, it shall set forth the name and residence address of the claimant, the nature, extent, date, place and time of injury, and an itemized statement of the damages claimed or demanded. * * *"

It is urged by appellant that the general law allowing ninety days in which to file a claim is applicable in the present case, and that therefore the trial court erred in holding that his cause of action was barred because his claim was not filed within the one-month period prescribed by the ordinance. Respondents' position is that the ordinance is a valid exercise of authority granted by the city charter of the City of Glendale (Stats. 1921, p. 2204), which provides in article

XI, section 5, that "* * * No action shall be brought on any claim or demand for money or damages against the City or any Board, Commission or Officer thereof, until a demand for the same has been presented as provided in this charter or by ordinance and rejected in whole or in part."

[1-3] Respondents' contention in this regard cannot prevail. A city, by adopting a charter, becomes independent of general laws only as to "municipal affairs", and in matters of general state concern the general law is paramount. City of Pasadena v. Charleville, 215 Cal. 384, 10 P.2d 745; Const., art. XI, §§ 6 and 8. And it has been held not only that the public school system is a matter of general concern (Lansing v. Board of Education, 7 Cal.App.2d 211, 45 P.2d 1021; People v. Mertz, 2 Cal.2d 136, 39 P.2d 422; Id., Cal.App., 34 P.2d 726; Esberg v. Badaraco, 202 Cal. 110, 259 P. 730; Vallejo H. S. Dist. v. White, 43 Cal.App. 359, 185 P. 302), but also that the question of the liability of municipalities, counties and school districts for tortious acts or omissions of their servants is not a "municipal affair". Douglass v. City of Los Angeles, 5 Cal.2d 123, 128, 53 P.2d 353. In the last-cited case a claim for damages based on the defective condition of a street was filed with the board of public works and not with the city council as required by statute. It was held that such filing was ineffectual and the action could not be maintained. The court there said (page 128 of 5 Cal.2d, page 355 of 53 P.2d):

"The important question of the liability of municipalities, counties, and school districts for the tortious acts or omissions of their servants is a matter of general state concern, and not, as contended by the plaintiff, a municipal affair. As this point is now regularly raised, we confirm the "foreword" stated by this court in Rafferty v. City of Marysville, 207 Cal. 657, 280 P. 118, that it would be an anomalous situation if a city could, by adopting a freeholders' charter, exclude itself from the operation of a general law of the state imposing a liability on municipalities generally for the negligent acts or omissions of its servants in the maintenance of the public streets, on the theory that such city is independent of general laws in municipal affairs. The question of the safety of public ways is 'a matter of state concern, and the obligation of a city to make its highways reasonably safe for general use cannot be chartered away, even though a municipality should attempt to do so.' Id., 207 Cal. 657, page 665, 280 P. 118, 122."

In Sandstoe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 28 Cal.App.2d 215, 82 P.2d 216, which was a suit against the City of Pasadena for damages resulting from the defective condition of a street, it was held that the act of 1931 allowing ninety days in which to file a claim, and not the requirements of the city charter, "governs the situation".

In Esberg v. Badaraco, supra [202 Cal. 110, 259 P. 732], the Supreme Court, holding that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco was without power to modify the school budget prepared by the board of education, said:

"* * * The school system of the state is a matter of general concern as distinguished from a 'municipal affair,' as that term is considered in connection with charter cities. Article 9 of the organic law of California provides for the establishment of a public school sytem. It is provided in section 1 of that article: 'A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, the Legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement.' Section 5 of the same article provides that: 'The Legislature shall provide for a system of common schools. * * *' Section 6 of the article provides that the Legislature 'shall provide for' the levy of a 'city and county' tax by the board of supervisors for school purposes. By this article of the Constitution the people of the state have made the school system a matter of state supervision, and judicial declarations to the same effect are numerous. [Citing cases.]

"The effect of this framework of laws surrounding and supporting our public school system is that the acts of the Legislature, within constitutional bounds, are controlling over conflicting provisions of freeholders' charters. * * *"

[4] Moreover, even assuming it to be a valid regulation in the case of claims against the City of Glendale or its officers, the ordinance in question does not by its terms cover the situation here, for the present suit is against the Glendale Unified School District, a corporate entity distinct from the municipal corporation of Glendale.

[5] See Ward v. San Diego School Dist., 203 Cal. 712, 265 P. 821, and the authorities therein referred to. In the cited case, quoting from Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 P. 558, 559, it was said: "* * The legislative declaration that every incorporated city is a school district does not import into the organization of the school district any of the provisions of the city charter, or limit the powers and functions which, as a school district, it has, by virtue of the Political Code. The city is a corporation distinct from that of the school district, even though both are designated by the same name, and embrace the same territory. The one derives its authority directly from the legislature, through the general law providing for the establishment of schools throughout the state, while the authority of the other is found in the charter under which it is organized; and, even though the charter may purport to define the powers and duties of its municipal officers in reference to the public schools in the same language as has the legislature in the Political Code, yet these powers and duties are referable to the legislative authority, and not to the charter. * * *"

[6] To us the conclusion seems inevitable that so far as the provisions of the city ordinance impair or abridge the time fixed by the general law of the state for filing such claims, such provisions of the ordinance are invalid, because of their conflict with the state law. We further hold that the city is without power to shorten the time within which to file claims under the state law in matters of this kind, just as it is without power by charter or ordinance to extend the time fixed by the state law in a matter affecting school districts, which are, without doubt, of general state concern and not "municipal affairs".

[7] Not only is the school district a separate entity from the city, but upon the authority of Ward v. San Diego School District, supra, it must be held that the members of the board of education are not "city officers", and hence, whether the suit be deemed one against the district or one against the members of the board of education, the city ordinance has no application.

[8-10] It is next contended that the trial court erred in holding that appellant's claim "was not sufficient in law". In this contention appellant must be upheld. The requirements of the statute are that the claim specify the "name and address of the claimant, the date and place of the accident and the extent of the injuries or damages received". These requirements are fully met by the filed claim here in question. But it is urged by respondents that the claim does not designate the injured plaintiff as the claimant, but rather purports to be a claim for damages sustained by his father, Claude Kelso, for the reason that the verification is by the father, who is described therein as the "claimant". The claim, say respondents, would support an action by the father for damages sustained by him alone, but affords no basis for an action by the son. This contention cannot be sustained. We think it is the claim itself that should be looked to, rather than the verification. The claim itself shows clearly enough that the son is the claimant. It is stated therein that the son was injured, his place of residence being given, and that "claim is hereby made for Twenty-five Thousand dollars ($25,000.00) as damages for the loss of an eye by said Earl C. Kelso". It would strain one's imagination to suppose that the board could have been led to believe that a claim for $25,000 was for damages sustained by the father alone. In making their concession that the claim as filed would have supported an action by appellant's father for such damages as he might have suffered personally as a result of the accident, respondents argue that in considering the claim for allowance or rejection they were only interested in whatever liability they owed to the father and were not concerned with any liability to the injured minor child. It is then admitted by respondents that the law requiring a claim to be filed as a condition precedent to bringing a suit against public entities, boards, commissions, etc., is simply to enable such public officials to make a proper investigation concerning the merits of the claim and to settle it without the expense of a lawsuit, if settlement should be shown to be proper. It is at once apparent that before the defendants could determine the presence or absence of any liability upon their part to the injured boy's father, they would of necessity have to determine the existence of any primary liability to the injured minor. If they owed the latter no obligation by way of compensation, then of course, no liability to the father would attach.

[11] It is the law that in the absence of an intention to mislead, a "substantial compliance with the charter requirement is sufficient". Sandstoe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. [28 Cal.App.2d 215, 82 P.2d 221], supra. The claim filed in the instant case certainly meets the requirements enunciated in Wagner v. City of Seattle, 84 Wash. 275, 146 P. 621, Ann.Cas.1916E, 720, and quoted with approval in Uttley v. City of Santa Ana, 136 Cal.App. 23, 28 P.2d 377, 379, as follows: "When, therefore, there is no evident intention to mislead, but a bona fide attempt to comply with the law, the notice is sufficient in the absence of any evidence that it did in fact mislead." In our opinion, the claim filed herein did not in any wise mislead respondents, but on the contrary, indicated without equivocation that it was filed for and on behalf of the minor child who sustained the injuries in question, and it certainly gave the respondents full opportunity to investigate the merits thereof. In the method pursued in the instant case, in the filing of appellant's claim, the respondents were not prejudiced or misled in any manner, and the claim must therefore be held to be sufficient.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ZIMMER v. GORELNIK et al.

Civ. 11538.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 15, 1941.

1. Action ⇐6

Under statute authorizing actions for declaratory relief, an action may be maintained as to controversies relating to oral contracts and obligations. Code Civ.Proc. § 1060 et seq.

2. Action ⇐6

A proceeding for declaratory relief is a "proceeding in equity". Code Civ.Proc. § 1060 et seq.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Proceeding in Equity".

3. Equity ⇐39(1)

When a court of equity assumes jurisdiction of an equitable controversy, it will seek to administer complete relief and make a final disposition of litigation.

4. Action ⇐6

Where plaintiff and defendant entered into written partnership contract under which parties agreed to engage in business and proper method of division of profits was in dispute, plaintiff was entitled to declaratory relief, whether upon theory that parties were partners, or joint adventurers, or that defendant held profits as trustee for plaintiff. Code Civ.Proc. § 1060 et seq.

5. Action ⇐6

That plaintiff designated complaint as one in declaratory relief did not bar right to a declaration of respective rights of plaintiff and defendant concerning division of profits in connection with business operations of parties so long as plaintiff pleaded facts entitling him to equitable relief. Code Civ.Proc. § 1060 et seq.

6. Judgment ⇐252(1)

When a party comes into equity pleading facts which may entitle him to some equitable relief, the court will assume jurisdiction of entire controversy and grant relief which proof warrants though it may not be the same as that prayed for.

7. Action ⇐6

In suit for declaratory relief as to respective rights of plaintiff and defendant concerning division of profits in connection with business operations under a written contract, where plaintiff claimed that parties had operated as partners or joint adventurers, refusal to permit plaintiff to prove a subsequent oral contract under which plaintiff claimed certain rights and which contract was denied by answer was error. Code Civ. Proc. § 1060 et seq.

8. Action ⇐6

Where admitted facts in suit for declaratory relief showed that plaintiff was entitled to some relief, statute authorizing trial court to refuse to exercise powers to grant declaratory relief where a declaration is not necessary or proper was inapplicable. Code Civ.Proc. § 1060 et seq., and § 1061.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Suit by Max Zimmer against Hyman Gorelnik and another for declaratory relief as to the respective rights of plaintiff and defendant Hyman Gorelnik concerning division of profits of a business on the theory that they were operating as partners or joint adventurers. From a judgment that plaintiff was entitled to no relief and that a written contract between the parties was void for uncertainty, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Biby & Biby and John E. Biby, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff sued for declaratory relief as to the respective rights of himself and defendant Hyman Gorelnik concerning the division of profits in connection with business operations of the two on the theory that they were operating as partners or joint adventurers. The trial resulted in a judgment that plaintiff was not entitled to any relief. The controversies between the parties arise out of a written contract under which they began their business associations some time in August, 1935. The plaintiff alleged that, while operating under that contract, the parties orally agreed to continue similar business connections in accordance with some of the terms of the contract relating to the division of profits. These allegations the trial court refused to let the plaintiff prove on the theory that the court was without jurisdiction to determine a controversy involving a disputed oral contract. It then found that all these allegations were untrue. In denying plaintiff any relief the court also held that the written contract was void for uncertainty.

The written contract reads as follows:

"Agreement

"This Agreement made and entered into in duplicate this —— day of August, 1935, by and between Hyman Gorelnik, party of the first part, and Max Zimmer, party of the second part, both parties being of the City and County of Los Angeles, State of California.

"Witnesseth:

"That Whereas, the parties are now in the process of purchasing premises situated at the intersection of Virgil and Normal Avenues, in the City and County of Los Angeles, State of California, for the purpose of constructing thereon a market building; and described as the E 120' of Lots 1, 2 and 3, excepting the S 2' of the E 120' of Lot 3, Tract 1458;

"Whereas, it is the further desire of the parties hereto to form the Virgil Investment Company, a corporation, and that they are now in the process of forming such corporation for the purpose of conducting the construction and maintenance thereof; and

"Whereas, the party of the first part will invest in the venture the sum of Eight Thousand Dollars, ($8,000.00), and the party of the second part will invest in the venture the sum of One Thousand Dollars ($1,000.00);

"Now Therefore, for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained, it is mutually agreed as follows:

"1. That the parties hereto shall draw a salary, as managers of the enterprise, on the following basis commencing with the completion of the market building: The party of the first part to receive the sum of Three Hundred Thirty-three and 33/100 Dollars ($333.33) and the party of the second part to receive the sum of One Hundred Sixty six and 67/00 Dollars ($166.67), as wages per month, provided, however, that in the event there is not sufficient net profit in any month or months to pay unto the parties such salaries, then in that event they will receive as salaries during such month or months on the following basis: Two-third (2/3rds) of the net income to be paid to the party of the first part, and one-third (1/3rd) of the net income to the party of the second part.

"2. In the event a bona fide offer in the sum of Thirty One Thousand Dollars ($31,000.00) or more is offered for the premises the same shall be sold if either of the parties hereto desire it to be sold, and the proceeds thereof to be divided in the following manner, to wit:

"a. There shall first be deducted from the said sale price the total investment, which said sum shall be divided between the parties hereto in the following manner: eight-ninths (8/9ths) thereof to the party of the first part, and one-ninth (1/9th) thereof to the party of the second part.

"b. Of the sum in excess of the total net investment the same shall be divided in the following manner: two-thirds (2/3rds) to the party of the first part and one-third (1/3rd) to the party of the second part.

"3. In the event of dissolution or final winding up of the affairs, a division of the assets thereof shall be had on the same basis as set forth in sub-sections a and b of paragraph 2 hereof.

"In the event shares of stock be issued in the corporation to be formed, to either of the parties hereto, such party will not offer his share nor any portion thereof for sale to anyone before having first offered in writing the said shares to the other party at the reasonable market value thereof, and the other party shall have thirty (30) days within which time to accept and purchase the same.

"In the event of the death of either of the parties hereto, the other shall immediately proceed with the dissolution and winding up of the affairs of the business.

"It is understood that a contract is contemplated between the corporation to be formed, to wit, Virgil Investment Company as owner and Hyman Gorelnik and the Zimmer Construction Company as contractors wherein the latter will construct a building according to plans and specifications to be submitted and in furtherance thereof the parties hereto agree to execute and sign all documents and papers which may be necessary or expedient thereto; losses, if any, to be borne 2/3rds by the first party and 1/3rd by second party.

"In Witness Whereof, the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands, the day and year in this instrument first above written.

"(Signed) Hyman Gorelnik
"Party of the first part

"(Signed) Max Zimmer
"Party of the second part".

The plaintiff alleged and proved that in full accord with the terms of the contract the parties formed the corporation, constructed the Virgil street building, operated it for a time, and divided some of the profits of operation. In April, 1937, this property was sold for $31,500 and part of the proceeds of operation, together with other money advanced by the respective parties, and money borrowed on their joint obligations, was used in the purchase of a lot on Sunset boulevard and in the construction of a building thereon. These transactions were all made in the name of the Virgil Investment Company, but the plaintiff alleged, and attempted to prove, that the corporation was but the alter ego of the partners and that the entire investment in the Sunset property was preceded by the oral agreement of the parties that the operations should be conducted, and the profits should be divided in some respects similar to the manner stipulated in the written contract.

In denying plaintiff the right to prove the alleged oral contract the trial court was in error. The ruling was based upon the holding in Transport Oil Co. v. Bush, 114 Cal.App. 152, 1 P.2d 1060, but, as we will point out hereafter, that case is no longer an authority on that subject. It should be said at this point, however, that there is considerable authority in other jurisdictions in accord with the rule of the Bush case, but it would serve no useful purpose to go into foreign fields of authority when the entire subject matter is covered by our legislative enactments.

Actions for declaratory relief are authorized in this state by section 1060 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1060 reads in part: "Any person interested under a * * * written instrument, or under a contract, or who desires a declaration of his rights or duties with respect to another, or in respect to, in, over or upon property, * * * may, in cases of actual controversy relating to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties, bring an action in the superior court for a declaration of his rights and duties in the premises, including a determination of any question of construction or validity arising under such instrument or contract. He may ask for a declaration of rights or duties, either alone or with other relief; * * *."

[1] It should be noted that the legislature used the word "or" after the word "instrument", and again after the word "contract"; that it did not use the word "written" before the word "contract"; and that the clause reading: "or who desires a declaration of his rights or duties with respect to another, or in respect to, in, over or upon property" begins with the word "or"; and also that this clause is not tied in to any reference to a written instrument, or to a contract, or to any kind of a written document. The language of the statute is plain and does not call for judicial construction or interpretation. Notwithstanding the early rulings of the common-law courts limiting the right of action to written instruments our statute clearly broadens the scope of the action to cover controversies relating to oral contracts and obligations. And we must take the law as we find it.

In Transport Oil Co. v. Bush, supra, 114 Cal.App. at pages 161, 162, 1 P.2d at page 1064, the court reached the opposite conclusion, saying: "The question arises, must the contract sought to be construed be in the form of an instrument in writing? Is it within the contemplation of the section that testimony shall be taken to establish an oral contract, and then pronounce judgment construing the same and declaring the intent and purpose of the parties as found in such contract? While the language of the section, literally construed, would include an oral contract, a careful consideration of all the words preceding the word 'contract' leads us to the conclusion that the portion of the section quoted and relied upon in this action must be held to refer only to a contract that is in writing, to a contract the terms of which are fixed and definite and not depending upon the oral declarations of witnesses or the memory of the parties as to the language used by them in entering into an agreement." But in Tolle v. Struve, 124 Cal.App. 263, 12 P.2d 61, the court declined to follow the rule of the Bush case, relying upon the authority of Hess v. Country Club Park, 213 Cal. 613, 2 P.2d 782, and in Herrlein v. Tocchini, 128 Cal. App. 612, 18 P.2d 73, it was said that the language quoted from the Bush case was dicta, and not controlling. In Wollenberg v. Tonningsen, 8 Cal.App.2d 722, 48 P.2d 738, 742, the court, without reference to the Bush case, held that the remedy under the statute was not limited to a written instrument. In Hamilton Corp., Ltd. v. Corum, 218 Cal. 92, 95, 21 P.2d 413, 414, the Supreme Court dismissed the subject with the direct statement that "it has been already decided that in such actions the court may determine disputed questions of fact. Hess v. Country Club Park, 213 Cal. 613, 2 P.2d 782; Herrlein v. Tocchini [128 Cal.App. 612], 18 P.2d 73. Appellant's argument is concluded by the cited cases."

Though we have found no California case which expressly overrules the Bush case, those cited reject the doctrine either by referring to it as dicta, or by making no reference to it. It must be apparent that the reasoning upon which the rule was based is not in harmony with the code section. It would be more precise to say that the conclusion is based upon the false premise that, in a proceeding of this nature, the court is without power to determine "disputed questions of fact". That this is a false premise we need to refer only to Hamilton Corp. v. Corum, supra. Acting upon this premise the trial court ruled, in line with numerous cases cited by respondent, that it was without power to take any evidence tending to prove the existence of the alleged oral contract because that contract was denied in the answer. If the premise were sound, it would of course apply equally to a written contract if its existence is denied. The fact of the execution of a contract and its existence or present force should not be confused. Here the plaintiff sought to prove that an oral contract was executed under which he claimed some legal rights which he asked the court to determine and declare. Precisely the same proof would be necessary in a suit founded upon a written instrument. He was stopped with the objection that the evidence "would tend to prove the existence of a disputed oral contract and that it is not within the jurisdiction of this court to determine whether an oral contract does exist, and then construe it". This objection was sustained as well as that made to an offer of proof upon the same subject matter.

The error of the ruling is based upon the doctrine of the Bush case which, in turn, is based upon authorities from other jurisdictions holding that the court is without power to determine "disputed questions of fact". Though this rule would foreclose consideration of all disputed questions of fact the courts for some reason have limited it to an oral contract—and have held that the proceeding will not lie when such a contract is involved even though its existence is not disputed. Hence, by putting one false premise upon another, a conclusion has been reached which is neither sound nor reasonable. There is no escape from the conclusion that, if as stated in Hamilton Corp. v. Corum, supra, the court may determine disputed questions of fact, it has the power to take evidence of the existence of the contract upon which the asserted rights are based, and that, so far as our code section is concerned, it makes no difference whether such contract be written or oral. See Borchard on Declaratory Judgments, pp. 409, 410, where later English cases are cited involving oral contracts. Also 16 Am. Jur., p. 294; 8 Cal.Jur.Supp. pp. 110–112.

[2-6] These conclusions may be placed upon another principle which is equally controlling. The proceeding in declaratory relief is one in equity. The complaint pleaded facts sufficient of which were admitted to entitle plaintiff to some relief. It is the settled rule that, when a court of equity assumes jurisdiction of an equitable controversy, it will seek to administer complete relief and make a final disposition of the litigation. 19 Am.Jur., p. 281. The record discloses a partnership contract in writing under which the parties agreed to engage in business under the corporate entity over which they had absolute control. The complaint, which was filed on January 6, 1938, joined the corporation as a party defendant. Upon evidence taken the trial court found that prior to the commencement of the action and on December 27, 1937, the corporation had been dissolved by the defendants. During the trial it developed that the operation and sale of the Virgil street property resulted in a profit of about $7,500 and that the profit on the Sunset property was about $14,000. These profits not having been distributed, and the proper method of division being in dispute, the plaintiff was entitled to a declaration of the rights and duties of the respective parties whether upon the theory that they were partners, or joint adventurers, or that the defendants held as trustees for the plaintiff. The respondent argues that the written contract was void because uncertain in the paragraph relating to division of the net profits. If so the uncertainty might have been cleared by the oral contract which plaintiff sought to prove. All these considerations are elements of equity and proper subjects for determination in a court of equity. To restate the proposition: it is of no matter that the plaintiff designated his complaint as one in declaratory relief so long as he has pleaded facts which would entitle him to equitable relief. When a party comes into a court of equity pleading facts which may entitle him to some equitable relief the court will assume jurisdiction of the entire controversy and grant the relief which the proof warrants though it may not be the same as that prayed for. Brown v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist., 183 Cal. 186, 190 P. 797; Zellner v. Wassman, 184 Cal. 80, 193 P. 84; Bank of America, etc., Ass'n v. Gillett, 36 Cal.App.2d 453, 97 P.2d 875.

[7, 8] For the reasons given the court erred when it denied plaintiff the right to prove the oral contract, and when it dismissed the action without giving plaintiff the relief which the facts disclosed he was entitled to. We do not discuss the other points raised except to add that this is not a case for the application of section 1061, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing the trial court to refuse to exercise the powers where a declaration is not necessary or proper. Because the admitted facts are that the plaintiff was entitled to some relief over which the parties are in controversy a declaration was both necessary and proper. Hence, the case comes squarely within the rule of Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irr. Dist., 207 Cal. 215, 277 P. 487.

The judgment is reversed.

This appeal transferred from the Supreme Court to this court for decision, pursuant to the provisions of article VI of section 4c of the Constitution of the State of California, is from an order of the superior court sitting in probate admitting a document to probate as the last will and testament of decedent.

The essential facts are:

August 2, 1938, Harvey F. Kenyon died, a resident of the county of Los Angeles, leaving a document entitled Last Will and Testament, signed by said decedent, dated August 15, 1933, subscribed by two witnesses, which purported to be the last will and testament of decedent.

Respondent, Edith M. Kenyon, offered the following document as the last will and testament of decedent, and it was admitted to probate as such:

"Yours Truly
"HARVEY F. KENYON."

In addition to the above documents there was received in evidence testimony of a Mrs. Salisbury to the effect that decedent had told her on numerous occasions that he had a will deeding his property to his two granddaughters Marjorie and Grace and that he wanted them to have all of his property, and that he asked her on one occasion if she would be the executrix of his estate if he made a new will.

The trial court found "that it [the letter dated March 4, 1938, supra] was of testamentary character and intended to bequeath his [decedent's] entire estate to said granddaughters, and that said letter constituted an olographic will."

This is the question for us to determine:

Was there substantial evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court, supra?

This question must be answered in the negative. The law is established in California by a long line of decisions that before a document may be admitted to probate as the last will and testament of decedent, in addition to meeting all other legal requirements, there must be substantial evidence that the decedent intended the very document which is offered as his last will and testament to be such and to make disposition by it of his property in favor of the party claiming thereunder (In re Estate of Button, 209 Cal. 325, 331, 287 P. 964; In re Estate of Dotta, 18 Cal.App.2d 763, 764, 64 P.2d 741).

[2, 3] The law is also established that, where from the evidence either of two inferences reasonably may be drawn, the one accepted by the trial court to support a finding of fact will not be disturbed by an appellate court (In re Estate of Hathaway, 38 Cal.App.2d 526, 101 P.2d 741). However, this rule presupposes that the inference drawn from the evidence finds reasonable support therein.

[4] Applying the test as stated in this rule to the facts of the instant case, we are of the opinion that neither from the document which has been admitted to probate as the last will and testament of decedent nor from any facts received in evidence could the conclusion reasonably be drawn that the decedent intended it to be of testamentary character. The letter of decedent offered as a will, discussing divers and sundry topics from blooming peach trees to "Old Age Recovery", has none of the earmarks of an holographic will. Only incidentally does he mention the relatives who desire, by his letter, to acquire his estate. The testimony of witness Salisbury, who related a conversation with decedent in which the latter is said to have stated that he had willed his estate to certain relatives, is insufficient evidence of animus testandi to create a will out of a gossipy letter to a frequent correspondent.

The cases cited by respondent, such as In re Estate of Spitzer, 196 Cal. 301, 237 P. 739, are all factually distinguishable from the case which we are now considering.

Therefore, the finding here questioned is unsupported by the evidence.

For the foregoing reasons the order is reversed, appellant to recover his costs.

MOORE, P. J., and WOOD, J., concurred.

ELLIOTT v. McCOMBS et al.

L. A. 16547.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 16, 1941.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Feb. 13, 1941.

1. Deeds ⇐124(1)

In a grant of realty, it is presumed that grantor intended to convey a fee simple title unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended. Civ.Code, § 1105.

2. Easements ⇐1

In determining whether deed excepts strip of land from conveyance or conveys fee simple with reservation, a grant of land "to be used for a road" may be entirely consistent with conveyance of a fee-simple title, but a grant of land for purposes of "right of way" for a road recognizes nothing but an easement. Civ.Code, § 1105.

3. Easements ⇐14(2)

Deed conveying land except 60-foot strip reserved for road purposes conveyed a fee-simple title to grantee with the reservation of an easement on part of grantor. Civ.Code, § 1105.

4. Easements ⇐14(1)

A reservation of an easement must be to the grantor or to the grantor's property and cannot be made to a stranger to the deed.

5. Easements ⇐3(1)

Where language of deed is ambiguous and it does not clearly appear whether easement reserved was intended to be in gross or appurtenant to the land, the easement will not be construed as personal to grantor where it may fairly be construed as appurtenant to some other estate.

6. Easements ⇐36(2)

In ascertaining grantor's intention as to whether easement reserved is in gross or appurtenant to the land, the nature of the easement may be determined by evidence outside the deed, in absence of an express declaration.

7. Easements ⇐3(1)

An easement reserved in deed may be appurtenant to the land and not personal to grantor even though deed does not expressly declare it to be so, and the law favors such an interpretation.

8. Easements ⇐3(2)

The benefit of reservation of easement for road purposes in deed would not be construed as having been intended to be personal to grantor rather than appurtenant to the land merely because there was nothing in deed to indicate a contrary intention.

9. Easements ⇐3(2)

In determining whether a land company's deeds reserving strips of land for road purposes created easements in gross or appurtenant to the land, a road is primarily laid out for the benefit of adjoining landowners.

10. Easements ⇐3(2)

Where parcels sold by land company along median line running through tract bounded by four streets each contained 10 or 20 acres and plaintiff's parcel abutting on the line bordered on no main street, reservations of 30-foot strips of land for road purposes in deeds conveying each of the parcels were intended to create easements "appurtenant" to the land and to provide 60-foot road for benefit of adjoining landowners, and not an "easement in gross" personal to land company.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Appurtenant" and "Easement in Gross".

11. Easements ⇐1

The principles governing "equitable servitudes", which are equitable in nature, are not applicable to an "easement", which is an incorporeal interest in the servient estate.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Easement" and "Equitable Servitudes".

12. Easements ⇐1

An "easement" creates an interest in the land which gives a privilege to a particular person or owner of property to enjoy a right over the property of another.

13. Easements ⇐1

An "easement" can only be created by grant or by implication or prescription, and not by parol.

14. Easements ⇐1

In action to quiet title to easement over defendant's property, where plaintiff's cause of action depended upon rights created in favor of common grantor by deed to defendant's predecessor reserving strip of land for road purposes, to which rights plaintiff succeeded as subsequent owner of adjoining property, plaintiff was not required to show that each deed made by common grantor conveying property abutting on the road contained similar reservations, as against contention that easement could not be enforced for want of mutuality of benefits in the adjoining landowners.

15. Specific performance ⇐65

A contract for the sale of realty may be specifically enforced by the purchaser

16. Equity ⇐57

Vendor and purchaser ⇐54

Equity regards purchaser of realty under contract of sale to be the owner, on theory that equity regards as done that which ought to be done.

17. Vendor and purchaser ⇐54

The vendor of realty under contract of sale who retains legal title as security for payment of purchase price has no greater rights than he would possess if he had conveyed the realty and taken back a mortgage, and the vendee, particularly after he goes into possession of the realty under an executory contract, is for all purposes the owner and vendor retains mere legal title.

18. Easements ⇐3(2)

Where vendee took possession in 1919 under executory contract of sale reserving easement appurtenant to land for road purposes and plaintiff's predecessor acquired adjoining land thereafter but before vendor executed deed to vendee in 1922 in fulfillment of the contract, the vendee in possession was equitable owner and the easement was created and attached to adjoining land before adjoining land was acquired by plaintiff's predecessor, hence easement could be enforced by plaintiff against vendee's successor in interest.

19. Judgment ⇐632

Default judgment obtained in quiet title action against grantor by purchaser of land under deed reserving easement in a strip of the land for road purposes did not bind adjoining landowner who was not a party to the quiet title action and who subsequently sought to enforce the easement.

20. Easements ⇐26(1)

Where original grantor's deed reserved an easement in a strip of the land sold for road purposes for benefit of adjoining property, and original grantee conveyed land to defendant with no reservation of a right of way, subsequent deed from original grantor to defendant quitclaiming the strip of land did not terminate adjoining property owner's easement to the right of way appurtenant to her land.

21. Easements ⇐61(2, 12)

Where original grantor's deed reserved an easement for road purposes for benefit of adjoining property subsequently acquired by plaintiff and original grantee conveyed land to defendant with no reservation of a right of way, plaintiff was entitled to judgment quieting her title to the use for road purposes of the reserved strip of defendant's land as a right of way appurtenant to plaintiff's land, and was entitled to injunction against interference with that use.

22. Easements ⇐3(2)

Where at time land company's deed was made reserving for road purposes a strip of the land sold to defendant's predecessor the company had already conveyed the other parcels which would benefit by the road, the reservation could not have been made for benefit of such other parcels but, in order to give the reservation effect, it would be construed as an "easement in gross". Civ.Code, § 3541.

23. Easements ⇐44(1)

Provision in deed reserving for road purposes a strip of the land conveyed would be presumed to have been made to carry out some purpose, and an interpretation which would give effect to the provision was preferred to one which would make it void. Civ. Code, § 3541.

24. Easements ⇐24, 61(2, 12)

Where land company reserved easement in gross in strip of land for road purposes in deed to defendant's predecessor in interest and subsequently conveyed its rights to the easement in and over defendant's land to adjoining landowner, the adjoining landowner thereby acquired title to the right of way and was entitled to judgment quieting that title and enjoining interference with her use of the road over defendant's property.

HOUSER, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Action by Besse C. Elliott against Virgil McCombs and others, to quiet title to an easement and right of way and to enjoin interference with plaintiff's use thereof. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

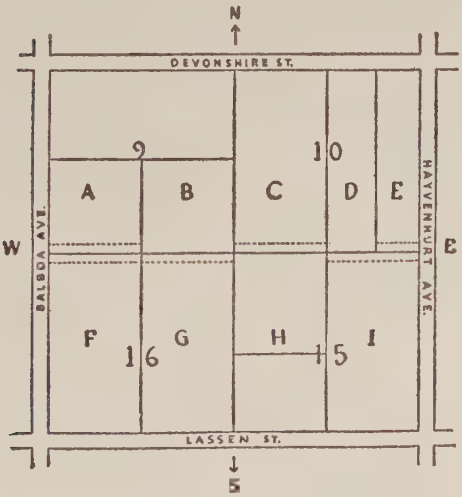
For prior opinion, see 100 P.2d 499.



Wm. H. B. Haymond, Herbert L. Iasigi, and Judd Downing, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John J. Craig, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

EDMONDS, Justice.

It was successfully asserted in the trial court that a right of way for road purposes was granted under deeds made by a common predecessor in interest of the parties to this action. By the terms of the decree appealed from the respondent's title and right to the use of a strip of land is quieted against the appellants and the latter are enjoined from interfering with such use.

The controversy concerns land within the area bounded by the four streets shown on the diagram, all of which was acquired by San Fernando Mission Land Company many years ago under a deed which described it as lots 9, 10, 15 and 16 according to a map of record. Deeds of the land company have conveyed portions of these lots, designated on the diagram by letters, by metes and bounds. This action was commenced by the respondent, as the owner of parcel B, to quiet title to an easement and right of way over the north 30 feet of parcels F and G and the south 30 feet of parcel A.

Pursuant to the requirements of a contract of sale made in 1919, the terms of which are not disclosed, by a deed dated June 20, 1922, the land company conveyed parcel A "except the south 30 feet thereof reserved for road purposes" and parcel F "except the north 30 feet thereof reserved for road purposes" to one Rice, appellant Virgil McCombs' immediate grantor. Some years later Rice commenced an action against the land company and, in 1930, secured a decree by default quieting his title to this land, including that part of each parcel which had been reserved for road purposes. At the time that action was filed, the land company had conveyed all of its interest in the property shown on the diagram except that reserved for road purposes. On May 22, 1930, the date of the decree quieting Rice's title, there was recorded a deed made by him conveying parcels A and F to appellant Virgil McCombs with no reservation of a right of way.

In 1922, the land company conveyed parcels B and H to Title Guarantee and Trust Company without reservation or any mention of the rights of way reserved in its deed to parcels A and F. Later, Title Guarantee and Trust Company conveyed parcel B, reserving the south 30 feet for road purposes. The respondent acquired title to this parcel by mesne conveyances containing the same reservation. Parcel H was also conveyed by the land company's grantee with a reservation of the right to use the north 30 feet for road purposes.

The land of appellant Eva McCombs is parcel G, which was conveyed by the land company in 1923 with a reservation of the north 30 feet for road purposes. She acquired title by a deed containing the same reservation.

All of the other parcels shown on the diagram were conveyed by the land company in earlier years. Parcel I was deeded in 1920 subject to a reservation of the north 30 feet for road purposes. However, in 1926 the land company executed a deed to the then owner quitclaiming any interest in this land. The deed to parcel D was made in 1921 without reservation. In the same year it conveyed parcels C and E by deeds reserving for road purposes the south 30 feet of the land described.

Two days before the present action was commenced, the land company and Title Guarantee and Trust Company executed various deeds quitclaiming the south 30 feet of parcels A, B, C, D, and E, and the north 30 feet of parcels F, G, H, and I to the owners of parcels abutting therein. These two corporations also separately executed deeds, bearing the same date, quitclaiming to the owners of abutting parcels all right, title and interest in and to an easement for road purposes in and over the south 30 feet of parcels A, B, C, D, and E and the north 30 feet of parcels F, G, H and I.

The trial court found that it was the intention of the land company "to create a right of way for road purposes sixty feet in width * * * connecting the roadways * * * known as Hayvenhurst Avenue and Balboa Avenue * * *; that for several years prior to the commencement of this action said sixty-foot strip between lots 10 and 15 has been used for road purposes by the owners of property abutting thereon * * * and others who chose to use the same, and that said strip is now a well-defined roadway; that at the time the defendants acquired title to their properties said strip was being so used. * * *" That as to parcels A and F owned by Virgil McCombs "there was no user of that portion of the sixty-foot strip and right of way for road purposes * * *"; that all of the grantees mentioned in the deeds of the 60-foot strip across the entire quarter section, dated October 24, 1936, from the land company to the title company, are the owners of "some parcel of property abutting upon said easement for road purposes, and that collectively they own all of such abutting property"; that "at the time defendants acquired their respective properties, that they had such constructive notice as was given by the public records that a reservation for road purposes, sixty feet in width lying between lots 9 and 10 on the north, and lots 15 and 16 on the south, was reserved for road purposes * * *; that at the time San Fernando Mission Land Company, a corporation, had divested itself of all interest in * * * [the land shown on the diagram] except its interest in said sixty-foot reservation for road purposes * * *."

The appellants contend that the reservation in some, but not all, of the deeds made by the land company did not operate to reserve, for the mutual benefit of all adjoining parcels, the use of the strip of land which is in controversy. Furthermore, declare appellants, the trial court erred in its conclusion of law that the judgment secured by Rice against the land company did not terminate the easement claimed by the respondent, and at the time of the conveyance to them they had no actual or constructive notice of an easement over their land for the benefit of adjoining land.

Respondent, in support of the judgment, urges that the language used in the deed from the land company to Rice states exceptions and not reservations; therefore, the 60-foot strip of land was not conveyed. Title to this strip, she insists, remained in the land company, subject to the vested and irrevocable right in Rice and his successors in interest to use it for road purposes.

[1-3] In a grant of real property it is presumed that the grantor intended to convey a fee simple title unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended. Civ.Code, § 1105. And as the court said in Parks v. Gates, 186 Cal. 151, 155, 199 P. 40, 42, "there is a vast difference between a grant for purposes of 'right of way' for a road and a grant of land 'to be used for a road'. The latter grant may be entirely consistent with the conveyance of a fee-simple title, as a road may be maintained as readily on land held in fee as under an easement, but the grant of land as a right of way recognizes nothing but an easement." This rule was applied in Cooper v. Selig, 48 Cal.App. 228, 191 P. 983, where the court construed a deed conveying land to the city of Los Angeles for the purposes of a public road as passing the fee simple title. Under the same principle of construction, the language in the deed of the land company to Rice conveyed a fee simple title to him with the reservation of an easement on the part of the grantor. See Winston v. Johnson, 42 Minn. 398, 45 N.W. 958; Coon v. Sonoma, etc., Co., 182 Cal. 597, 189 P. 271; Las Posas Water Co. v. Ventura, 97 Cal.App. 296, 275 P. 817.

[4] The next question is whether this easement is in gross or appurtenant to the land. A reservation, of course, must be to the grantor, or to the grantor's property, and cannot be made to a stranger to the deed. Butler v. Gosling, 130 Cal. 422, 62 P. 596; Beardslee v. New Berlin Light, etc., Co., 207 N.Y. 34, 100 N.E. 434, Ann. Cas.1914B, 1287; Simmons v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 88 Wash. 384, 153 P. 321, 155 P. 1039, Ann.Cas.1918C, 1184. Here again, the answer requires an interpretation of the deed. The appellants contend that no mutuality of benefit for adjoining parcels can be inferred from the language of the reservations, and that as the deeds do not declare that the reservations are for the benefit of the adjoining parcels, they were intended to be personal to the grantor. Further, declare the appellants, assuming that the land company intended the reservations for the benefit of the adjoining parcels, as the grantees of parcels conveyed with reservations have no right of way over parcels deeded free of reservations, there is no mutuality of benefit in the adjoining landowners, and therefore the easement may not be enforced.

[5-8] This argument is based upon two misconceptions. The first is the appellants' assumption that the benefit of the reservations was intended to be personal to the grantor because there is nothing to indicate a contrary intention. However, when the language of a deed is ambiguous, and it does not clearly appear whether the easement was intended to be in gross or appurtenant to land, it is never construed as personal when it may fairly be construed as appurtenant to some other estate. Hopper v. Barnes, 113 Cal. 636, 45 P. 874; Eastman v. Piper, 68 Cal.App. 554, 229 P. 1002; Nay v. Bernard, 40 Cal.App. 364, 180 P. 827; 19 C.J. 869. The cases which apply this rule also hold that in ascertaining the intention of the grantor, as in any other contract, in the absence of an express declaration, the nature of the easement may be determined by evidence aliunde the deed. An easement, therefore, may be appurtenant although the deed does not expressly declare it to be so, and the law favors such an interpretation.

[9, 10] The evidence shows that the land company, in selling portions of lots 9, 10, 15 and 16, reserved a 30-foot strip for road purposes in six of the nine conveyances of land along an east-west median line. From this and other evidence the trial court was justified in finding that it intended to provide a 60-foot road from Balboa avenue to Hayvenhurst avenue. And a road is primarily laid out for the benefit of the adjoining land owners. It must be remembered that the purpose of the land company was to sell the property which it had acquired as lots 9, 10, 15 and 16, and that it would have no use for an easement in gross. On the contrary, the logical purpose of the grantor in reserving an easement would be to give grantees of land bordering upon the east-west median line of the tract offered for sale an outlet from their property at that point. Parcels A, B, D, E and H each contain approximately 10 acres and the other parcels about 20 acres each. The owners of land having that amount of acreage could well use and might reasonably require access to their land by means other than the public streets shown on the diagram. The only logical conclusion to be drawn from these facts is that the easements were created for the benefit of the adjacent property.

More particularly, the evidence compels the conclusion that the easement was for the benefit of the land later acquired by the respondent. This property borders on no main street, and its only means of access is along the median east-west line. The nearest street to this land is Balboa avenue to the west, which can only be reached by passing over parcel A or F or both. Certainly no property owned by the land company at the time it sold parcels A and F to Rice could have been more clearly intended to receive the benefits of the easement then reserved than the land owned by the respondent.

[11-14] In urging that this conclusion is erroneous because there was no mutuality in the provisions of the various deeds, the appellants have misconceived the nature of the interests created. They insist that the rule stated in Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 183 P. 945, is controlling. It concerns equitable servitudes in land and restrictive covenants which are equitable in nature. An easement, on the other hand, creates an interest in the land. Eastman v. Piper, supra; Gale on Easements, 9th Ed., p. 7. It is an interest which gives a privilege to a particular person or owner of property to enjoy a right over the property of another. Jones on Easements, pp. 1 and 2; Thompson on Real Property, Perm.Ed., vol. 1, p. 502. As it is an interest in land it can only be created by grant, or by implication or prescription and not by parol. Eastman v. Piper, supra. It is an incorporeal interest in the servient estate. Kellett v. Ida Clayton, etc., Wagon Road Co., 99 Cal. 210, 33 P. 885; Thompson on Real Property, Perm.Ed., vol. 1, p. 506. The principles governing equitable servitudes are therefore not applicable, and it was not necessary for the respondent to show that each deed made by the land company contained a reservation similar to that in the deed to Rice. Her cause of action depends upon the rights which were created by that deed in favor of the land company and to which she succeeds as the subsequent owner of the adjoining land.

[15-18] Construing the reservation over parcels A and F as appurtenant to the land, the respondent's right to a judgment against the appellant Virgil McCombs depends upon whether the land company owned parcel B at the time the easements were created.

It appears that in 1919 the land company made a contract of sale with Rice and in 1922 made a deed in fulfillment of that contract. The respondent's land was conveyed by the land company to Title Guarantee and Trust Company, her predecessor in interest, about three years after Rice purchased parcels A and F on contract but before the deed was made to him. However, a contract for the sale of real estate may be specifically enforced by the purchaser, equity regarding as done that which ought to be done; it considers the purchaser to be the owner of the land. Tiffany, Real Property, 3d Ed., vol. 1, p. 528; Orange Cove Water Co. v. Sampson, 78 Cal.App. 334, 248 P. 526; Retsloff v. Smith, 79 Cal.App. 443, 249 P. 886. The vendor who retains the legal title as security for the payment of the purchase price has no greater rights than he would possess if he had conveyed the land and taken back a mortgage. Miller v. Waddingham, 91 Cal. 377, 27 P. 750, 13 L.R.A. 680. The vendee, particularly after he goes into possession of the land under an executory contract, is for all purposes the owner and the vendor retains mere legal title. Thompson, on Real Property, Perm.Ed., vol. 8, p. 522.

The record shows that Rice took possession of the property following the execution of the contract of sale; he thereby became the equitable owner with all the benefits incident to such ownership, and the land was subject to any easements reserved for the benefit of the grantor or the grantor's property. It necessarily follows that the benefits of that easement attached to the property and may now be enforced by the respondent.

[19-21] The judgment secured by Rice quieting his title against the land company does not bind the respondent who was not a party to that action. Also the subsequent quitclaim deed executed by the land company to Virgil McCombs did not terminate the respondent's easement to a right of way appurtenant to her land. But the respondent's rights as against him must be limited to a decree quieting her title to the use for road purposes of the south 30 feet of parcel A and the north 30 feet of parcel F and enjoining any interference with that use.

[22-24] However, when the deed to parcel G was made, the land company had conveyed all of the other parcels shown on the diagram, and the reservation in it could not have been made for the benefit of any other property. But it must be presumed that this provision in the deed was made to carry out some purpose, and "an interpretation which gives effect is preferred to one which makes void". § 3541, Civ.Code. It must, therefore, be construed as an easement in gross.

By a deed executed in 1936, the land company granted to the respondent and others all of its rights to the easement in and over the property of Eva McCombs. Under this deed the respondent acquired a title to the right of way and is entitled to have that title quieted and to an injunction against any interference with her use of the northerly 30 feet of parcel G for road purposes. Callahan v. Martin, 3 Cal.2d 110, 121, 43 P.2d 788, 101 A.L.R. 871.

The judgment is therefore reversed with directions to enter judgment in favor of the respondent in accordance with the conclusions which have been stated, respondent to recover her costs on appeal.

I dissent.

The appeal from the judgment which was rendered herein in the lower court was originally determined by the District Court of Appeal for the Fourth Appellate District. 100 P.2d 499, 500. Thereafter a petition for hearing in this court was granted, particularly for the purpose of giving more careful consideration to certain points of law than was practicable at the time this court considered the petition for hearing of the appeal herein. Following the submission of the cause and taking into account the points and authorities submitted in the additional briefs which were filed by the respective parties to the litigation, I have become convinced that the opinion which was rendered by the District Court of Appeal, as hereinbefore referred to, has adequately expressed my views with reference to each of the several issues which were presented on the appeal. Accordingly, the said opinion, which was prepared by Mr.

Justice Griffin of the said District Court of Appeal, is adopted as my opinion. It is as follows:

"By this action in equity plaintiff Besse C. Elliott, respondent herein, asks injunctive relief and seeks to quiet title to a right of way and easement for road purposes over the properties of Virgil McCombs and Eva F. McCombs, defendants and appellants. The tract of land involved in this litigation was acquired by the San Fernando Mission Land Company, hereinafter referred to as the 'Land Company', on January 18, 1905, and is described as tracts 9, 10, 15 and 16 of subdivision No. 1 of Porter Land and Water Company, as per map recorded in book 31, page 3, miscellaneous records of Los Angeles county. Said map was recorded in 1888 and showed, included with the subdivision of adjoining lands, the subdivision into quarters of the southwest quarter of section 18, township 2 north, range 15 west, S. B. B. & M., in Rancho Ex Mission de San Fernando. These quarters are designated on this map by the above tract or lot numbers as: Tract No. 9 being the northwest quarter, tract No. 10 being the northeast quarter, tract No. 15 being the southeast quarter, and tract No. 16 being the southwest quarter, which quarters will hereinafter be referred to by their respective tract numbers. This map also showed roads bounding the four sides of said quarter section. These roads came to be known as Devonshire street on the north, Hayvenhurst avenue on the east, Lassen street on the south, and Balboa avenue on the west.

"Defendant Virgil McCombs' property, over which plaintiff claims a right of way, comprises the west half of tract 16 and the southwest quarter of tract 9, the westerly boundary thereof fronting on the aforementioned road, Balboa avenue. Plaintiff's property comprises the southeast quarter of tract 9, adjoining the easterly boundary of defendant's southwest quarter of tract 9. The right of way in question is claimed over a strip of land, 60 feet in width, running east and west across defendant Virgil McCombs' land. This strip claimed as a right of way comprises the north 30 feet of the west half of tract 16 and the south 30 feet of the southwest quarter of tract 9.

"After acquiring title in 1905 from the subdivider, the Land Company conveyed in parcels all that land in said quarter section bounded by the line of abutment between the north and south halves thereof. This line of abutment is the center line of the right of way in question. In certain deeds of parcels bounded on the south by said line the Land Company set forth reservations of the southerly 30 feet thereof for road purposes, while in other deeds of adjoining parcels no such reservations were made. Certain deeds of parcels bounded on the north by said line contained reservations of the northerly 30 feet thereof for road purposes, while deeds of adjoining parcels neglected to provide for like reservations. Plaintiff contends that, by virtue of these reservations, the Land Company intended to and did set apart for the benefit of adjoining landowners a strip of land 60 feet in width lying between the north and south halves of said quarter section and running from the east to the west boundary thereof.

"After the execution and payment of a contract of sale dated in 1919 (the terms of which are not disclosed as to any reservations therein), by deed dated June 20, 1922, the Land Company conveyed to one Rice, defendant Virgil McCombs' immediate grantor, the west half of tract 16 and the southwest quarter of tract 9. This deed conveyed 'the west half of the southwest quarter, except the north 30 feet thereof reserved for road purposes, and the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, except the south 30 feet thereof reserved for road purposes'. The reservations embodied in this language of the description in said deed to Rice constitute the sixty-foot strip in controversy and over which plaintiff claims to be entitled to a right of way and easement. On July 14, 1927, Rice commenced an action against the Land Company in the superior court of Los Angeles county to quiet title to the west half of tract 16 and the southwest quarter of tract 9, being the land now owned by defendant Virgil McCombs, and mentioned herein as having been conveyed to Rice by the Land Company. Notice of the pendency of the action was duly given in writing and recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. No contest having been made by the Land Company, and its default in said action having been duly entered, Rice was, on May 22, 1930, adjudged the owner and in possession, and the decree quieting his title to said property, including the claimed right of way, was duly entered on May 23, 1930. At the time this quiet title action was filed the Land Company had conveyed all of its interest in and to the said southwest quarter of section 18, except the interests reserved and retained by it through reservations for road purposes in some but not all of its deeds. On May 22, 1930, the date of the decree in said quiet title action, there was recorded a deed dated May 3, 1930, from Rice and wife to defendant Virgil McCombs, conveying the west half of tract 16 and the southwest quarter of tract 9, being the land plaintiff seeks to burden with an easement. This deed from Rice to defendant did not contain any reservations of, or reference to, an easement or right of way. Thus defendant acquired his interest in the above-described property, which he has held ever since.

"Prior to the conveyance from the Land Company to Rice, and by deed dated February 23, 1922, the Land Company conveyed the southeast quarter of tract 9, plaintiff's property, and the northwest quarter of tract 15 to Title Guarantee and Trust Company, a corporation, hereinafter referred to as the 'Title Company'. The evidence shows that this deed to the Title Company did not contain any reservations. No reservation was made of the south 30 feet of the southeast quarter of tract 9. Such a reservation, if made, would have provided an easterly continuation of the south thirty-foot strip of said southwest quarter of tract 9 reserved by the Land Company in the aforementioned deed to Rice. The Land Company in this deed to the Title Company did not grant, or refer to, or describe any right of way over said southwest quarter of tract 9 or the west half of tract 16. By deed dated February 1, 1926, the Title Company, which was the grantee of the grantee of the original subdivider, conveyed the southeast quarter of tract 9 and the northwest quarter of tract 15. This deed contained the following reservations, to-wit: 'reserving the south 30 feet of lot 9 and the north 30 feet of lot 15, for road purposes'. Through mesne conveyances, and on January 24, 1936, plaintiff acquired title to the southeast quarter of tract 9 by a deed containing a reservation of the south 30 feet thereof for road purposes. Thus plaintiff acquired title to the property, the ownership of which she now claims entitles her to a right of way across defendant Virgil McCombs' land.

"By deed dated August 27, 1921, the Land Company conveyed the west half of the east half of tract 10. This deed contained no reservations. By deed dated April 16, 1920, the Land Company conveyed the east half of tract 15. This deed contained a reservation of the north 30 feet thereof for road purposes. Through mesne conveyances and on June 23, 1926, Hershel C. Baskett acquired title to said east half of tract 15 by a deed containing a like reservation. However, on June 15, 1926, the Land Company executed to Baskett a quitclaim deed covering this east half of tract 15. By deed dated February 19, 1923, the Land Company conveyed the east half of tract 16. This deed contained a reservation of the north and south 30 feet thereof for road purposes. Through mesne conveyances and on January 30, 1928, the defendant Eva F. McCombs, wife of Virgil McCombs, acquired title to this east half of tract 16 by a deed containing like reservations. By deed dated June 22, 1921, the Land Company conveyed the west half of tract 10. This deed contained a reservation of the north and south 30 feet for road purposes. By a similar deed dated January 6, 1921, the Land Company conveyed the east half of the east half of tract 10, containing a reservation of the south 30 feet thereof for road purposes. Two days before the action herein was commenced and on October 24, 1936, the Land Company and the Title Company executed various quitclaim deeds covering the south 30 feet of lots 9 and 10 and the north 30 feet of lots 15 and 16 to owners of parcels abutting thereon. On said date the Title Company executed a quitclaim deed to one Mabel Ruth Craig, covering the north 30 feet of the northwest quarter of lot 15, and it also executed a quitclaim deed to plaintiff Besse C. Elliott, covering the south 30 feet of the southeast quarter of lot 9. Both of these quitclaim deeds contained a provision: 'Subject to an easement for road purposes over said property.' On October 24, 1936, the Title Company executed a quitclaim deed to all the owners of abutting parcels, covering all of its right, title and interest in and to an easement for road purposes in and over the south 30 feet of lots 9 and 10 and the north 30 feet of lots 15 and 16. Finally, on the same date, the Land Company executed a quitclaim deed to the same owners of abutting parcels, covering all of its right, title and interest in and to an easement for road purposes in and over the south 30 feet of lots 9 and 10 and the north 30 feet of lots 15 and 16.

In the spring of 1934, defendant Virgil McCombs planted eucalyptus trees, 10 feet apart, in a row across the west boundary of the 60-foot strip in question where the same enters Balboa avenue. Defendant Virgil McCombs each year plowed up the 60-foot strip, together with the rest of his property, and raised crops on all of the land, as his predecessor had done while he held title.

"The trial court found that it was the intention of the Land Company 'to create a right of way for road purposes sixty feet in width running parallel with the north and south boundaries of said quarter section midway between said north and south boundaries, and connecting the roadways bounding said quarter section on the east and west side, which roadways are now known as Hayvenhurst Avenue and Balboa Avenue respectively; * * * that for several years prior to the commencement of this action said sixty-foot strip between lots 10 and 15 has been used for road purposes by the owners of property abutting thereon and their servants, agents and employees and others who chose to use the same, and that said strip is now a well-defined roadway; that at the time the defendants acquired title to their properties said strip was being so used * * * that through mesne conveyances and on January 30, 1928, the defendant Eva F. McCombs acquired title to the east half of lot 16 except thirty feet along the north and south lines thereof for road purposes; * * *' That as to the west half of lot 16 and the southwest quarter of lot 9, 'there was no user of that portion of the sixty-foot strip and right of way for road purposes * * * and that while the defendant Virgil McCombs has exercised all right of ownership in so far as previous use is concerned of the property from the time he has possessed it and that his predecessor in interest Rice did so from 1919, the benefit of such easement would continue in plaintiff's land and her predecessor in interest whether acts of ownership were ever exercised by the defendant McCombs and his predecessor, Rice'; that the quiet title decree 'did not affect the rights of plaintiff or her predecessors in interest to use all or any part of said sixty-foot strip for ingress and egress to and from their respective properties'; that all of the grantees mentioned in the deeds of the 60-foot strip across the entire quarter section, dated October 24, 1936, from the Land Company to the Title Company, are the owners of 'some parcel of property abutting upon said easement for road purposes, and that collectively they own all of such abutting property'; that 'at the time defendants acquired their respective properties, that they had such constructive notice as was given by the public records that a reservation for road purposes, sixty feet in width lying between lots 9 and 10 on the north, and lots 15 and 16 on the south, was reserved for road purposes by the San Fernando Mission Land Company, a corporation; that at the time San Fernando Mission Land Company, a corporation, had divested itself of all interest in said southwest quarter of said section 18, supra, except its interest in said sixty-foot reservation for road purposes. It had no right, either directly or indirectly, to divest any of the land owners abutting upon the hereinbefore mentioned sixty-foot strip, of their right to the free and unhindered use of said strip for road purposes and travel'. The court then found that 'the defendants, and all other owners of property abutting on said sixty-foot strip, have an equal right with plaintiff to the use of said sixty-foot strip as a roadway and passageway for ingress and egress to and from their respective properties, and to and from said Hayvenhurst Avenue and Balboa Avenue'.

"The judgment rendered herein quiets against defendants a right in plaintiff to use said 60-foot strip over defendants' land for road purposes and also orders defendants to remove all the trees within this 60-foot strip, and perpetually restrains defendants from in any way interfering with plaintiff's free use of said 60-foot strip for road purposes. From this judgment defendants prosecute their appeal.

"Respondent, in support of the judgment, argues that the reservation in the Land Company's deed to Rice and the circumstances related created an easement appurtenant to the parcel now owned by respondent; and that the abutment of respondent's parcel upon part of the terminus of the strip in question reserved in the deed to Rice was sufficient to annex to respondent's parcel the irrevocable right of its free use for the benefit of abutting landowners; and that therefore the quiet title decree against the Land Company did not divest respondent of this right, she not being a party to that action, citing Petitpierre v. Maguire, 155 Cal. 242, 100 P. 690; Syers v. Dodd, 120 Cal.App. 444, 447,

8 P.2d 157; Prescott v. Edwards, 117 Cal. 298, 303, 49 P. 178, 59 Am.St.Rep. 186. Appellants now argue that the trial court erred in the conclusion of law 'that the reservations in some deeds from the Land Company of adjoining parcels of said quarter section operated to reserve for the mutual benefit of all adjoining parcels a strip of land for road purposes, comprising the south 30 feet of lots 9 and 10 and the north 30 feet of lots 15 and 16, thereby creating an easement or quasi-easement or right of way over defendants' land for the benefit of plaintiff's land', and that before such a strip of land extending over the entire quarter section could be said to have been reserved by the Land Company, all its deeds of adjoining parcels would necessarily have to contain reservations. The evidence shows that the Land Company conveyed three of the parcels by deeds containing no reservations, and the trial court so found. The parcels conveyed free of reservations comprise about half the length of that strip which the trial court concluded the Land Company had reserved for road purposes. The parcels conveyed without reservations are interspersed between those conveyed with reservations. The deeds containing reservations did not state that the reservations were for the benefit of adjoining parcels. If the Land Company had intended these reservations to have that effect, it would have expressly so declared in the deeds, as was done in the case of Petitpierre v. Maguire, supra, relied upon by appellant. It therefore seems clear that the benefit of these reservations was intended to be purely personal to the grantor Land Company and there is nothing to indicate a different intention. Taft v. Tarpey, 125 Cal. 376, 58 P. 24. Even were it assumed that the Land Company intended the reservations to be for the benefit of the parcels conveyed without reservations, yet the grantees of those parcels conveyed with reservations had no right of way over those parcels deeded free of reservations. Thus there could be no mutuality of benefit in the adjoining landowners. The fact that a road would be convenient to the grantees could not inject into their respective deeds an intention by the grantor to create one, when the language of the deeds showed no such intent. The intention of the parties should be determined by a fair interpretation of the grant or reservation creating the easement. Berryman v. Hotel Savoy Co., 160 Cal. 559, 566, 117 P. 677, 37 L.R.A.,N.S., 5. It is the general rule that in such cases it is better to get at the intention of the grantor from the language of the deed, interpreted in the light of the attending circumstances, than to conjecture the intent from the circumstances and then to make the language of the deed bend to that.

"Assuming the deeds with reservations did create a road for the benefit of the adjoining parcels, then the road grew in length as the Land Company conveyed each additional parcel by a deed containing reservations for road purposes. If this were true, each grantee would not know the extent of burden imposed by the reservation, if any, in his deed until the conveyances of all the parcels were made. But this could not be, for the extent of burden of the easements reserved was determined by the individual grants themselves. Civ.Code, sec. 806, C. F. Lott Land Co. v. Hegan, 177 Cal. 169, 169 P. 1035.

"There is no evidence that at the time of conveyance the grantees had any notice that the Land Company owned adjoining land, or that a road might be set apart out of the adjoining parcels for their mutual benefit. The map of said quarter section, recorded in 1888, showed no right of way. The individual deeds made no reference to such a road. There is no evidence that there was a use of a road to indicate its existence, nor is there any evidence that the Land Company informed the purchasers of a plan to create a road. A secret intent of the Land Company, if any, to carve a road out of the adjoining parcels conveyed for their mutual benefit could not operate to bind the grantees, else the grantees would be bound in law to investigate the subsequent deeds of the Land Company of other parcels than their own to discover this intent. However, the intention of the grantor must be determined as of the time of conveyance. Further, for such a plan to bind the grantees the intention of the grantor alone does not govern. It is the joint intent of the grantor and grantees which controls. The case of Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, at page 184, 183 P. 945, aptly states the rule applicable to the instant case:

" 'The intent of the common grantor—the original owner—is clear enough. He had a general plan of restrictions in mind. But it is not his intent that governs. It is the joint intent of himself and his grantees, and as between him and each of his grantees the instrument or instruments between them, in this case the deed, constitute the final and exclusive memorial of such intent. It is also apparent that each deed must be construed as of the time it is given. It cannot be construed as of a later date, and in particular, its construction and effect cannot be varied because of deeds which the grantor may subsequently give to other parties.' See, also, Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Muir, 136 Cal. 36, 50, 68 P. 308; McBride v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 152, 215 P. 678; 9 Cal.Jur., p. 248.

"This jurisdiction is replete with authority that a grantee who takes his conveyance without notice of such a plan acquires his interest free of the burdens imposed by it. It is true that an easement may be created by estoppel and where a grantor conveys lots in a tract of land under a plan, known to the grantees, to set apart a road for the benefit of the lots conveyed, a reciprocal easement in the road passes with each lot conveyed. Under this rule, however, the grantees are not bound unless at the time of conveyance they were in some way apprised of the plan or the existence of the road. Since such an easement is generally based on the doctrine of equitable estoppel, the notice to the grantee is an essential factor. The cases demonstrate that this notice may be brought home to the grantee in various ways: by the deed itself; by a map, recorded or unrecorded, showing the road; by an open, apparent use of the road, indicating its existence; by a plat or subdivision of the tract showing the road; or by the grantor designating the road by visible markings on the ground. Silveira v. Smith, 198 Cal. 510, 246 P. 58; Danielson v. Sykes, 157 Cal. 686, 109 P. 87, 28 L.R.A.,N.S., 1024; Syers v. Dodd, 120 Cal.App. 444, 8 P.2d 157; Prescott v. Edwards, supra; Eltinge v. Santos, 171 Cal. 278, 152 P. 915, Ann.Cas.1917A, 1143; Petitpierre v. Maguire, supra. The evidence in the instant case does not disclose notice to the grantee in any of the instances above mentioned.

"As applied to the facts related, we are convinced that the evidence does not justify the application of the estoppel rule. Plaintiff has shown no title by prescription. Since the trial court found that there was no user of the easement in question, no title by prescription could have been acquired. The question of the necessity of egress and ingress is not involved. On February 23, 1922, the Land Company conveyed to the Title Company the southeast quarter of tract 9 (plaintiff's parcel). This deed to the Title Company contained no reservations. Four months later, the Land Company conveyed defendant Virgil McCombs' parcel to Rice by deed, to-wit, a deed with the reservations above referred to. This deed to Rice did not declare that the easement reserved was for the benefit of any adjoining parcel. When the conveyance to Rice was made the Land Company had already conveyed the southeast quarter of tract 9 to the Title Company. The easement reserved did not attach an appurtenance to that parcel, of which the Land Company had divested itself of title. Hopper v. Barnes, 113 Cal. 636, 45 P. 874; 9 R.C.L. 737; Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 182, 183 P. 945. Therefore, it is patent that the Land Company did not create over the southwest quarter of tract 9, or the west half of tract 16 an easement appurtenant to the southeast quarter of tract 9. Since the easement reserved in the deed to Rice was not appurtenant, then the easement was one in gross, personal to the Land Company. This quiet title judgment in favor of Rice and his successors in interest therefore was conclusive against the Land Company and its successors in interest and as plaintiff is the successor in interest of the Land Company, this judgment was conclusive against her. Knight v. All Persons, etc., 32 Cal.App. 381, 386, 162 P. 1051; Riverside Land Co. v. Jensen, 108 Cal. 146, 41 P. 40; Code Civ.Proc., secs. 751, 1908, and 1962; Baker v. Brickell, 102 Cal. 620, 624, 36 P. 950.

"In conclusion, it may be thus summarized: The reservations for road purposes in the Land Company's deed to Rice vested an easement in gross in the Land Company. The subsequent quiet title judgment for Rice vitiated all rights, title or interest of the Land Company in this easement which it had reserved. By this judgment Rice's title, theretofore incumbered by said easement, was perfected against the Land Company. This perfected title was acquired by defendant here. Since this judgment was effective to divest the title in the Land Company to the easement in question, clearly then, it was error for the trial court to conclude that the judgment was of no effect to bar the plaintiff who claims her right to the easement as a successor in interest of the Land Company."

The judgment should be unconditionally reversed.

NEBLETT v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

L. A. 17637.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

Rehearing and Modification Denied Feb. 20, 1941.

1. Attorney and client ⇐56

The disciplinary proceeding arising out of false testimony allegedly given by an attorney in a libel action which was still pending would, in interests of justice, be dismissed without prejudice to await determination of issues in pending libel action, though determination of libel action was not necessarily indispensable to prosecution of the disciplinary proceeding tracing its origin to it.

2. Attorney and client ⇐54

The right to practice law is a valuable one which should not be taken away under circumstances that have even the slightest tendency to suggest any possible unfairness or disadvantage therein to attorney whose right to remain in his profession is challenged.

Proceedings by William H. Neblett to review an order of the Board of Governors of the state bar, recommending that petitioner be disbarred from the practice of law for allegedly giving false testimony in a libel action, which is still pending and undetermined.

Proceedings dismissed without prejudice, to await determination of the libel litigation.

Rehearing denied; EDMONDS and HOUSER, JJ., not participating.

E. Walter Guthrie and William C. Ring, both of Los Angeles (H. S. Dottenheim, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner.

E. W. Miller, of Los Angeles, amicus curiae for petitioner.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, and Claude Minard, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Petitioner instituted this proceeding for the purpose of reviewing an order of the Board of Governors of the State Bar recommending that he be disbarred from the practice of law in this state.

On February 24, 1940, the petitioner was served with a notice to appear and show cause before a local committee of the respondent State Bar why he should not be disciplined for allegedly having given false testimony in a libel action commenced by him in the superior court of Los Angeles county. The alleged false testimony given by the petitioner before the jury in his libel action is set out at length in the notice to show cause and consumes some twelve typewritten pages thereof. At the hearings before the local committee petitioner admitted that he had so testified in the libel action but denied the charge of falsity. In fact, before the committee he testified to substantially the same effect by way of explanation of the transactions underlying both the libel action and the disciplinary proceeding. In other words, except in immaterial and minor details, petitioner has not receded from the position taken by him as a witness in the libel action.

Briefly stated, both the libel action which is still pending, and the disciplinary proceeding, turn upon the truth of petitioner's statement or testimony as to the purpose for which certain sums of money, approximating $15,000, were paid to him in the latter part of 1936 and early 1937. It was the theory of the respondent State Bar, and it definitely so charged in the notice to show cause, that this money had been paid to the petitioner for the purpose of having him influence his then law partner, who was a United States Senator, to sponsor or support a deficiency appropriation measure in Congress, which measure, if enacted, would supply the funds necessary to complete the new federal building then under construction in Los Angeles. In furtherance of its theory the respondent State Bar urged that the George A. Fuller Company of New York, one of the principal contractors engaged in the erection of the building, and the Newberry Electric Corporation of Los Angeles, a subcontractor for the installation of the electrical work, were both interested in seeing that sufficient moneys were appropriated to complete the building and that either or both had engaged or resorted to the services of one Carl Pustau, as an intermediary, to pay the money above mentioned to the petitioner for the purpose already referred to. A deficiency appropriation measure for the completion of the building was passed by Congress in February, 1937.

In 1938, in an involuntary bankruptcy proceeding then pending against Pustau, there was offered in evidence a lengthy statement wherein he charged that the moneys theretofore paid by him to the petitioner were for the illegal purpose charged in the order to show cause herein.

Apparently copies of this Pustau statement were released to the press and published. Whether the statement was intended to embarrass and thereby defeat petitioner's then law partner for re-election as United States Senator, is purely speculative and presently immaterial, though such is asserted in petitioner's briefs to have been its purpose.

After its publication and in February, 1938, the petitioner herein sued Pustau for damages for libel, alleging his statement to be false. Several other persons were also named as defendants on the allegation that they had induced or procured Pustau to make the charge. As already indicated, upon the trial of the libel action petitioner admittedly testified as charged in the order to show cause in this proceeding. Then, and ever since, he has consistently claimed and testified that the moneys paid to him by Pustau were not for the purpose stated by the latter but, on the contrary, were paid to him pursuant to an agreement whereby petitioner for a fee, reflected in part by the Pustau payments, was to undertake over a year period to procure electrical work or business for the Newberry Electric Corporation, represented by Pustau, with particular view to an effort on petitioner's part to procure for such electrical company a contract for the construction of a power line from Boulder Dam into Los Angeles for the Southern California Edison Company. The president of the latter company was a personal friend of the petitioner, which fact it was assertedly assumed would be of assistance to the petitioner in his negotiations in the particular mentioned. The record herein discloses that petitioner exerted some effort toward the accomplishment of this objective, though the parties hereto differ as to the time when such service was rendered and the result thereof. As stated, in the libel action and ever since, the foregoing substantially has been the petitioner's explanation of his receipt of the money from Pustau. Obviously, this explanation, if accepted or true, discloses nothing of a disciplinary character.

At the trial of the libel action petitioner, as plaintiff, after offering on the witness stand his explanation of the Pustau payments to him, as against Pustau's prior and allegedly libelous charge with respect thereto, was nonsuited as to certain of the defendants but procured a judgment of $70,000 against other defendants, including Pustau. A new trial was thereafter granted to the latter group of defendants, the prosecution of which is assertedly awaiting the determination of petitioner's appeal from the judgment of nonsuit in favor of some of the defendants. In short, the libel action in which it is here charged that petitioner, as witness and plaintiff, had perjured himself is still pending and undetermined in a court possessing the jurisdiction essential to a proper determination of the issues there involved, which necessarily include any question as to the truthfulness of testimony therein given by the petitioner, plaintiff in that action, with respect to the purpose or purposes for which he admittedly received the money from Pustau. For, if petitioner's testimony therein be assumed to be true, obviously he was maligned by Pustau's statement to the contrary, whereas if the latter's statement be accepted petitioner would have no just cause for complaint in the libel action.

[1, 2] Under the circumstances, and for other reasons hereinafter to be mentioned, we are of the view that the ends of justice will best be served by a dismissal of this disciplinary proceeding without prejudice, to await the determination of the issues in the pending libel action out of which, as stated, the present proceeding arose. In Golden v. State Bar, 213 Cal. 237, 249, 250, 2 P.2d 325, wherein there was a connection or tie-in between pending civil litigation and the disciplinary proceeding there involved, we dismissed the latter without prejudice to await disposition of the former. We are mindful that determination of the libel action is not necessarily indispensable to the institution or prosecution of a disciplinary proceeding tracing its origin to the former. But we are equally mindful that the right to practice law is a valuable one which should not be taken away or canceled under circumstances that have even the slightest tendency to suggest any possible unfairness or disadvantage therein to the attorney whose right to remain in his profession is challenged. Some of the principal witnesses against the petitioner in this disciplinary proceeding are defendants in the pending libel action to which this proceeding traces its origin. Without any desire on our part to impugn the honesty of these witnesses, we are of the firm conviction that they should not be confronted with even the slightest temptation to color their testimony in this proceeding, consciously or unconsciously, in a way that later may prove to be beneficial to them as defendants in the petitioner's pending libel suit against them. Under the peculiar circumstances here present, it is neither fair to the witnesses nor to the petitioner that such a situation be tolerated. Moreover, any present disposition of this disciplinary proceeding on the merits, no matter how guarded, or what the result, could serve only to prejudge, if not determine, the pending libel action. It is not our inclination so to do. If, as the respondent State Bar contends, petitioner actually falsified his testimony on the first trial of the libel suit, on which point we express no opinion, that fact, if it be a fact, may be proved equally as well at the conclusion of that litigation and then be made the basis for disciplinary action free of the obstacles which now rear their heads upon this proceeding.

Our conclusion to dismiss this proceeding without prejudice is fortified by other matters worthy of consideration. There can be no doubt but that in the inception of this proceeding the respondent State Bar relied heavily upon the statements and testimony of Pustau to establish that he had paid the money to petitioner for the improper and illegal purpose charged in the order to show cause. The findings so declare. Unquestionably Pustau at the inception of these proceedings was to be the principal witness against petitioner. His testimony in this proceeding covers approximately 250 pages of the transcript. He did not, however, prove to be a good witness. Concededly, he is now a convicted perjurer. People v. Pustau, 39 Cal.App.2d 407, 103 P.2d 224. Because of this, the committee later and wisely abandoned him and its findings frankly exclude his testimony from all consideration. As a result, the local committee expressly refused to find, as charged in the order to show cause, that the money paid by Pustau to petitioner was for the purpose of having the latter influence his then law partner, as a United States Senator, to assist in the congressional appropriation of deficiency funds with which to complete the Los Angeles federal building. The Board of Governors adopted the findings of the committee and consequently has likewise refused to find upon this issue. It is difficult to perceive how a contrary finding could have been made under the circumstances. In the absence of the testimony of the discredited and rejected witness Pustau, the transcript is destitute of direct evidence tending to establish that the money was received by petitioner for the purpose charged in the order to show cause. Other witnesses called by the respondent State Bar, whether friendly or unfriendly to petitioner, denied having paid or having directed payment to petitioner for such purpose. In fact, the president of the Newberry Electric Corporation, a witness none too friendly toward petitioner, testified that there was "no need for anything of the kind; perfectly absurd to even think of it".

We advance the foregoing without any thought of presently considering or determining the merits of the charge against petitioner but merely to show that the state of the record now before us is such as to support our conclusion that any disciplinary action should await determination of the libel suit. The respondent State Bar being thus precluded by the turn of events from finding that the money was paid by Pustau to petitioner for the purpose specifically alleged in the order to show cause, nevertheless went on to find that petitioner had falsified when he testified in the libel suit to the effect that the money had been paid to him for his services in connection with attempting to procure a contract for the Newberry Electric Corporation to build a power line from Boulder Dam to Los Angeles for the Southern California Edison Company. Assuming, without deciding, that such asserted falsification is within the charge as defined in the order to show cause, as urged by the respondent State Bar, under the express findings of the committee as adopted by the Board of Governors, it is dependent and grounded upon certain conflicts between petitioner's testimony in the libel action (here substantially reiterated by him) and the testimony of certain witnesses, other than Pustau, called by the respondent State Bar in this proceeding, augmented by certain inferences allegedly deducible from such other evidence. In fact, the committee in its findings (later adopted by the board) declared that: "In finally apprising the Board of this Committee's feelings in regard to the credibility of the witnesses, in fairness to the [petitioner] it must be stated that were the Committee obliged to judge this matter solely between the Committee's opinion of the veracity of the [petitioner] and the veracity of the majority of the witnesses upon whom the State Bar was forced to rely, the Committee would indeed have found that task most difficult. We have been here aided, however, by the exhibits, the establishment of certain definite points of time in relation to the happening of certain matters, and have been further aided by the inferences properly deducible from satisfactory evidence and the Committee's own knowledge of the general and reasonable actions of persons under given conditions."

We do not deny that certain discrepancies exist between parts of petitioner's testimony in the libel suit, explaining the reason and basis for his receipt of the money from Pustau, and parts of the testimony of certain witnesses called herein by the respondent State Bar. However, we do not hesitate to state that some of these discrepancies are not of great consequence and conceivably may be traceable to honest but varying recollections of the same incident by different minds. Nor do we deny the evidentiary value of inferences drawn from evidence. But, in view of the pendency of the libel action out of which this proceeding arose and in which the purpose underlying the Pustau payments to petitioner is equally material, and in the absence from the record now before us of credible direct evidence contradicting petitioner's explanation of the purpose underlying said payments, we are not now inclined to weigh the discrepancies and inferences mentioned and to rule either that they are or are not sufficiently substantial to warrant petitioner's disbarment. Because of the unusual circumstances involved, as indicated above, that may best be done at the more propitious time already mentioned. Particularly does this course appear appropriate when it is further noted that so far as we are aware, or have been informed, this is the first time in the petitioner's twenty-six years of professional activity, twenty-two of which have transpired in this state, that he has been recommended for discipline.

Moreover, our conclusion will serve to avoid the necessity of passing upon petitioner's contention that the recommendation of disbarment made by the Board of Governors is null and void because approved and voted only by the necessary minimum of eight members, one of whom assertedly was disqualified and not entitled to participate therein because of his prior representation as counsel of one of the defendants in the petitioner's libel action. Such representation was in the very libel action out of which this disciplinary proceeding arose. It is true that the particular defendant was early relieved of liability in that action on an order of dismissal and his representation by the challenged member of the Board of Governors was but nominal. It is also true that in response to petitioner's motion to dismiss this proceeding because of said member's alleged disqualification and the asserted resulting deficient vote of qualified members of the Board of Governors, an affidavit has been filed herein by the challenged member in which he avers that at the time of his participation in the deliberations, and voting of the board in this disciplinary proceeding he had "completely forgotten" his prior and nominal representation of one of the minor defendants in the libel action. He likewise disclaimed all "feeling favorable or unfavorable" toward petitioner by reason thereof. We do not question the sincerity or honesty of purpose of the particular member. Nor do we find it necessary to here pass upon either the timeliness or the merits of the challenge directed at him, for obviously our conclusion to dismiss this proceeding without prejudice for reasons already mentioned will effectively serve to remove the circumstance which petitioner asserts has resulted in the recommendation of his disbarment by a vote of an insufficient number of qualified members of the Board of Governors. This latter circumstance is but another factor tending to establish the reasonableness of our disposition of this proceeding in a manner to eliminate all vestige of claimed unfairness.

In conclusion, it may also be pointed out that such course will likewise serve to afford petitioner the requested opportunity to further challenge the testimony of the president of the Newberry Electric Corporation. The respondent State Bar denied a similar request upon the ground that it already had made its recommendation to this court and had lost jurisdiction of the proceeding. It appears from the findings herein that the respondent State Bar has placed much reliance upon the testimony of said witness particularly in so far as it differs from petitioner's explanation of his dealings with that company. In a supplemental affidavit filed in support of his motion to dismiss this proceeding upon the ground last above discussed, the petitioner avers that in the argument before the Board of Governors the State Bar examiner had cast some aspersion upon or had questioned the accuracy of at least a portion of the testimony of the designated witness, who had been called by the respondent. We do not find in the record now before us any denial by the State Bar of such challenge of its own witness and, as stated, our indicated disposal of this proceeding will not foreclose the petitioner from further challenging the witness' testimony in any particular desired.

Therefore, in view of the pendency of the libel action out of which this proceeding arose, and in view of the unsatisfactory state of the record herein in the respects mentioned, we are of the opinion that the ends of justice will best be served and the valuable right to practice law will more effectively be guarded by a dismissal of this proceeding without prejudice, to await whatever proceedings the respondent State Bar deems appropriate upon the later determination of the libel litigation.

It is so ordered.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Attorney and client ⇐39

The statute providing for suspension of attorney on receipt by court of certified copy of record of conviction and providing for disbarment when judgment becomes final is "mandatory" in character and provides for automatic suspension upon proof of conviction and for automatic disbarment when judgment of conviction becomes final. St. 1939, p. 357, § 6102.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mandatory".

2. Attorney and client ⇐39

Where trial court suspends the rendition of its judgment of conviction of an attorney of crime involving moral turpitude, Supreme Court can only suspend and cannot disbar attorney since there has been no final adjudication of his guilt in court of law, and in such case if it is thought attorney has been guilty of conduct warranting disbarment, state bar must proceed upon its own initiative under statute. St.1939, p. 357, §§ 6101, 6102; pp. 355, 356, §§ 6075–6087.

3. Attorney and client ⇐39

Where court adjudged that attorney be imprisoned in city jail for term of 180 days, that execution be suspended for two years and that defendant be placed on probation on condition he serve 175 days in city jail, court rendered its judgment of conviction and then suspended its execution, and where defendant thereafter appealed and judgment was affirmed, judgment was "final judgment of conviction" sufficient to sustain an order of disbarment. St.1939, p. 357, § 6102; Pen. Code, §§ 1203.1, 1203.2.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Final Judgment of Conviction".

4. Attorney and client ⇐56

The statutory language that defendant shall be "released from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the offense" where court places defendant on probation and sets aside verdict after satisfactory completion of probationary period, is not to be interpreted as legislative mandate that order of disbarment of an attorney convicted of crime must be revoked where probation is granted. St. 1939, p. 357, § 6102; Pen.Code, § 1203.4.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Released from All Penalties and Disabilities Resulting from the Offense".

Legislature cannot infringe upon judicial power of court to discipline its own officers and cannot vacate such a judicial order by legislative mandate.

6. Criminal law ⇐1001

The "penalties and disabilities" within the probation statute providing that a person is "released from all penalties and disabilities resulting from offense" where court sets aside verdict after satisfactory completion of probationary period is established, are those which it is within power of legislative branch of government to release. Pen.Code, § 1203.4.

7. Attorney and client ⇐39

Order granting probation to attorney convicted of misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, followed by an order dismissing the action, was not analogous to order granting a new trial or to reversal of judgment of conviction upon appeal, which would prevent judgment of conviction from being final and prevent automatic disbarment of attorney, since order granting new trial or reversal of judgment is based upon the premise that error was committed rendering it uncertain whether defendant was actually guilty. Pen. Code, § 1203.4; St.1939, p. 357, § 6102.

8. Attorney and client ⇐39

Where attorney was convicted of crime involving moral turpitude and was automatically disbarred, court's setting aside of verdict and dismissing action after attorney completed period of probation operated to mitigate punishment by restoring certain rights and removing certain disabilities but did not obliterate fact that attorney had been finally adjudged guilty of crime and did not suspend automatic disbarment under statute. Pen.Code, § 1203.4; St.1939, p. 357, § 6102.

9. Attorney and client ⇐47

The state bar may carry on its own independent investigation of fitness of a member to practice law without regard to criminal prosecutions which may be pending. St. 1939, pp. 355, 356, §§ 6075–6087.

10. Attorney and client ⇐39

Upon presentation to Supreme Court of certified copy of record of conviction of crime involving moral turpitude, court will order suspension of attorney and will order disbarment when judgment of conviction becomes final on merits without regard to orders of probation in mitigation of punishment. SHENK, HOUSER, and CARTER, JJ., dissenting.

Petition by Michael G. Phillips to set aside an order of disbarment made after petitioner was found guilty of a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude.

Petition denied without prejudice to petitioner's right to make his application for reinstatement upon showing of moral rehabilitation as may be deemed satisfactory by Board of Governors of the State Bar.

Joe Wapner, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Philbrick McCoy, of Los Angeles, for State Bar.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

Petitioner, an attorney at law, on July 1, 1937, was found guilty in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles of a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude. On July 13, 1937, a certified copy of the record of conviction was filed with this court and an order was made suspending petitioner from the practice of law. On September 7, 1937, the judgment of conviction was reversed on appeal, but no order vacating the suspension appears to have been made. Petitioner was again placed on trial on the same charge and on December 9, 1937, was found guilty as charged by a jury. He then made application for probation, and the court on December 23, 1937, entered the following judgment: "Whereupon it is ordered and adjudged by the court this December 23, 1937, that for said offense of violation of Section 311, Penal Code, Subd. I, the said Michael G. Phillips be imprisoned in the city jail of Los Angeles City for the term of 180 days and the said defendant be discharged at the expiration of said term; execution suspended for 2 years and respondent placed on probation on condition he serves 175 days in City Jail." An appeal was taken and the judgment was affirmed on March 1, 1938.

On April 5, 1938, this court made an order of disbarment which recited that a certified copy of the judgment had been filed and that the judgment had become final. Subsequently on October 10, 1939, the petitioner having complied with the terms of the order of probation, the judge of the municipal court made a further order setting aside the verdict of guilty and dismissed the accusation against petitioner in accordance with the provisions of Penal Code, section 1203.4 Petitioner then filed this application in which he asked that the order of disbarment be set aside and that his name be restored to the roll of attorneys authorized to practice law in this state.

[1] The ground upon which petitioner seeks to have the order of disbarment of April 5, 1938, set aside is that there was no such "final judgment of conviction" as would justify an order of disbarment under the provisions of Business and Professions Code, sections 6101, 6102, St.1939, p. 357, Deering's 1939 Supp., p. 521. Section 6101 provides: "Conviction of a felony or misdemeanor, involving moral turpitude, constitutes a cause for disbarment or suspension as provided in section 6102. The record of conviction shall be conclusive evidence. * * * A plea or verdict of guilty is deemed to be a conviction within the meaning of this section." Section 6102 provides: "Upon the receipt of the certified copy of the record of conviction of an attorney of a crime involving moral turpitude, the court shall suspend the attorney until judgment in the case becomes final. When a judgment of conviction becomes final, the court shall order the attorney disbarred."

The language of section 6102 is mandatory in character and provides for an automatic suspension upon proof of conviction, and for an automatic disbarment when the judgment of conviction becomes final. The sole question presented is whether, under the facts of this case, there was a final judgment of conviction. An appeal from the judgment of conviction was taken and it was affirmed. Thus, the only ground upon which petitioner can rest his argument that no final judgment was rendered is that the trial court granted him probation, and later dismissed the accusation against him upon the satisfactory completion of the probationary period.

[2] The power of the trial court to grant probation after a conviction may be exercised in either of two ways: the court may suspend the imposition of the sentence, in which case no judgment of conviction is rendered, or it may impose the sentence and thereafter suspend its execution. Penal Code, §§ 1203.1, 1203.2. In the latter case a judgment of conviction has been rendered from which an appeal can be taken, and upon affirmance, it becomes a final judgment. In the former situation, however, where the court suspends the imposition of the sentence, that is, the rendition of a judgment of conviction, there is no judgment from which the defendant can prosecute an appeal (People v. Von Eckartsberg, 133 Cal.App. 1, 3, 23 P.2d 819; People v. Noone, 132 Cal.App. 89, 92, 22 P.2d 284; People v. De Voe, 123 Cal.App. 233, 236, 11 P.2d 26; 8 Cal.Jur. 493), and thus there can be no final judgment of conviction. It has been suggested that this places power in the hands of the trial court to control disbarment orders because the power of this court to enter an order of disbarment under the statute is made to depend upon whether the order of probation suspends the imposition of the judgment or merely its execution. In a sense this is true, but it is merely the result of the statutory scheme, for only in the one case is there a final determination of the defendant's guilt upon which this court can act in making its order of automatic disbarment. Where the trial court suspends the rendition of its judgment, this court acting under section 6102, supra, can only suspend and cannot disbar the attorney, for there has been no final adjudication of his guilt in a court of law. In such a case, if it is thought that the attorney has been guilty of conduct warranting disbarment, it is incumbent upon the State Bar to proceed upon its own initiative under article 5 of the State Bar Act. Business and Professions Code, §§ 6075–6087, St.1939, pp. 355, 356, Deering's 1939 Supp. p. 519. Following the disciplinary procedure therein provided, a recommendation can be made upon which this court may then make an order of disbarment.

[3] But such is not the situation disclosed by this record. In the present case the court "ordered and adjudged * * * that * * * the said Michael G. Phillips be imprisoned in the City Jail of Los Angeles City for the term of 180 days * * *; execution suspended for 2 years and Defendant placed on probation on condition he serves 175 days in City Jail". It is clear from the language of this order that the court rendered its judgment of conviction and then suspended its execution. Thereafter the defendant appealed, which would have been impossible if no judgment of conviction had been rendered (see cases cited supra), and the judgment was affirmed. The judgment of conviction in this case was "final" in the sense that it was no longer possible to contest the guilt of the defendant upon the merits of the case. It was therefore a "final judgment of conviction" sufficient to sustain an order of disbarment by this court under section 6102.

[4-6] In urging a contrary conclusion, petitioner relies upon the fact that the trial court acted under Penal Code, section 1203.4 to "set aside the verdict of guilty", after compliance with the conditions of his probation. The power of the trial court to place the defendant on probation and to set aside the verdict after a satisfactory completion of the probationary period is established by section 1203.4, which reads as follows: "Every defendant who has fulfilled the conditions of his probation for the entire period thereof * * * shall * * * be permitted by the court to withdraw his plea of guilty and enter a plea of not guilty; or if he has been convicted after a plea of not guilty, the court shall set aside the verdict of guilty; and in either case the court shall thereupon dismiss the accusation or information against such defendant, who shall thereafter be released from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the offense or crime of which he has been convicted * * * provided, that in any subsequent prosecution of such defendant for any other offense such prior conviction may be pleaded and proved and shall have the same effect as if probation had not been granted or the accusation or information dismissed." A preliminary point may be noticed here. The statutory language purporting to release the defendant "from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the offense" is not to be interpreted as a legislative mandate that the order of disbarment of an attorney must be revoked where probation is granted. It is established by the decisions of this state that the legislature cannot infringe upon the judicial power of the court to discipline its own officers, and cannot vacate such a judicial order by legislative mandate. In re Lavine, 2 Cal.2d 324, 41 P.2d 161. Any language of In re Herron, 217 Cal. 400, 19 P.2d 4, which might be deemed to support a contrary conclusion is hereby disapproved. See discussion, infra. The "penalties and disabilities" to which the probation statute refers are those which it is within the power of the legislative branch of the government to release.

Petitioner does not, however, rely primarily upon the theory that his order of disbarment is a "disability" which was released under the probation statute. He argues that the action taken under the Penal Code, section 1203.4 operated to set aside the judgment of conviction and that, therefore, there was never a "final judgment" upon which this court could have based its order of disbarment. Under section 6102 "convictions" in the sense of a plea or verdict of guilty (see 12 So.Calif.L.Rev. 201) is followed by an automatic suspension from the practice of law, and a "final judgment of conviction" is followed by disbarment. Was the finality of the judgment of conviction rendered in this case and affirmed on appeal destroyed by the order granting probation and the subsequent order setting aside the verdict of guilty and dismissing the accusation?

[7] It is contended that the order granting probation followed by an order dismissing the action under Penal Code, section 1203.4 is analogous to an order granting a new trial or to the reversal of a judgment of conviction upon appeal, and that a judgment of conviction cannot be final so long as the court can set it aside by any of these methods. But we do not believe that the power granted to the trial court under section 1203.4 can be given this effect. An order granting a new trial or a reversal of the judgment of conviction is based upon the premise that error was committed which renders it uncertain whether the defendant is actually guilty of the crime of which he was convicted. See 8 Cal.Jur. 414, 489. So long as such action can be taken, it is clear that the judgment of conviction is not final because it is still possible that an ultimate determination on the merits will find the defendant not guilty. In re Riccardi, 182 Cal. 675, 189 P. 694. No such considerations are present in the granting of probation to a convicted defendant. Whether the court suspends the rendition of the judgment of conviction or whether it merely suspends the execution of the judgment, the order of probation presupposes that the defendant is guilty. Where probation is granted before the judgment is rendered, it has been said that the defendant waives any right to appeal on the merits. People v. Von Eckartsberg, supra; and other cases cited supra. Where probation is granted after a judgment of conviction an affirmance on appeal is a final adjudication of the fact of his guilt. In either event the order granting probation is based upon the premise of the defendant's guilt, while a reversal upon appeal or an order granting a new trial is based upon the premise that the defendant's guilt has not been sufficiently proved.

[8] The powers possessed by the trial courts under the probation statutes, Penal Code, § 1203, et seq., are concerned with mitigation of punishment and confer discretion upon the courts in dealing with a convicted defendant. The power of the court to reward a convicted defendant who satisfactorily completes his period of probation by setting aside the verdict and dismissing the action operates to mitigate his punishment by restoring certain rights and removing certain disabilities. But it cannot be assumed that the legislature intended that such action by the trial court under section 1203.4 should be considered as obliterating the fact that the defendant had been finally adjudged guilty of a crime. This is made clear by the provision that the fact of the defendant's conviction can be used against him in any later prosecution, despite dismissal of the action under section 1203.4. In brief, action in mitigation of the defendant's punishment should not affect the fact that his guilt has been finally determined according to law. Such a final determination of guilt is the basis for the order of disbarment in this case. That final judgment of conviction is a fact; and its effect cannot be nullified for the purpose here involved, either by the order of probation or by the later order dismissing the action after judgment. Whether the judgment of conviction is final is to be determined from considerations apart from whether the trial court saw fit to mitigate the punishment by granting probation to the convicted defendant.

[9, 10] Counsel have suggested that the procedure to be followed in cases of this sort is uncertain. It is, of course, true that the State Bar may carry on its own independent investigation of the fitness of any one of its members to practice law without regard to criminal prosecutions which may be pending. Shafer v. State Bar, 215 Cal. 706, 12 P.2d 957. That is one of the alternative methods by which an attorney may be disbarred. Business and Professions Code, § 6075 et seq. The other method, which is intended to relieve the State Bar of the burden of carrying on a separate investigation where the defendant's unfitness has been finally determined by a court of law, is set forth in Business and Professions Code, section 6100 et seq., and provides the basis for the order in this case. Upon the presentation to this court of a certified copy of the record of conviction, we will make an order of suspension; and we will make an order of disbarment when the judgment of conviction becomes final on the merits of the cause, without regard to orders of probation in mitigation of punishment which may have been made by the trial court.

Among the cases cited as illustrative of existing confusion in automatic disbarment cases where probation has been granted, only In re Herron, 217 Cal. 490, 19 P.2d 4, seems inconsistent with the view we have herein set forth. In that case, after the conviction of an attorney of a crime involving moral turpitude, the court "suspended sentence" which was held to be equivalent to granting probation and suspending the execution of the judgment of conviction. Later the trial court set aside the verdict of guilty and dismissed the action, and this court held that the dismissal removed all disabilities and prevented the entering of an order of disbarment. In so far as that decision suggests that disbarment is a disability which can be removed by legislative mandate expressed in the probation statutes, it is contrary to the doctrine of our later case of In re Lavine, supra, and in so far as it suggests that the action of the trial court after a judgment of conviction could prevent the judgment from becoming final, it is erroneous and must be disapproved. In the case of In re Jacobsen, 202 Cal. 289, 260 P. 294, the trial court suspended the imposition of the sentence and granted probation to the defendant attorney who had been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude. In this case probation was granted before the imposition of the sentence, that is, before the rendition of the judgment, and no final judgment of conviction was possible, despite contrary suggestions in the opinion on that point. Thus, the order of suspension, rather than disbarment, was proper. In Shafer v. State Bar, 215 Cal. 706, 12 P. 2d 957, the order granting probation was made after the judgment of conviction was rendered, and this court properly made its order suspending the defendant until the judgment became final, in which case he was to be disbarred. In the case of In re Hatch, 10 Cal.2d 147, 73 P.2d 885, this court properly suspended the defendant attorney where only the "record of conviction" was filed and it appeared that probation was granted before any judgment of conviction was rendered. In each of these cases the result properly depended upon whether there was a final judgment of conviction as required by the statute.

[11] In the present case the court properly made its order of disbarment based upon a final judgment of conviction. Any application for reinstatement which petitioner desires to make should be filed with the board of governors of the State Bar, and this court should not act until the board of governors has completed its investigation and reported thereon. Business & Professions Code, §§ 6078, 6082; In re Lavine, supra.

The petition to set aside the order of disbarment and to restore petitioner's name to the roll of attorneys is denied without prejudice to petitioner's right to make his application for reinstatement upon such showing of moral rehabilitation as may be deemed satisfactory by the board of governors of the State Bar.

We concur: TRAYNOR, J.; EDMONDS, J.

SPENCE, Justice pro tem. (concurring).

I concur, as there was clearly a final judgment of conviction in the present case upon which the order of disbarment was based. I believe, however, that it is proper to call to the attention of the legislature the anomalous situation presented by our statutes relating to probation.

When a court decides to grant probation either upon application of the defendant or upon its own motion, Penal Code, § 1203, it may suspend the imposition of sentence or it may impose sentence and suspend the execution thereof. Penal Code, § 1203.1. Either procedure is based upon the record of conviction and the order or judgment of the court in either case is in the nature of a judgment of conviction, which may provide, in the discretion of the court and as a condition of probation, for fine or imprisonment or both. Penal Code, § 1203.1. It seems well settled, however, that where a defendant is ordered on probation by suspending the imposition of sentence, no appeal lies in the absence of a statute expressly authorizing such an appeal; but on the other hand, where a defendant is ordered on probation by imposing sentence and suspending the execution thereof, an appeal does lie. People v. Gibbons, 39 Cal.App.2d 671, 673, 103 P.2d 1005; People v. Dawes, 37 Cal.App.2d 44, 98 P.2d 787; People v. Smith, 36 Cal.App. 2d 361, 362, 97 P.2d 867; People v. Johnson, 14 Cal.App.2d 373, 375, 58 P.2d 211; People v. Brooks, 140 Cal.App. 480, 481, 35 P.2d 583; People v. Von Eckartsberg, 133 Cal.App. 1, 3, 23 P.2d 819; People v. Neel, 133 Cal.App. 332, 333, 24 P.2d 230; People v. Noone, 132 Cal.App. 89, 92, 22 P.2d 284; People v. Bentson, 132 Cal.App. 295, 298, 22 P.2d 734; People v. Patello, 125 Cal. App. 480, 487, 13 P.2d 1068; People v. De Voe, 123 Cal.App. 233, 237, 11 P.2d 26; In re De Voe, 114 Cal.App. 730, 300 P. 874; People v. Hartman, 23 Cal.App. 72, 75, 137 P. 611; see, also, Birnbaum v. United States, 4 Cir., 107 F.2d 885, 126 A.L.R. 1210; 117 A.L.R. 929. While there appears to be justification for holding that the right of appeal exists in the one case and not in the other, it would seem that the legislature might well consider the desirability of according to the defendant a right of appeal in either case.

An application for probation is directed to the matter of punishment and not to the matter of guilt. If there is a serious question regarding the sufficiency of the evidence to establish the guilt of the defendant or a serious question regarding the fairness of the trial in which he was found guilty, it would seem appropriate that a defendant should not be deprived of his right of appeal by applying for probation and by the granting thereof without the imposition of sentence. It appears that trial courts ordinarily have no occasion to consider the distinction between the two procedures permitted in granting probation and that it might be deemed good policy by the legislature to provide by statute that any order placing a defendant upon probation under either procedure should be deemed a "judgment of conviction" for the purposes of appeal and for the purposes of section 6102 of the Business and Professions Code.

SHENK, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

In this proceeding the majority has departed from the rule followed in this state for over half a century. In fact, never in the history of this court has a judgment that has been reversed or otherwise set aside been permitted to form the basis of a summary order of disbarment under the statute. That the conclusions of the main opinion are unsupported by and are contrary to the uniform holdings in similar cases will more fully appear from the following discussion of the case:

The petitioner was admitted to the bar of this state on July 22, 1915. In 1937 he was charged in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles in two counts with violation of section 311 of the Penal Code, a misdemeanor. On July 1 of that year he was convicted on both counts and sentenced to serve one hundred and eighty days in the city jail. Upon a certificate of the record of his conviction, presented by the secretary of the State Bar, this court on July 13, 1937, suspended the petitioner from the practice of the law until the judgment should become final. That order of suspension has not been formally set aside, and is not affected by the present proceeding. The petitioner appealed from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered by the Appellate Department of the Superior Court. On a retrial the petitioner was found guilty on the same two counts, and the court on December 23, 1937, sentenced him to imprisonment in the city jail for one hundred and eighty days. As a part of the same order the court suspended the execution of the judgment and placed the petitioner on probation on condition that he serve one hundred and seventy-five days in the city jail. He appealed from that judgment on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support the conviction. The judgment was affirmed on March 1, 1938. Upon a certificate of the second judgment of conviction, which included said probationary order, this court on April 5, 1938, ordered the petitioner disbarred. He satisfied the terms of his probation and, on his application, the trial court on October 10, 1939, set aside the verdict of guilty and dismissed the accusation under the authority of section 1203.4 of the Penal Code.

Thereafter, the petitioner filed the present petition to set aside the order of disbarment of April 5, 1938, on the ground that the order of the trial court setting aside the verdict and dismissing the criminal action pursuant to said section 1203.4 had released him from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the offense of which he had been convicted, and that there was, therefore, no final judgment of conviction upon which an order of disbarment had been or could be based.

The petitioner relies first on the Penal Code section and on In re Herron, 217 Cal. 400, 19 P.2d 4. The code section provides that when the defendant has fulfilled the conditions of his probation "the court shall set aside the verdict of guilty; and * * * shall thereupon dismiss the accusation or information against such defendant, who shall thereafter be released from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the offense or crime of which he has been convicted". Neither the language of the code section which we have italicized nor In re Herron, supra, when properly applied in the light of the subsequent case In re Lavine, 2 Cal.2d 324, 41 P.2d 161, affords support for the granting of the petition on the ground first urged. On this point there is no disagreement here. The disagreement is on the question whether under the statutes and decisions in this state there is in this proceeding a final judgment on which a summary order of disbarment can be based.

There are two well-recognized statutory methods of disciplining members of the bar in this state. Both are set forth in articles 1 to 9 inclusive of chapter 4 of the Business and Professions Code, which chapter is called the State Bar Act. One method is provided for in article 5 under the heading "Disciplinary Authority of the Board of Governors". Sections 6075–6087 of the State Bar Act; Deering's California Codes, General Laws and Constitution, 1939, p. 519. Under this article and the rules of professional conduct adopted thereunder, the procedure is provided for initiating and conducting disciplinary proceedings against members of the bar through the medium of accusation, notice and hearing before committees of the State Bar and its board of governors, culminating in a recommendation to this court that the accused be subjected to the discipline suggested, with opportunity afforded for review by this court of the order of recommendation. This methed is entirely independent of any prior court proceeding.

The second method is prescribed in article 6 of said chapter 4, under the heading "Disciplinary Authority of the Courts". Sections 6100–6118 of the State Bar Act; Deering's California Codes, General Laws and Constitution, 1939, p. 521. Here it may be said that the codification in 1939 of the State Bar Act and the former sections of the Code of Civil Procedure effected no substantive change in the law as it formerly existed, at least so far as the disciplinary power of the courts is concerned.

Section 6101 of the State Bar Act provides: "Conviction of a felony or misdemeanor, involving moral turpitude, constitutes a cause for disbarment or suspension as provided in section 6102. The record of conviction shall be conclusive evidence and the clerk of the court in which the conviction is had shall, within thirty days thereafter, transmit a certified copy of the record of conviction to the Supreme Court. The proceedings to disbar or suspend an attorney shall be undertaken by the court upon the receipt of the certified copy of the record of conviction. A plea or verdict of guilty is deemed to be a conviction within the meaning of this section."

Section 6102 provides: "Upon the receipt of the certified copy of the record of conviction of an attorney of a crime involving moral turpitude, the court shall suspend the attorney until judgment in the case becomes final. When a judgment of conviction becomes final, the court shall order the attorney disbarred. The other provisions of this article providing a procedure for the disbarment and suspension of an attorney do not apply to an attorney convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude, unless expressly made applicable."

Then follow sections of the same article having to do generally with disciplinary proceedings which may be instituted in court upon the information of another, and like proceedings initiated in the State Bar, which proceedings are carried forward on notice and with an opportunity on the part of the accused to be heard.

It will be noted that the proceedings for disbarment or suspension taken under sections 6101 and 6102 upon the filing of a certified copy of the record of conviction do not provide for notice to or for a hearing in behalf of the accused attorney. The statute itself, and that alone, is the authority of this court thus summarily to disbar or suspend an attorney found guilty of a crime involving moral turpitude. These statutory provisions, like their predecessors to like effect, §§ 287, 288, 289 and 299, Code of Civ.Proc., have always been deemed valid statutory regulations affecting the rights of members of the legal profession and as such binding upon the courts. See article on Disbarment and Suspension and cases cited, 3 Cal.Jur., p. 719 et seq.

The statute is too clear to admit of doubt that upon the presentation to the court of a certified copy of the "record of conviction" the power and duty of the court is to enter an order of suspension "until judgment in the case becomes final". When the judgment has become final it is then, and not until then, that the court has the power to enter a summary order of disbarment under the statute. The record of conviction may but does not necessarily include a judgment of conviction. Under section 6101 "a plea or verdict of guilty is deemed to be a conviction within the meaning of this section". Upon the certification of the record of a plea or verdict of guilty the court is authorized to enter an order of suspension. A judgment of conviction is not essential to the validity of such an order. In re De Voe, 114 Cal. App. 730, 300 P. 874. In a criminal case the sentence is the judgment. Section 1191 of the Penal Code provides: "After a plea or verdict of guilty * * * the court must appoint a time for pronouncing judgment which must not be less than two, nor more than five days after the verdict or plea of guilty * * * and provided, further, that the court may extend the time not more than twenty days in any case when the question of probation is considered in accordance with section 1203 of this code * * *." The terms "judgment" and "sentence" in criminal cases appear to have been used interchangeably. See Matter of Smith, 152 Cal. 566, 93 P. 191; 8 Cal.Jur., p. 448, et seq. The sentence is, therefore, the judgment from which an appeal may be taken under section 1237 of the Penal Code, even though an order of probation has been made. See Berman v. United States, 302 U.S. 211, 58 S.Ct. 164, 82 L.Ed. 204.

Since a judgment of conviction that has become final is the only basis upon which an order of disbarment may be made under the statute, it is necessary to consider whether the judgment certified to this court was a final judgment of conviction as contemplated by the statute, for, as said by this court in In re Herron, supra, 217 Cal. at page 402, 19 P.2d at page 5, "if the conviction has become final and has not been set aside, this court, under sections 287 and 299 of the Code of Civil Procedure, has no election, but must disbar respondent".

The means by which a judgment of conviction may be "set aside" are well recognized. A conviction, that is, a verdict of guilty, may be set aside by an order granting a new trial pursuant to section 1181 of the Penal Code. This usually takes place before a judgment is pronounced. After sentence the judgment of conviction may be set aside on appeal pursuant to section 1237 of the Penal Code, by certiorari or habeas corpus when the judgment is void, and by order of court pursuant to section 1203.4 of the Penal Code when the defendant has been placed on probation and has complied with the terms of the order of probation. Not only this, but when the terms of probation have been complied with the court is authorized, as was done in this matter, to dismiss the action against the defendant.

What, then, are the powers of the trial court under sections 1203, 1203.1 and 1203.4 of the Penal Code? Under section 1203, the court, after a plea or verdict of guilty, is authorized to enter an order placing the defendant on probation. Under this order, and pursuant to section 1203.1, the court "may suspend the imposing, or the execution of the sentence". If the court suspends the "imposing" of sentence and places the defendant on probation, there is then no judgment of conviction, and although new trial proceedings may be taken, no right on the part of the defendant to take an appeal from the verdict or from that order of probation is provided for. However, "conviction" is present and a suspension from practice of a defendant attorney is authorized, but there is yet no final or any judgment of conviction upon which to base an order of disbarment. Again, if the court suspends the "execution of the sentence", a sentence or judgment necessarily preceded that order; and from such a judgment the right of appeal has uniformly been recognized. The petitioner in the present matter availed himself of that right. Whether the imposition of sentence be suspended or the execution of sentence be suspended, there is no finality to the proceeding or the judgment which is not subject to be disturbed by order of court under the statute at an appropriate time after the terms of probation have been complied with. That is to say, in the one case no judgment at all is entered, and in the other there is no judgment of conviction except one which may be set aside upon the happening of a condition subsequent and under specific statutory authority.

But it does not follow that the order of probation has placed the defendant-attorney beyond the pale of disciplinary action. It is not and should not be within the power of the trial court by an order of probation to relieve a member of the bar convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude of accountability arising out of his professional misconduct. However, the order of probation may affect and in the present matter has affected the summary power of this court to disbar him. Upon a plea or verdict of guilty on a charge involving moral turpitude this court is authorized and is bound to enter an order of suspension. The fact that a judgment of conviction may not be entered or that the execution of the judgment may be suspended in pursuance of an order of probation, or that the criminal proceeding may ultimately be dismissed, does not enable the attorney to avoid disciplinary proceedings, for there is ample authority for the State Bar to proceed against him independently of the court proceeding and to recommend to this court appropriate discipline either of suspension from practice or disbarment. A record of conviction or a judgment of conviction has never been a condition precedent to disbarment or suspension. In Shafer v. State Bar, 215 Cal. 706, 12 P.2d 957, the attorney had been convicted of an offense involving moral turpitude, judgment of conviction had been entered, and he had been placed on probation. A copy of the judgment of conviction was certified to this court and an order of suspension was made until said judgment "shall have become final". During Shafer's period of probation and temporary suspension, in fact, within a week after the period of probation commenced, the State Bar proceeded against him to redetermine for itself the same issues involved in the criminal proceeding. As a result of this independent proceeding, the board of governors recommended Shafer's suspension for the period of three years. In the proceeding brought by Shafer to review the order of recommendation, this court held that the judgment of conviction was not a bar to an independent investigation and recommendation by the State Bar based on the same facts involved in the criminal case. This court followed the recommendation of the State Bar and entered another order of suspension for the period so recommended.

In Re Hatch, 10 Cal.2d 147, 73 P.2d 885, it was said: "The State Bar is not deprived of jurisdiction in disciplinary proceedings to enquire into the fitness of an attorney to practice when a record of his conviction is on file with the court under section 287 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Shafer v. State Bar, 215 Cal. 706, 12 P.2d 957."

A further review of the cases in this state discloses a uniformity in decision in harmony with the foregoing. It is stated by counsel for the petitioner, is not disputed by counsel for the State Bar, and is supported by our research, that this court has never entered an order of disbarment in any case where the defendant-attorney has been placed on probation, with the single exception of the order now sought to be set aside.

It has been and is the settled law of this state that a valid, final judgment of conviction of an offense involving moral turpitude is a necessary prerequisite to the entry of an order of disbarment by this court based solely on a certified copy of the judgment of conviction. It was held in Re Riccardi, 182 Cal. 675, 189 P. 694, decided in April, 1920, that this court had no authority to disbar an attorney under sections 287–299 of the Code of Civil Procedure "on the receipt of a certified copy of the record of conviction" when it appeared as a conceded fact that an appeal from the judgment of conviction was pending; that the statute meant that a final judgment of conviction was necessary as a basis for the order, and that while the appeal was pending the judgment was not final. After the decision in that case, the legislature in 1921, by an amendment of section 288, added the last sentence, to wit: "a plea or verdict of guilty is deemed to be a conviction within the meaning of this section", and likewise amended section 299 to provide that upon the presentation of a certified copy of the record of "conviction", as defined in section 288, the attorney must be suspended and that he must be disbarred when the "judgment" of conviction has become final. The court in the Riccardi case reviewed the prior cases over a period of some thirty-five years, and refused, notwithstanding the earnest insistence of counsel for the Bar Association, to disturb the uniform rule. The amendments of 1921 served to settle the question of legislative intent in conformity with what the court held was the proper construction of the statute.

In no case has it been held that the judgment of conviction referred to in section 6102 of the State Bar Act was final when an appeal therefrom was pending, or when the defendant had been placed on probation either by suspending the imposition or the execution of sentence. Nor has such a judgment of conviction been deemed final, although affirmed on appeal, where in subsequent proceedings the judgment was held to be void. In contemplation of the fact that a judgment of conviction, when followed by a probationary order, might be set aside by the court pursuant to section 1203.4 of the Penal Code, this court has uniformly proceeded on the theory that such a judgment is not a final judgment authorizing summary disbarment under section 6102 of the State Bar Act.

In Re Jacobsen, 202 Cal. 289, 260 P. 294, it appeared that Jacobsen, an attorney at law, had been convicted of a felony involving moral turpitude. He took no appeal. This court said that "in that regard" the judgment of conviction had become final. The clerk of the trial court transmitted to this court a certified copy of the record of conviction. But the trial court had placed Jacobsen on probation. This court did not disbar him, as counsel for the State Bar insisted should be done, but suspended him from practice until the further order of the court, plainly indicating that by reason of the provisions of section 1203 of the Penal Code as it then existed (now section 1203.4) the judgment of conviction had not become final.

In Re Herron, 217 Cal. 400, 19 P.2d 4, it appeared that Herron had been convicted of a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, and had been sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail; but the trial court suspended the execution of the sentence. On presentation of the record this court issued its order directing Herron to show cause why he should not be disbarred. It was held that the order suspending the sentence was equivalent to an order of probation. This court declined to order disbarment, and discharged the order to show cause.

In Re Hatch, 10 Cal.2d 147, 73 P.2d 885, attorney Hatch was found guilty of violations of the Corporate Securities Act, and was placed on probation. A certified copy of the record of the convictions was transmitted to this court. While the main point in the case was whether the offenses of which the attorney had been found guilty involved moral turpitude, it was not questioned that if it should be determined that they were of that character an order of disbarment would not necessarily follow.

Numerous other cases are cited by petitioner wherein orders of suspension were entered after the attorney, defendant in the criminal action, had been placed on probation. Those orders were made upon the presentation of a certified copy of the records of conviction. A few of them are: Matters of suspension of C. M. Gill, Misc. 1536; J. B. Mandel, Misc. 1543; A. R. Hemm, Misc. 1546; D. F. Wisdom, Misc. 1564; J. W. Lenahan, Misc. 1599; and L. G. Stanford, Misc. 1603.

In Re Rothrock, 14 Cal.2d 34, 92 P.2d 634, it appeared that Rothrock, an attorney at law, had been charged on two counts of attempted murder and on a third count with assault with a deadly weapon. The court sitting without a jury found him guilty on all three counts. Before judgment was pronounced the court set aside the verdict. On appeal by the People the order was reversed and the cause remanded with instructions to enter judgment of conviction. People v. Rothrock, 8 Cal.2d 21, 63 P.2d 807. On appeal from the judgment so entered the judgment was affirmed. People v. Rothrock, 21 Cal.App.2d 116, 68 P.2d 364. Upon the certificate of the record of conviction an order of disbarment was entered on June 21, 1937. Notwithstanding the judgment of affirmance this court later held that said judgment was ineffective and ordered a new trial. In re Rothrock, 14 Cal.2d 34, 92 P.2d 634. On August 23, 1939, this court entered an order vacating and setting aside the order of disbarment on the ground that said order "lacked the necessary foundation to support it, to-wit, a valid final judgment of conviction". Minutes of this court, August 23, 1939, 98 Cal.Dec. I. The several proceedings in the Rothrock case are referred to in support of the conclusion that even an affirmance on appeal is not necessarily conclusive of the finality of a judgment of conviction. If an order of disbarment may be set aside because of a determination that no valid judgment had ever been entered, it would follow, in the present matter, that the order of disbarment of petitioner should be set aside because the judgment which was entered has been set aside under specific statutory authority, and there is now no valid or any judgment to support it.

By the main opinion this court has by implication overruled its prior decisions which are in point in the petitioner's favor, and in doing so has departed from the uniform practice and decision in this state. It has constituted the order of disbarment here involved, an arbitrary assumption of power not justified by constitutional or statutory authority. No considerations of public policy are apparent which would justify a departure from the established standards. The principles of justice would also best be served by proceeding independently of the court action on notice and an opportunity to be heard in cases where orders of probation have been made in criminal cases. Probation, as distinguished from parole, is not solely concerned with rehabilitation. It is authorized in common recognition of the fact that circumstances of mitigation may have attended the commission of the offense, which should, in the discretion of the trial court, relieve the defendant of the rigors of the punishment which would otherwise be imposed.

Furthermore, the ruling of the majority will result in a lack of uniformity in disciplinary proceedings. It will mean that in court proceedings, when the trial judge finds mitigating circumstances sufficient to place the defendant on probation and later to set aside the judgment of conviction, the defendant-attorney must nevertheless be subjected to summary disbarment, notwithstanding the board of governors of the State Bar might, in the presence of like mitigating circumstances, recommend only suspension, or this court on the same record refuse to enter an order of disbarment. It will also mean that the power of this court to enter an order of disbarment under section 6102 will depend on the too uncertain contingency of whether the trial court in granting probation had suspended the "imposition" or the "execution" of sentence, for in the one case no order of disbarment may properly be made, and in the other an order of disbarment would have to be made.

There are numerous instances where a member of the bar has been found guilty of an offense involving moral turpitude by the board of governors of the State Bar and has been recommended for suspension only. The Shafer case is one of them. Some of the other and more recent cases are: Methever v. State Bar, 12 Cal.2d 230, 82 P.2d 1109; Waterman v. State Bar, 8 Cal. 2d 17, 63 P.2d 1133; and Jacobs v. State Bar, 219 Cal. 59, 63, 64, 25 P.2d 401. See, also, Disbarment of Richardson, Cal.Sup., 102 P.2d 1076, in which the rule in the Shafer case was approved.

There is no necessity to lay down extended rules of procedure in cases where an attorney in a criminal action has been convicted of an offense involving moral turpitude and has been placed on probation. The established practice is the certification of the record of conviction to this court, which is followed by a summary order of suspension, at least until the further order of the court. The State Bar then is authorized to proceed, as it did in the Shafer case, and without further or any delay, to initiate disciplinary proceedings independently of the court proceeding and after notice to the accused and an opportunity to be heard, to make its findings, and submit its recommendation to this court for such an order as it deems appropriate.

From the foregoing it would follow that the order of disbarment entered against the petitioner on April 5, 1938, should be set aside. And, although the State Bar has the authority to so proceed without a reference, it would be appropriate in this case to refer the matter of further disciplinary action to the board of governors of the State Bar for investigation and for such recommendation as it may deem proper in the premises.

I concur: HOUSER, J.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

I am in entire accord with everything contained in the masterful dissenting opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Shenk and I unqualifiedly concur in the views expressed by him therein.

To my mind it is nothing short of paradoxical to say that an order of disbarment can be predicated upon a plea or verdict of guilty which has been vacated and set aside or upon a judgment which is no longer in existence. Such is the legal effect of the conclusion reached in the majority opinion in this case.

Section 1203.4 of the Penal Code provides:

"Every defendant who has fulfilled the conditions of his probation for the entire period thereof, or who shall have been discharged from probation prior to the termination of the period thereof, shall at any time prior to the expiration of the maximum period of punishment for the offense of which he has been convicted, dating from said discharge from probation of said termination of said period of probation, be permitted by the court to withdraw his plea of guilty and enter a plea of not guilty; or if he has been convicted after a plea of not guilty, the court shall set aside the verdict of guilty; and in either case the court shall thereupon dismiss the accusation or information against such defendant, who shall thereafter be released from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the offense or crime of which he has been convicted."

When the foregoing provision has been complied with, the clear and unqualified legal effect is that there is no plea or verdict establishing the guilt of the defendant, and even the accusation or information upon which such plea or verdict could be predicated has been dismissed. How it is possible to predicate an order or judgment of disbarment upon such a plea or verdict is beyond my comprehension.

Not only is the legal conclusion reached by the majority opinion astounding, but its practical effect is even shocking. An attorney who would enter a plea of guilty of a violation of section 476a of the Penal Code for issuing a check overdrawing his bank account $1.00 and is granted probation would be automatically disbarred. Whereas, if disciplinary proceedings were instituted against said attorney before the State Bar, the discipline, if any, administered to him, would probably not exceed that of a short period of suspension or reprimand. The lack of uniformity in discipline resulting from the application of the rule announced in the majority opinion is so shocking that the necessity for an immediate change in the provisions of sections 6101 and 6102 of the Business and Professions Code should appeal very forcibly to the members of the Legislature, to the end that disbarment thereunder be not permitted in cases where probation is granted and the conditions thereof fulfilled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Harvey E. Bailey, Sr., deceased, wherein Delya Linstrum filed a petition against Clyde E. Cate, executor, to require the executor to convey property to her in accordance with the terms of her agreement with the deceased. From an order directing executor to convey the property, the executor appeals.

Order affirmed.

J. G. Crichton and Ralph Robinson, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Julius Hansen, Dearing & Jertberg, and Kenneth G. Avery, all of Fresno, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

Harvey E. Bailey, Sr., was the owner of a parcel of real property subject to an indebtedness secured by a trust deed on which he was personally liable. He agreed, in writing, to sell the property to Delya Linstrum, agreeing to pay off this incumbrance in accordance with the terms of the trust deed and then to convey the property to her. After his death the full amount of the incumbrance became due under the terms of the trust deed. Mrs. Linstrum, having fully performed her part of the contract, filed a petition asking that the executor of Bailey's estate be directed to pay off the trust deed and convey to her a clear title to the property in accordance with the terms of the agreement.

The executor filed an "objection" to the petition alleging, among other things, that the full amount of the trust deed indebtedness was not due and that no claim for the amount thereof had been presented or filed. The court found in all respects in favor of the petitioner, finding, however, that no claim for the trust deed indebtedness had been presented or filed. An order was entered directing the executor to convey the property to the petitioner free and clear of the trust deed indebtedness, from which order this appeal was taken.

The effect of the order was to require and direct the executor to pay off the trust deed incumbrance and to convey a clear title to the property to the respondent in accordance with the purchase agreement. The sole point raised on this appeal is that the court was without authority to make this order because no "creditor's claim" for the amount of the trust deed indebtedness had been presented or filed, and that the payment thereof was forever barred by the provisions of section 707 of the Probate Code. The appellant contends that this was a debt of the deceased arising upon contract, and that it was incumbent upon the respondent to present and file a creditor's claim as required by section 707 of the Probate Code. In support thereof cases are cited in which it has been held that contingent claims based upon contracts of indemnity or warranty come within the purview of this statute requiring the presentation and filing of a claim.

[1-3] We are not here concerned with any warranty or other contract under which any money was owed to the respondent. Under the terms of the contract, by which the decedent agreed to sell this property to the respondent, the amount of this incumbrance was not to be paid to her and the amount thereof is not a debt due to her from the estate. The decedent had agreed to convey the property to her free and clear of this incumbrance and the effect of that part of the contract giving him the right to pay off the incumbrance as the installments came due was merely to give him additional time within which to clear his title. Under the terms of the agreement this additional time had expired and the respondent was entitled to the conveyance of the property, with a clear title. This she applied for under the provisions of section 850 of the Probate Code. The proceeding therein provided for is similar to and, in practical effect, is an action for specific performance. Estate of Garnier, 147 Cal. 457, 82 P. 68. Had the decedent been still alive there is no question the respondent would have been entitled to maintain such an action. An executor ought to complete a contract made by his testator. Estate of Fulmer, 203 Cal. 693, 265 P. 920, 58 A.L.R. 430. The amount of this incumbrance was not a debt owed to the respondent and the payment thereof was an incident to clearing the title which the decedent had agreed to convey. The respondent was in no position to file a claim therefor and even the holder of the trust deed was not required to file a claim in order to enforce his lien as against the specific property. Sec. 716, Probate Code.

[4,5] In Mix v. Yoakum, 200 Cal. 681, 254 P. 557, 558, the court said: "There is a clear distinction between the cause of action of one who claims specific property held and claimed by the estate adversely to the claimant and a cause of action founded upon a claim against the estate. In the one case the claimant is in no sense a creditor of the estate, and in the other he occupies the position of a creditor." One who claims as his own specific property held by an estate cannot be called a creditor of the estate. Estate of Dutard, 147 Cal. 253, 81 P. 519; Newport v. Hatton, 195 Cal. 132, 231 P. 987. In an action against the executor of an estate to recover specific real property as the owner thereof it is not necessary to file a claim. Cohn v. Cohn, 100 Cal.App. 746, 281 P. 504. In Porter v. Van Denburgh, 15 Cal.2d 173, 99 P.2d 265, it is held, in effect, that a claim need not be filed where the plaintiff's claim is one of ownership and not for the recovery of a part of the estate of a decedent. The proceeding here was one to obtain specific property, to which the respondent was entitled, and not one to recover on a claim against the general assets of the estate. See, also, Trower v. Young, Cal. App., 105 P.2d 160.

[6,7] We conclude, therefore that the respondent was not a creditor or a claimant within the meaning and effect of section 707 of the Probate Code, that the requirements of that section had no application here, and that under the provisions of section 850 of that Code the court was authorized and empowered to make the order and decree here appealed from.

No error being brought to our attention, the order is affirmed, the respondent to recover her costs on this appeal.

We concur: MARKS, J.; GRIFFIN, J.

McCALLA v. GROSSE et al.

Civ. 12714.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

1. Automobiles ⇐238(2)

Under complaint alleging that defendants owned and had control over automobile which was registered in codefendant's name to avoid liability for injuries resulting from operation of automobile, and that defendants furnished codefendant funds and knowingly permitted codefendant, who was allegedly incompetent as a driver, to drive automobile, and that codefendant carelessly operated automobile with result that plaintiff was injured, plaintiff was entitled to judgment against defendants, if plaintiff proved allegations. Vehicle Code, § 402, St.1937, p. 2353.

2. Automobiles ⇐192(1)

Under statute providing that owner of an automobile shall be liable for injuries resulting from negligence in operation of automobile by any person using or operating automobile with owner's permission, it was legislative intent to make actual owners of automobiles liable for negligence of those to whom permission is given to drive automobiles. Vehicle Code, § 402, St.1937, p. 2353.

3. Automobiles ⇐238(2)

A complaint alleging that defendants knowingly permitted their automobile to be registered in name of and to be driven by a person who was unfit to drive upon highways, that defendants knew that such person in driving automobile would endanger lives of others using highways, and that defendants furnished the person funds to purchase gasoline and oil was sufficient as against demurrer, irrespective of statute concerning liability of owners of automobiles, since allegations brought case within rule that one who knowingly permits an unfit driver to use his automobile is liable for damages caused by negligent acts of driver in operation of automobile. Vehicle Code, § 402, St.1937, p. 2353.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action by E. E. McCalla against John G. Grosse and others to recover damages for injuries allegedly suffered when plaintiff was struck by an automobile driven by defendant John G. Grosse and alleged to be owned by defendants Stover, wherein a judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against defendant John G. Grosse in the sum of $9,000. From a judgment sustaining the demurrer of defendants Stover to the third amended complaint without leave to amend, and dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with directions to overrule demurrer.

W. M. Greathouse, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. E. Crowley, of Ontario, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action to recover damages for injuries which he suffered when on November 25, 1938, he was struck by an automobile driven by defendant Grosse and alleged to be owned by defendant Stover. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against defendant Grosse in the sum of $9,000 but the demurrer of defendants Stover to the third amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend and the action was dismissed as to them. The appeal is prosecuted from the judgment of dismissal.

From the allegations of the complaint it appears that prior to the accident in question defendants Stover were doing business as automobile dealers and that on November 18, 1938, they received the automobile driven by defendant Grosse as part payment on the purchase price of an automobile which they sold to one Bertrand Close; that after the sale to Close "defendants Stover were the owners of and used said automobile as a family car". A new certificate of ownership was issued by the motor vehicle department showing Mae G. Stover to be the new owner of the car and a certificate of registration was issued showing the registered owner to be John G. Grosse. It is further alleged "that no chattel mortgage, conditional sale contract, or other evidence showing Mae G. Stover to be owner for security purposes was ever recorded with said motor vehicle department; that the record ownership of said automobile has continued in the same parties without change since said November 18, 1938, * * * that the said defendants Stover did thereupon permit said defendant Grosse the use of said automobile and caused the same to be registered in his name for the sole purpose of avoiding liability for injuries which might result from the operation of said automobile by the said defendant John G. Grosse, and that despite said registration in the name of John G. Grosse the said defendants Stover were at the time said accident occurred the true owners of said automobile".

In paragraph 2 of the amended complaint plaintiff makes the following allegations: "That plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that at all times mentioned herein said defendant John G. Grosse was and now is an aged and enfeebled man more than eighty (80) years of age, with eyesight so defective he could not see a distance of more than 25 feet; that by reason of such defective eyesight, together with the infirmities of his age, said defendant was at all such times an incompetent and unfit person to operate a motor vehicle on the public highways of the state of California. That plaintiff is further informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that during the year 1937 said defendant Grosse, by reason of his aged and enfeebled condition became incapable of taking care of business matters, and at such time said defendants Stover did undertake to care for and provide a home for said defendant so long as he lived; that from such time the said defendant Grosse has made his home with the said defendants Stover, and had been entirely dependent upon said defendants Stover for his care and support; that since such time said defendant Grosse has had no source of income or funds other than said defendants Stover; that said defendant Grosse is by blood relation an uncle to said defendant Mrs. Robert L. Stover. That plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that by reason of the dependency of the said defendant Grosse on said defendants Stover for a home and for funds for every purpose the said defendants Stover did at all times mentioned herein have complete control over the operation of an automobile on public highways by the said defendant Grosse; that said defendants Stover at all such times have had full knowledge of the matters and facts in this paragraph alleged."

It is further alleged that defendants Stover, notwithstanding their knowledge that defendant Grosse was incompetent and unfit to operate a motor vehicle on the public highways and notwithstanding their knowledge that the lives of persons using the highways would be endangered by the operation of the automobile in question by defendant Grosse did nevertheless permit defendant Grosse to operate the automobile upon the public highways and did furnish him with funds to purchase gasoline and oil for the automobile; that defendant Grosse did carelessly operate the automobile with the result that plaintiff suffered the injuries for which compensation is sought.

[1] We are satisfied that if plaintiff could prove the allegations set forth in his complaint he would be entitled to judgment against defendants Stover under the provisions of section 402 of the California Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 2353, as in force at the time of the accident. This section provides in part: "Every owner of a motor vehicle is liable and responsible for the death of or injury to person or property resulting from negligence in the operation of such motor vehicle, in the business of such owner or otherwise, by any person using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner, and the negligence of such person shall be imputed to the owner for all purposes of civil damages. * * * If a motor vehicle is sold under a contract of conditional sale whereby the title to such motor vehicle remains in the vendor, such vendor or his assignee shall not be deemed an owner, within the provisions of this section, but the vendee, or his assignee shall be deemed the owner notwithstanding the terms of such contract, until the vendor or his assignee retake possession of such motor vehicle. A chattel mortgagee of a motor vehicle out of possession shall not be deemed an owner within the provisions of this section."

[2] The complaint contains clear and positive allegations of ownership in defendants Stover. The provisions of section 402 of the Vehicle Code have long been a part of the law of this state and have given rise to several decisions by reviewing courts. In Bunch v. Kin, 2 Cal. App.2d 81, 37 P.2d 744, it was held that the owner who became liable for the negligent acts of the person permitted to use an automobile on the streets was the "registered owner". The statute in force at the time of the decision in that case was substantially the same as section 402 of the Vehicle Code and it was held that the provision that the vendor under a conditional sale contract prior to repossession of the car was not to be deemed the owner under the section showed the legislative intent to make the registered owner the party liable. This was a logical conclusion since the vendor in such a contract does not have possession while the vendee, the registered owner, is the party who uses the automobile and should be liable for its operation. It was not held, however, that the true and actual owner of an automobile can be relieved from liability by the expedient of registration in the name of another. Such a situation is governed by the general provision fixing the liability of owners. It is clear that it was the legislative intent to make the actual owners of automobiles liable for the negligence of those to whom permission is given to drive them. According to the allegations of the complaint defendants Stover were in fact the true owners of the car and had control of it, the registration being in the name of defendant Grosse for the purpose of avoiding liability.

[3] The complaint may be upheld without the aid of section 402 of the Vehicle Code. Allegations of ultimate facts are made that defendants Stover knowingly permitted the automobile to be registered in the name of and to be driven by a man who was unfit to drive it upon the public highways; that they knew that defendant Grosse in driving the car would endanger the lives of persons using the highways; and that they furnished funds to him for the purpose of purchasing gas and oil. These allegations bring the case within the rule that one who knowingly permits an unfit driver to use his automobile is liable for damages caused by the negligent acts of the unfit driver in the operation of the car. In Rocca v. Steinmetz, 61 Cal.App. 102, 214 P. 257, 260, a demurrer was sustained to the complaint and from the judgment of dismissal the plaintiff appealed. It was alleged in the complaint that Steinmetz, Jr., was a careless and reckless person and a careless and reckless driver and that his father, the defendant, having such knowledge, negligently permitted him to drive the car. In reversing the judgment the reviewing court said that it would shock the common understanding to hold that a man would not be chargeable with negligence if he should entrust his car to a person whom he knew to be insane or intoxicated or utterly incompetent to run a car and further said that there was "no difference in principle but only in degree, where he knows the driver to be careless and reckless in the operation of the machine". In Owens v. Carmichael's U-Drive Autos. Inc., 116 Cal. App. 348, 2 P.2d 580, the defendant, which was in the business of renting cars, rented a car to one Watson who negligently drove it and struck the plaintiff. The plaintiff sought to impose liability on the defendant as owner by alleging that the defendant "negligently let and hired" the automobile to Watson; that the defendant "negligently permitted Watson to drive and operate said automobile upon the highway"; that "defendant knew * * * that said Max Watson was not competent to operate" said automobile; and "that said Max Watson was not licensed to drive or operate any automobile upon such highway". In holding that the trial court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant the reviewing court held that the allegations of the complaint were sufficient on the theory that "liability may be imposed upon an owner who negligently intrusts his automobile to another". The court pointed out that "such negligence is most frequently predicated upon the fact that an owner knowingly intrusts his car to an incompetent person * * *".

The judgment is reversed and the superior court is directed to overrule the demurrer.

POWERS v. CHERRY.

Civ. 12185.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 21, 1941.

1. Trial ⇐142

A trial court is not justified in directing verdict, unless, as matter of law, no other reasonable conclusion is legally deducible from evidence and any other holding would be so lacking in evidentiary support that appellate court would be impelled to reverse it or trial court to set it aside.

2. Trial ⇐142

An inference of truth of facts essential to cause of action will support judgment in accordance with such facts, and ultimate question of weight to be accorded evidence is for exclusive original determination by jury, though trial judge believes that evidence to contrary of such inference greatly preponderates.

3. Automobiles ⇐245(6)

In action for injuries to pedestrian struck by defendant's automobile, evidence that defendant saw plaintiff walking toward automobile along edge of debris on boulevard, when 150 feet away, but continued to drive forward, without keeping plaintiff in view, and swerved toward him or changed course of automobile within 40 feet of place of collision, was sufficient to take to jury question of defendant's negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward R. Brand, Judge.

Action by Olin W. Powers against Ralph Cherry for personal injuries. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Murchison & Clopton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Elbert E. Hensley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for personal injuries received by appellant on or about the 5th day of March, 1938, while walking along Ventura boulevard near its intersection with Vineland avenue, and is based upon the alleged negligent operation of an automobile by respondent. At the conclusion of appellant's case respondent moved for a nonsuit which motion was by the court denied. At the conclusion of the trial the court on respondent's motion directed a verdict in his favor and denied appellant's motion for a new trial. This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment which was thereafter entered pursuant to said directed verdict, as well as from the order denying a new trial.

The facts which form the basis of the instant litigation are as follows: Ventura boulevard in the city of Los Angeles extends in a general easterly and westerly direction and is approximately 70 feet wide between Lankershim boulevard on the east and Vineland avenue on the west. On March 5, 1938, as the result of extremely heavy rainstorms which had washed out bridges and interrupted transportation in the North Hollywood district, the described portion of Ventura boulevard was partially covered with sand, mud and other debris, and for some distance east and west thereof traffic was blocked off except for the cars of residents of the said district. Just north of and adjacent to Ventura boulevard in this area was a Pacific Electric Railway right of way and tracks which gradually circled away from the boulevard as it progressed westerly toward Vineland avenue where the tracks proceeded due north. At approximately 10 o'clock in the evening of said March 5th, appellant was on his way from his place of business to his home which was situated near Vineland avenue north of Ventura boulevard, and was walking westerly from Lankershim boulevard on the south side of Ventura boulevard, using a footpath slightly south of the south curb thereof. When he reached the M & M Auto Court which was two or three blocks west of his starting point, appellant crossed Ventura boulevard from the south to the north side, in order to reach the aforesaid Pacific Electric tracks which were higher than the surrounding terrain, were free from debris and mud, and furnished a direct route to appellant's home.

As he crossed to the northerly side of the boulevard, appellant encountered mud and debris which extended out into the highway from the northerly curb thereof, whereupon he turned and walked in an easterly direction for 15 or 20 feet along the edge of this debris which he testified was 6 or 7 feet south of said northerly curb, "looking for a place to get through the debris and get onto the track running parallel to the boulevard". As he was so walking in an easterly direction along the edge of this debris, appellant saw respondent's automobile approaching him from the east at a distance of 100 to 150 feet traveling almost in the center of the highway. When respondent's automobile was 30 or 40 feet from him, appellant testified that it swerved toward him and that he "jumped to get out of the way, or tried to run from it", and was hit on the back of his legs with the bumper of the automobile. He was thrown by the force of the impact, thereby sustaining painful and serious injuries.

Respondent testified that he was traveling westerly at a speed of thirty miles per hour on the northerly half of Ventura boulevard about 2 feet to the right of the double white line in the center thereof, preparatory to making a left-hand turn, his home being located on the south side of Ventura boulevard about a block west of the place where the accident occurred. He testified that mud, sand and debris extended from the north curb to the single white line in the center of said north half of the highway, or a distance of approximately 15 feet, and that, as he proceeded toward the point of impact, there was a space of from 3 to 5 feet between the right-hand side of his car and the edge of the debris; that when he was 150 or 170 feet east of the point of the impact he saw appellant, who appeared to be standing 5 or 6 feet south of the north curb; that a car had pulled out from the south curb near the M & M Auto Court and the lights from it shone across the boulevard so that respondent got a glimpse of appellant, who was dressed in light-colored clothing and was bareheaded; that when this parked car came out toward the center of the street it seemed to be making a "U" turn, and respondent took his foot off the gas and swung 3 or 4 feet to the north from the center of the boulevard to a point where he was partially astraddle the single white line which marked the center of said north half of Ventura boulevard. In making this operation, respondent traveled about 40 feet and did not again see appellant until the point of impact when he "saw a body just coming right directly in the car from the side, and it was just practically at the same moment of the impact"; that the impact occurred approximately 15 feet south of the north curb of Ventura boulevard and opposite the M & M Auto Court, at a point which he described as being 5 feet south of the edge of the debris; 5 feet north of the single white line in the center of the north half of the highway; that the distance between the right side of his car and the edge of the debris at the place of the impact was 5 or 6 feet. He also testified that he traveled 40 or 50 feet after the collision before he brought his car to a stop; that the impact threw appellant sidewise from the automobile and he was found lying on the edge of the debris. At the time and place in question there was no other traffic on the same side of the highway in the vicinity of respondent; his windshield was clear, his headlights were good and capable of illuminating objects for a distance of from 120 to 150 feet in advance of his machine, and the street lights in the vicinity were in operation. Furthermore, he testified that he at no time used his brakes from the time he first saw appellant at the edge of the pavement until the collision occurred.

[1] It is established law in this state with reference to the authority of a trial court to direct a verdict that, "Unless it can be said that, as a matter of law, no other reasonable conclusion is legally deducible from the evidence, and that any other holding would be so lacking in evidentiary support that an appellate court would be impelled to reverse it upon appeal or a trial court set it aside, a court is not justified in taking a case from a jury and itself rendering the decision." Gish v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 13 Cal.2d 570, 572, 90 P.2d 792, 793.

A review of the evidence herein shows that appellant was walking easterly along the edge of the debris on the north half of Ventura boulevard facing traffic traveling to the west; that respondent was 150 feet away when he first saw appellant at the side of the boulevard and that he thereafter continued to drive forward without keeping appellant in view. It is also shown that respondent either swerved toward appellant or changed the course of his automobile and that within 40 feet of such change of course the collision occurred.

The condition of the boulevard at the point in question was of a very unusual character because of the damage caused by the rainstorms, above referred to. The evidence is uncontradicted that appellant was on the north half of Ventura boulevard either walking directly on or very close to the edge of the mud and debris when he was first glimpsed by respondent, as well as at the time of the impact.

It is clear that the evidence adduced at the trial herein could as well support an inference of negligence on the part of respondent as one of contributory negligence on the part of appellant.

[2] As was so aptly stated in Gash v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., supra, 13 Cal.2d at page 583, 90 P.2d at page 799: "It is clear that an inference of the truth of facts essential to a cause of action will support a judgment which may be rendered in accordance with such facts. 19 Cal. Jur., pp. 704, 717. And although to the comprehension of a trial judge, evidence to the contrary of such an inference may greatly preponderate, nevertheless the ultimate question of the weight that should be accorded to the evidence which may have been presented by the respective parties to the litigation is one for the exclusive original determination by the jury."

[3] It follows that the jury in the instant case should not have been directed to return its verdict in favor of respondent.

The judgment is reversed. The appeal from the order denying motion for new trial is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fletcher Bowron, Judge.

Action for divorce by Winifred S. Windsor against James B. Windsor, wherein Ewing Mayfield was named co-respondent. From a judgment denying any relief, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

S. S. Hahn, W. O. Graf, and Stanton Rippey, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hanna & Morton and Thomas J. Cunningham, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SPENCE, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment denying her any relief in an action for divorce.

Plaintiff and defendant married in 1915. They separated in 1936. Thereafter defendant went to live in the state of Nevada, where he resided for a period slightly in excess of that required to obtain a divorce. While so residing in Nevada, defendant there filed an action for divorce and plaintiff employed an attorney in Los Angeles and authorized an attorney in Nevada to represent her in the Nevada action. A property settlement agreement was prepared by plaintiff's attorney in Los Angeles and was forwarded to Nevada for defendant's signature. Defendant signed said agreement and plaintiff filed an answer in the Nevada action and was represented by counsel at the trial thereof. A divorce decree was entered in the Nevada action on January 7, 1937, and the property settlement agreement was approved and made a part of said decree. Shortly thereafter defendant returned to the state of California and, on March 17, 1937, he married Ewing Mayfield in the state of Arizona. Plaintiff made no objection to the Nevada decree and she accepted the benefits of the property settlement and the monthly payments thereunder until the present action was commenced on December 29, 1937.

Plaintiff's complaint herein was in two counts. The first count charged desertion. The second count charged adultery, alleged to have been committed with Ewing Mayfield at times subsequent to the marriage of defendant and said Ewing Mayfield on March 17, 1937. No mention was made in the complaint of the Nevada decree. Defendant and said Ewing Mayfield filed separate answers setting up as defenses the Nevada decree and estoppel. The trial court found against plaintiff on the material allegations of her complaint and found in favor of the defendant on said defenses. Among the findings and conclusions of the trial court were those to the effect that defendant went to the state of Nevada with the intent to establish his residence there and resided in that state continuously for the period of time required by law to give the Nevada court jurisdiction; that defendant established a bona fide residence in the city of Reno, state of Nevada, and lived in said city and state for the period of time required by law prior to the filing of his divorce action; that the decree of the Nevada court "is now final and is valid and binding upon the parties to this action".

[1-3] Plaintiff contends that the evidence was insufficient to support these last mentioned findings but we find no merit in this contention. Defendant testified that he had desired for many years to acquire a ranch and live thereon; that he had discussed his desires with plaintiff on several occasions and that plaintiff would never agree to live on a ranch; that he went to Nevada shortly after their separation for the purpose of buying a ranch or trading his business for a ranch; that he gave up his residence in this state and took his belongings to Nevada; that he did not go to Nevada for the purpose of obtaining a divorce and that he did not make up his mind to get a divorce until after he had arrived there; that he remained in the state of Nevada continuously from the time he arrived there until his return to California after the granting of the Nevada decree; that he took an apartment in Reno and resided there during his stay in Nevada; that he traveled around the state of Nevada spending his time looking at ranches; that he was unable to trade his business for a ranch and did not acquire one. While there was other testimony elicited from defendant on cross-examination for the purpose of casting doubt on the question of defendant's intention in going to Nevada, we believe that the foregoing summary shows that there was substantial evidence to support the above mentioned findings of the trial court. The most that can be said is that under the evidence the trial court might have decided the disputed issue of fact either way and under such circumstances, an Appellate Court may not interfere after the trier of the facts has made its determination. Plaintiff cites and relies upon Warren v. Warren, 127 Cal.App. 231, 15 P.2d 556, but that case is not determinative here. The Appellate Court there upheld the finding of the trial court and the statement in the opinion that a contrary finding could not have been sustained is necessarily dicta. In any event, the facts of that case are quite different from those presented in the record before us.

In view of our conclusion that the findings and conclusions of the trial court relating to the validity of the Nevada decree were sustained by the evidence, it becomes unnecessary for us to discuss the question of whether plaintiff was estopped to question the validity of said decree.

The judgment is affirmed.

KEYES v. HURLBERT (DOUGLAS et al., Interveners).

Civ. 2602.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

1. Appeal and error ⇐801(4)

Where there is left any material or vital question for determination, the reviewing court should not dismiss the appeal, but should permit it to be heard on the merits.

2. Appeal and error ⇐801(4)

A reviewing court, as a matter of convenience for the expedition of business, will not grant motion to dismiss, involving an examination of the record, in advance of the hearing on the merits, and, if questions presented on such a motion involve the merits and are such as would be determined upon hearing of the case on the merits, reviewing court may deny the motion with the privilege of renewal at the hearing or continue the motion until hearing on the merits.

3. Appeal and error ⇐801(4)

Where, in order to make proper determination of issues presented on motion to dismiss appeal, it would be necessary to make an examination of record on main appeal, and an unqualified denial of motion might establish the law of the case in respect to points raised, and District Court of Appeal was convinced that the questions raised should be considered with questions raised on the appeal, the order of submission made in reference to the motion was set aside and motion was ordered replaced on calendar to be further heard and considered in connection with the appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Ernest Klette, Judge.

Action by Vincent G. Keyes against Elmer O. Hurlbert, executor, for specific performance of a contract entered into between Andrus Hurlbert, deceased, and others, and the defendant, wherein Lillian Douglas and others intervened. From an adverse decree, interveners appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal.

Order of submission made in reference to motion set aside, and motion ordered replaced on calendar to be further heard and considered in connection with appeal from the judgment.

Irvine P. Aten and Richard Aten, both of Fresno, for appellants.

B. M. Benson, of Fresno, for plaintiffs and respondents.

Dearing & Jertberg, of Fresno, for defendants and respondents.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

The appeal in the above entitled action was from a decree ordering specific performance by the executor, Elmer O. Hurlbert, of a contract entered into between decedent, Andrus Hurlbert, and his two partners, Vincent G. Keyes, the plaintiff and respondent, and Elmer O. Hurlbert, the defendant and respondent. By that judgment it was ordered that the defendant executor make, execute and deliver to the plaintiff a bill of sale covering the interest of the deceased Andrus Hurlbert, in and to a partnership known as "General Transfer Company", and also a deed to certain real property. It is now claimed on this motion to dismiss the appeal that the defendant Elmer O. Hurlbert, as executor of the will and estate of Andrus Hurlbert, deceased, since perfecting this appeal, complied with the terms of said judgment by executing the bill of sale and deed; that he did not appeal from the judgment; that appellants, the interveners, appealed from the decree; that the defendant Hurlbert, as executor, should have received more than $30,828.94, for the share of decedent (Andrus Hurlbert) in the partnership; that after appellants' appeal from the decree the defendant Elmer O. Hurlbert, as executor, filed his first account and report and that therein he reported to the Superior Court the receipt of the said sum above mentioned and the making of a bill of sale and deed to Vincent G. Keyes, as described in the judgment; that an order was made allowing and approving the amount and confirming and approving all of the acts of the executor; that the interveners had participated in the partial distribution that was made out of the funds of the estate, which funds included the sum of $30,828.94. It is therefore argued that appellants cannot accept the fruits of an indivisible judgment or decree and at the same time appeal from the decree, citing Turner v. Markham, 152 Cal. 246, 92 P. 485; In re Estate of Baby, 87 Cal. 200, 25 P. 405, 22 Am.St.Rep. 239; Estate of Shaver, 131 Cal. 219, 63 P. 340; and Estate of Cohn, 36 Cal.App.2d 678, 98 P.2d 521; that by their acts and omissions shown they are now estopped to attack the judgment appealed from herein and that all questions on this appeal have now become moot and settled and that this appeal should be dismissed.

In answer to plaintiff and respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal for the reasons herein stated, interveners and appellants represent that in view of the fact that they have specifically claimed on this appeal that the judgment is void, there cannot be an estoppel against showing that a judgment is void as against public policy or positive law, citing Panzer-Hamilton Co. v. Bray, 96 Cal.App. 460, 274 P. 769; Brown v. Brown, 8 Cal.App.2d 364, 47 P.2d 352; Page v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. 372, 18 P. 385; and Ivory v. Superior Court, 12 Cal. 2d 455, 85 P.2d 894.

In opposition to the motion to dismiss it is further shown that contained in the record on appeal there is a motion by appellants and interveners for an order directing the executor of the above-named estate to deposit with the clerk of the Superior Court a bill of sale and also a deed conveying the title to the property involved to Vincent G. Keyes for his use and benefit and for the use and benefit of Elmer O. Hurlbert, to abide the judgment of the Appellate Court in the action pending. This motion was made upon the ground and for the reasons that the moving parties were heirs at law and legatees and devisees of said estate and were interveners in the action and were taking an appeal from the decree entered in that action wherein it was ordered that the executor make and deliver the documents above referred to, and they there moved that the delivery of the documents and the property should not be made until the order and judgment therein became final. This motion was based upon all the records on file in that action which is now pending in this court on appeal.

It is further represented that that motion was denied upon the ground that the court had no authority to make such an order, and it is here contended on this motion that the acceptance by appellants of the partial distribution was not intended by them as a compromise or settlement of the action, nor was the acceptance in any way conditioned upon an agreement that this appeal would not be prosecuted; that at no time did the executor or any other party state to appellants that the acceptance would amount to a compromise or settlement of the litigation or an agreement that the appeal would not be prosecuted; that besides appellants, four other heirs and legatees of Andrus Hurlbert, deceased, including the executor, participated in the partial distribution; that appellants did not in any way request or move for said partial distribution.

Interveners and appellants insist first, that there can be no estoppel against showing that a judgment is void; second, that appellants are not bound by the executor's acceptance of plaintiff and respondent's money; third, that appellants' right to appeal in this case cannot be affected by acceptance of partial distribution in an entirely separate proceeding; and fourth, that if appellants are estopped to appeal from the decree of specific performance they nevertheless are not estopped to claim a share of the profits alleged to be due them and earned by the partnership subsequent to the death of Andrus Hurlbert.

[1] It is further claimed that the judgment from which the appeal was perfected entirely ignored an issue pertaining to the profits and that under no circumstance have they waived their right to appeal from the judgment which failed to dispose of that issue, citing Wold v. League of the Cross, 107 Cal.App. 344, 290 P. 460; and Walnut Irrigation Dist. v. Burke, 158 Cal. 165, 110 P. 517. It has been clearly established in this state that where there is left any material or vital question for determination the court should not dismiss the appeal but should permit it to be heard on the merits. Hartke v. Abbott, 106 Cal.App. 388, 289 P. 206.

[2] It is a rule of convenience for the expedition of business in the appellate courts of California that they will not grant a motion to dismiss involving an examination of the record in advance of the hearing on the merits, and if the questions presented on such a motion involve the merits of a case and are such as should be determined upon the hearing of the case upon its merits, the court may deny the motion with the privilege of renewal at the hearing, or continue the motion until the hearing on the merits. Ewing v. Richvale Land Co., 176 Cal. 152, 167 P. 876; Leonis v. Leffingwell, 6 Cal. Unrep. 219, 55 P. 897; and Mannix v. Tryon, 2 Cal.App. 609, 84 P. 278.

[3] To make a proper determination of the issues here presented on this motion to dismiss, it would be necessary for us to make an examination of the record on the main appeal from the judgment. An unqualified denial of plaintiff and respondent's motion to dismiss may establish the law of the case in respect to the points raised. In view of the issue presented on the motion we are convinced that these questions should be considered, together with the questions raised on the appeal from the judgment.

The order of submission made in reference to this motion is hereby set aside and said motion is ordered replaced on the calendar for February 11, 1941, to be further heard and considered in connection with the appeal from the judgment.

3. Appeal and error ⇐635(1)

If one who appealed from minute order, stating that petition for adjustment of rents for realty involved in partition action had been granted in part, that findings and decree had been signed and filed, and that petition for adjustment of rents would be further considered at a later date, was attempting to appeal from decree mentioned in the minute order, such appeal would be of no avail, where neither the findings nor the decree, if made, were included in the record on appeal.

4. Appeal and error ⇐660(2)

Where matters sought to be added to the record by motion for diminution of the record could not affect the conclusion of the appellate court that purported appeal was required to be dismissed, the motion would be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action to partition certain realty by Maria Apablasa Conley against Cayetano J. Apablasa and others. The realty was duly sold to Gerald E. Arbuckle. From the final decree, Maria Apablasa Conley appeals, and from a minute order granting in part the petition of Gerald E. Arbuckle for adjustment of rents, he appeals.

Decree affirmed, and purported appeal of Gerald E. Arbuckle dismissed.

WOOD, Justice.

Maria A. Conley has appealed from a final decree entered in an action to partition certain real property by which the rights of the parties were determined and by which the distribution of funds received from the sale of such property was ordered. Gerald E. Arbuckle has attempted to appeal from a minute order granting in part his petition for adjustment of rents. Four other appeals from various decrees made during the course of the partition proceeding have been dismissed pursuant to the stipulation of the parties.

The facts which are material to the determination of the present controversy are as follows: In 1929 Concepcion A. Sepulveda, who was the owner of six separate parcels of real property, conveyed an undivided one-half interest in four of the parcels to her six children. In 1931 she died intestate and probate proceedings, which are still pending, were commenced. The present partition action was filed in 1936 by Maria A. Conley against the administrator of the estate of Sepulveda and all other cotenants of such real property. Prior to the trial of the partition suit the probate court entered a decree in the estate proceedings ordering partial distribution of an undivided 2/21 interest in two of the six parcels of land to Maria A. Conley. Subsequently in the course of the partition proceeding all of the parcels of real property were duly sold to appellant Gerald E. Arbuckle. The court in the partition action directed that the share of the proceeds of the sale belonging to cotenants whose interests were still subject to administration should be paid to the administrator of the estate, after deducting therefrom the proportionate share of the costs of the partition proceeding.

In its interlocutory decree the court determined the fractional interests representing the respective shares of the various claimants to the proceeds of the sale of the real property. So far as is here material the final decree from which Maria A. Conley has appealed provided that the sum of $1,240.01 should be paid to her as her share of the balance of the funds then on deposit in the court and that the sum of $1,210.57 should be paid to the administrator of the estate of Sepulveda. Her motion for a new trial and motion to vacate the judgment were both denied.

[1] Appellant Conley contends that she is entitled to a sum of from $914 to $950 more than she received by such final decree. It is claimed that the court paid such sum to the administrator of the estate of Sepulveda as appellant's share of the expenses of administration in such estate and that such payment was improper for the reason that appellant should not have been required to bear any of the expenses of administration after the entry of the decree of partial distribution. There is nothing in the final decree or the findings of fact and conclusions of law upon which such decree is based which would indicate that any sum of money was being paid to the administrator as appellant's share of the expenses of administration. The amounts directed to be paid by the final decree are merely designated as the respective shares of the various parties. No reference is made to expenses of administration. The claim that appellant is entitled to a larger amount of money than she actually received is predicated solely on the assumption that she was wrongfully required to pay expenses of administration. Since there is nothing in the record to support such assumption and since no other errors are urged as grounds for reversal, we must hold that there is no merit in the appeal.

[2, 3] The purported appeal of Gerald E. Arbuckle from the minute order granting his petition for adjustment of rents must be dismissed, such order being nonappealable. The order recites: "Petition of Gerald E. Arbuckle for adjustment, etc., comes on for hearing. * * * Said petition is granted in part and Findings and Decree are signed and filed. Further consideration as to $588.00 is postponed to October 31, 1938." By its very wording the order indicates that it is nothing more than a memorandum, stating that the petition has been granted in part, that findings and a decree have been signed and filed and that the petition would be further considered at a later date. An appeal will not lie from such minute order. Carpenter v. Golden State Securities Co., 31 Cal.App.2d 494, 88 P.2d 194. If Arbuckle was attempting to appeal from the decree mentioned in the minute order such appeal would likewise be of no avail for neither the findings nor the decree, if made, were included in the record on appeal.

[4] At the time that this appeal was before us for oral argument a motion for diminution of the record was made on behalf of appellant Arbuckle. Since the matters sought to be added to the record by such motion cannot affect our conclusion that the purported appeal must be dismissed, such motion is hereby denied.

For the foregoing reasons the final decree from which Maria A. Conley has appealed is affirmed and the purported appeal of Gerald E. Arbuckle is dismissed.

COUNTY NAT. BANK & TRUST CO. OF SANTA BARBARA v. INVESTMENT CORPORATION OF SANTA BARBARA.

Civ. 12210.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 21, 1941.

1. Brokers ⇨54

A broker was entitled to his commission when he found a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy the property on the terms agreed to by the seller.

2. Brokers ⇨71

The right to and the amount of a broker's commission must be determined from the provisions of his contract with his principal.

3. Brokers ⇐54

Where broker's contract authorized him to procure a purchaser of property at $55,000, and seller agreed to pay broker a commission of five per cent. on listed price or any other price or terms or deal that might be offered and accepted by seller, broker earned his commission when county expressed its readiness and willingness to enter into a deal evidenced by a lease and option agreement and that deal was offered to and accepted by seller.

4. Brokers ⇐71

Where broker's contract allowed him not only to offer property for sale or to sell it but also empowered him to lease property, broker was entitled to a commission upon the lease price as well as upon the consideration for the sale when he procured a county to lease for a term and then purchase property.

5. Brokers ⇐71

In absence of any charge of fraud, mistake, or accident, the language of a broker's contract and of a lease and option contract executed by purchaser procured by broker being clear, explicit, certain, and not involving an absurdity, the trial court, in action to recover brokerage commissions, was justified in interpreting the contracts and ascertaining the intention of the parties from the language thereof. Civ.Code, §§ 1638–1640.

6. Evidence ⇐423(1)

Where broker's contract authorized him to procure a purchaser and also empowered him to lease property, seller agreed to pay a commission on listed price or any other price or terms or deal that might be offered and accepted by seller, and lease and option contract executed by purchaser procured by broker provided for the payment of rentals, seller could not, under any exception to the parol evidence rule, show that the lease and option contract was in reality an out and out agreement of sale and that the sum described as rentals was in truth interest on deferred payments on which no commission was to be paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; A. B. Bigler, Judge.

Action by the County National Bank and Trust Company of Santa Barbara against the Investment Corporation of Santa Barbara to recover brokerage commissions on a realty transaction. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Alfred W. Robertson and Edward W. Schramm, both of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Butcher & Haines, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

This appeal involves an action brought to recover brokerage commissions on a realty transaction had between appellant and the county of Santa Barbara. Respondent bank is the assignee of one A. F. Krebaum, who was the real estate broker in question. The written agreement relied upon by respondent to recover the commissions earned by the real estate broker was dated January 15, 1935, and was in the following words and figures:

"* * * Investment Corporation of Santa Barbara hereby delegates to A. F. Krebaum, Real Estate Broker, doing business as Krebaum & Krebaum, the sole and exclusive right to sell and offer for sale or lease our property known as the Ambassador Ballroom located on West Cabrillo Boulevard, together with 200' of frontage, for the price of $55,000.00 for a period of 30 days from date hereof. We further agree to pay A. F. Krebaum a commission of 5% on the listed price or any other price or terms or deal that may be offered and accepted by us. * * *"

Following the execution of this agreement and in conformity with prior negotiations brought about by the real estate broker between the board of supervisors of Santa Barbara county and appellant investment company, there was executed, through the efforts of such broker, a lease and option agreement between the county and respondent bearing date January 19, 1935. In effect, this agreement first provided that appellant investment company demised and let to the lessee, county of Santa Barbara, the property in question for a period commencing February 1, 1935, and ending either on December 1, 1938, or on the date of the payment of the purchase price of the property thereafter described in the agreement under what was designated "Option Four", whichever date occurred first. It was, however, provided in the contract that the lease should terminate as to all the involved property on December 1, 1935, unless the option designated "One" was exercised by the lessee on or before the last-mentioned date, and it was similarly provided that unless "Option Two" and "Option Three" were exercised as therein provided, the lease should terminate as to portions of the property remaining at the time of the failure to exercise any of the last-named options. It was then stipulated in the agreement that the rentals should be as follows:

"(a) For the period commencing with the 1st day of February, 1935, and ending with the date of the payment of the purchase price for the parcel of property hereinafter described under Option One, at the rate of Three Hundred ($300.00) dollars per month, pro-rated for any partial month;

"(b) For the period commencing with the date of said last-mentioned payment, and ending with the date of the payment of the purchase price for the parcel of property hereinafter described under Option Two, at the rate of Two Hundred Twenty-five ($225.00) dollars per month, pro-rated for any partial month;

"(c) For the period commencing with the date of said last-mentioned payment, and ending with the date of the payment of the purchase price for the parcel of property hereinafter described under Option Three, at the rate of One Hundred seventy-five ($175.00) dollars per month, pro-rated for any partial month;

"(d) And for the period commencing with the date of said last-mentioned payment, and ending with the date of the payment of the purchase price for the parcel of property hereinafter described under Option Four, being also the date of the termination of this lease, at the rate of One hundred twenty-five ($125.00) dollars per month, pro-rated for any partial month. * * *"

The agreement further provided that the amount of property described as covered by the lease should be reduced as the successive options were exercised to the balance of the property remaining upon which options had not been exercised. It was stipulated that the total rentals received by appellant investment company amounted to $8,743.35.

The next portion of the agreement pertinent to a consideration of this appeal refers to certain options, the first of which, if exercised by the county of Santa Barbara on or before December 1, 1935, authorized said county to purchase a described portion of the property for the sum of $15,000. The second option, which was required to be exercised by said county on or before December 1, 1936, provided for the purchase of an additional portion of the property for the further sum of $10,000. Option Three, which was required to be exercised by the county on or before December 1, 1937, authorized the purchase of another portion of the property for $10,000, while Option Four, which was required to be exercised on or before December 1, 1938, entitled the county to purchase the balance of the property for the sum of $20,000.

All of the options were exercised by the county of Santa Barbara and the total sum of $55,000 was paid to appellant investment company by such county. Appellant investment company paid the five per cent commission on such $55,000, but refused to pay any commission upon the $8,743.35 received by it under the so-called lease or rental provisions of the agreement. Trial before the court, sitting without a jury, resulted in judgment for the plaintiff, and from such judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

[1-4] Appellant contends that the trial court fell into error in denying to it the right to show that the agreement between appellant and the county of Santa Barbara was not in fact an option and lease, but in reality was an out-and-out agreement of sale wherein the interest on the unpaid purchase price was paid under the guise of rent. Appellant offered to prove by the testimony of two witnesses that such was the understanding of the parties to the agreement. In other words, appellant's position is that it was the understanding of the parties that the purchase price was $55,000, upon which respondent's assignor was entitled to a commission of five per cent, but that the additional sum of $8,743.35, although described in the agreement as rent, was in truth interest on the deferred payments, upon which no commission was to be paid. The trial court's finding against appellant in this regard is sustained by the record. Its answer made no claim of fraud, ambiguity, uncertainty or illegality of the lease and option agreement set forth in the complaint, nor were any such issues set up by way of special plea or affirmative defenses. But even though we assume as true the claim of appellant that the lease and option agreement was framed to evade certain statutory restrictions which prohibited the county of Santa Barbara from purchasing the property outright, and for that reason instalment payments were provided for and provision made in the contract to designate as rentals what was in fact interest on future payments, nevertheless, there is no testimony that the broker was a party either to the form of the purchase agreement between appellant and the county or that the broker was a party to or had any knowledge of the claimed subterfuge. The broker was entitled to his commission when, as in the instant case, he found a purchaser ready, able and willing to buy the property on the terms agreed to by the seller. 4 Cal.Jur. 583, § 25, and Ten-Year Supp., with cases therein cited. The right to and the amount of the broker's commission must be determined from the provisions of his contract with his principal. In the case at bar the broker's contract authorized him to procure a purchaser of the property at a price of $55,000, and then provided: "We further agree to pay A. F. Krebaum a commission of 5% on the listed price or any other price or terms or deal that may be offered and accepted by us." When, therefore, the county of Santa Barbara expressed its readiness and willingness to enter into the "deal" evidenced by the lease and option agreement, and that "deal" was "offered" to and "accepted" by appellant, the broker had earned his commission. The contract of the broker not only allowed him to offer the property for sale or to sell the same, but also empowered him to lease the property. When, therefore, he procured the county of Santa Barbara to lease for a term and then purchase the property, he was, by the terms of his contract, entitled to a commission on the lease price as well as upon the consideration for the sale.

[5, 6] In answer to appellant's contention that the construction placed upon the contract by the trial court, in holding that by its terms the sum of $8,743.35 constituted rentals, was unreasonable, we might say that if the rentals were intended by the parties to be interest on deferred payments, it would seem singular that the purchaser was to have possession of the property for four years free from any rental for its use and occupation. From whatever angle the situation presented by the facts of this case is viewed, it must be conceded, as the trial court found, that appellant received the sum of $8,743.35 in addition to $55,000, and received each of said sums through the efforts and services of respondent's assignor and as "terms" of and as the result of his efforts to effect a "deal" pursuant to the contract.

Both the agreement of the broker and the lease and option contract appear upon their face to be a complete statement of the undertakings of the respective parties thereto, without any ambiguity or uncertainty as to their several legal obligations. In the absence of any charge of fraud, mistake or accident, the language of each contract being clear, explicit, certain, and not involving an absurdity, the trial court was justified in interpreting it and ascertaining the intention of the parties from the language thereof. Civ.Code, §§ 1638, 1639, 1640. The instant case does not present circumstances which justify the application of any exception to the parol evidence rule.

From the foregoing it follows that the judgment should be, and it is, affirmed.

FERNHOLTZ v. BISBEE.

Civ. 12240.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 23, 1941.

1. Trial ⇐296(3, 4)

Where action by passenger and action by driver of automobile which collided with defendant's automobile were consolidated for purposes of trial, instructions on proof of defendant's negligence required in order to recover, which provided also that plaintiffs could not recover if plaintiffs were guilty of negligence contributing no matter how slightly to happening of accident, did not take from passenger his right to have case tried on theory of joint or concurrent negligence of drivers of the two colliding automobiles, in view of other instructions.

2. Automobiles ⇐244(40)

In action by passenger of automobile which skidded on icy highway and collided with defendant's passing automobile, evidence justified denial of recovery on ground that accident was unavoidable and happened without any negligence on part of either defendant or driver of automobile in which passenger was riding.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by Emil Fernholtz against Roy A. Bisbee for damages for personal injuries sustained in a collision of two automobiles. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Attempted appeal from verdict dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

F. M. Ostrander, of Mercer, for appellant.

Sigurd E. Murphy, of Hollywood, and Bernard E. Allard, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

This litigation is the outgrowth of an automobile accident which occurred about 8:20 o'clock on the morning of December 28, 1936, at a point about one and one-half miles south of Gorman, on the "Ridge Route" highway between Los Angeles and Bakersfield. Plaintiff, Emil Fernholtz, who is the appellant herein, was riding as a guest in an automobile being driven by Fred Hughes, hereinafter referred to as the Hughes car, and which was traveling in a northerly direction. The highway at the point of collision was covered with ice, and shortly before reaching the point of impact the Hughes car in which appellant was riding skidded, and an automobile driven by the defendant and respondent, Roy A. Bisbee, hereinafter referred to as the Bisbee car, struck the Hughes car. Hughes, driver of the automobile in which appellant was riding, commenced an action to recover damages for personal injuries and property damage against the defendant and respondent Bisbee, which action was No. 416664 in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County. In this action defendant Bisbee filed an answer and also a cross-complaint seeking recovery for personal injuries and property damage sustained by him. Plaintiff and appellant in the instant action filed his complaint in the same court, No. 415691, against defendant and respondent herein, Roy A. Bisbee, but did not name Hughes, the driver of the car in which appellant was riding, as a defendant.

Upon motion of defendant and cross-complainant Bisbee, and over objection of plaintiff and appellant herein, these actions were consolidated for trial by order of the Superior Court. Upon the trial of the cases so consolidated before a jury, three verdicts were returned: (1) In the case now before us a verdict was rendered in favor of defendant and respondent Bisbee and against plaintiff and appellant Fernholtz; (2) in the other action a verdict also was returned in favor of defendant Bisbee and against plaintiff Hughes on the complaint of the latter; while (3) on the cross-complaint therein of defendant Bisbee against plaintiff Hughes, the verdict was in favor of the cross-defendant Hughes and against the cross-complainant Bisbee.

There was no conflict in the evidence as to the icy, slippery and dangerous condition of the highway at the point of the accident, nor was there any evidence of excessive speed by either automobile, but there was a sharp conflict as to the point on or lane of the highway where the accident occurred. Plaintiff contended that when the Hughes car started to skid it came to a complete stop in the center lane of the highway, and that there was sufficient room in the third lane for the Bisbee car to pass the Hughes car in safety without moving over on to the center lane. Defendant Bisbee presented evidence that when he came upon the slippery road he was traveling in second gear; that while so traveling, as he passed Gorman, he first saw the Hughes car when it was about a half mile away; that he was traveling upon the right-hand side of the road in second gear upon an icy and slippery pavement, going between twenty and twenty-five miles per hour; that when he was about two or three car lengths from the Hughes car the latter skidded over on to the lane in which the Bisbee car was traveling; that when the impact occurred the Hughes car was still in motion. Thus, we see, as conceded by appellant, that the factual situation presents the usual conflict in the evidence attendant upon cases of this nature.

The only point presented by appellant is that the trial court erred in giving certain instructions which it is claimed imputed the negligence of the driver of the Hughes car to the guest, Fernholtz, who is the appellant herein. By the first challenged instruction, which is designated "Defendant's Instruction No. 3", the jury was advised that it was incumbent upon plaintiffs to prove that defendant Bisbee was negligent, and also to prove that such negligence, if any, on the part of the defendant, was the proximate cause of the accident, and "even then plaintiffs cannot recover if you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiffs were themselves negligent, and that such negligence on their part contributed proximately, no matter how slightly, to the happening of the accident". In defendant's instruction No. 5, the court, after defining the term negligence, proceeded to advise the jury that "before the defendant Bisbee can be held liable in this case, it is necessary that the plaintiffs show by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant failed to use ordinary care or skill in the operation and management of his automobile; that is, plaintiffs must show that the defendant failed to do some act which a reasonable and prudent person would have done, or that he did some act which a reasonable and prudent person would not have done; and even then you cannot find for plaintiffs, if you find that the plaintiffs were negligent, contributing proximately, no matter how slightly, to the happening of the accident". In another instruction the jury was advised, "If you find that the defendant was negligent, proximately causing the accident, then you will determine whether or not the plaintiffs were negligent, and if you find that they were negligent and that their negligence proximately contributed to the accident and to the injuries, if any, then plaintiffs cannot recover, and your verdict must be in favor of the defendant. * * *"

[1] It is appellant's contention that the above-quoted instructions took from him his right to have the case tried on the theory of joint or concurrent negligence of defendants Bisbee and Hughes; that each of these instructions advised the jury that if Hughes was negligent and his negligence contributed in the slightest degree to the accident, then appellant could not recover. In these contentions appellant cannot be upheld, because the theory of joint or concurrent negligence of defendant Bisbee and co-plaintiff Hughes was clearly and correctly set forth in other instructions given by the court. For instance, by appellant's instruction No. 14 the jury was admonished that if it found that appellant was a passenger or guest in the automobile of Hughes and if it found that appellant was not guilty of contributory negligence, that in order to recover from defendant Bisbee it was not necessary that Hughes should be free from negligence. Said the court: "In other words, if you find that plaintiff Fernholtz was a passenger or guest in the Hughes car and was not guilty of contributory negligence, and if plaintiff Fernholtz sustained any injuries or damages by reason of the collision between the Hughes car and the Bisbee car, plaintiff Fernholtz is entitled to a verdict in his favor against defendant Bisbee if you should find that Bisbee was operating his automobile in a negligent manner, even though you should find that Hughes was also negligent at and immediately prior to the time of the collision."

Again, in an instruction offered by appellant, the court stated to the jury: "You are instructed that if you find that plaintiff Fernholtz was a passenger or guest in the car of plaintiff Hughes, and if you further find that both Bisbee and Hughes were negligent in the operation of their respective cars, and if you further find that plaintiff Fernholtz was not guilty of contributory negligence, the joint negligence of Bisbee and Hughes would, if it contributed proximately to the injuries, if any, sustained by plaintiff Fernholtz, render defendant Bisbee liable to Fernholtz and Bisbee's liability would not be lessened, as far as Fernholtz is concerned, by the fact that the negligence of Hughes was a contributing cause to the injuries, if any, sustained by Fernholtz."

By the first of the two instructions last referred to, the jury was advised in plain, certain and unequivocal language, that the negligence of Hughes could not be imputed to plaintiff Fernholtz, and by the latter instruction it was clearly admonished that if it found that both Bisbee and Hughes were negligent in the operation of their respective cars and that if plaintiff was without contributory negligence, Bisbee would be liable to plaintiff, and that such liability would not be lessened by the fact that the negligence of Hughes, if any, also contributed to plaintiff's injuries.

In still another instruction the court further advised the jury that if it found that appellant Fernholtz was not guilty of contributory negligence, that "the joint negligence of Bisbee and Hughes would, if it contributed proximately to the injuries, if any, sustained by plaintiff Fernholtz, render defendant Bisbee liable to Fernholtz, and any negligence on the part of Hughes cannot be imputed to or charged against plaintiff Fernholtz". By the last-quoted instruction the court not only emphasized the rule that if the jury found both Bisbee and Hughes were negligent in the operation of their respective cars, that their joint negligence, if it contributed proximately to the injuries sustained by appellant, would entitle the latter to a verdict against Bisbee, but such instruction also clearly told the jury that any negligence on the part of Hughes could not be imputed to or charged against appellant.

The court also instructed the jury that there were two separate lawsuits being tried by them, one of which was the case of Fernholtz v. Bisbee, which suit, the court advised the jury, was separate and distinct from the other lawsuit in which Hughes was suing Bisbee, and in which defendant Bisbee filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff Hughes. The jury was advised that the two lawsuits were joined or consolidated by order of the presiding judge "only for the purpose of trial, and as a matter of economy and convenience". After defining the reciprocal obligations imposed by law upon the respective drivers of the automobiles in question, the court again cautioned the jury: "But you are instructed that your determination and decision on the question of negligence or contributory negligence as between Hughes and Bisbee cannot affect the companion case known as Fernholtz v. Bisbee."

Other and additional instructions were given in connection with the principles of law just enunciated, and we cannot see how the jury could have been misled or confused, so far as the rights of appellant were concerned. The rules of law applicable to his status as a guest in the Hughes car were clearly and correctly presented to the jury. Both the number and the clarity of the instructions affecting appellant lead us to the conclusion that he suffered no prejudice to his substantial rights.

The attempted appeal from the verdict is dismissed, and for the reasons herein stated the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LIST.

LIST v. SANDELL (PEOPLE, Intervener).

Civ. 2555.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 21, 1941.

1. Crops ⇐5

Generally, growing crops are part of realty until severed or agreed to be severed and pass to grantee under deed of realty, unless reserved in writing. Civ.Code, §§ 658, 660.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇐196

Accruing rents, falling due after delivery of lessor's deed, conveying leased realty to another, belong to grantee, regardless of whether deed includes words "together with the rents, issues and profits thereof," and such rents cannot be apportioned.

3. Taxation ⇐725

On redemption of land from tax sale to state, redemptioner became entitled to all crops growing thereon, subject to rights of state's tenant therein, and no rights thereto remained in state, so that redemptioner was entitled to money deposited with court clerk by tenant as proceeds of landlord's share of grain crop grown on land by tenant after date of redemption. Pol.Code, §§ 3773, 3817.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; K. Van Zante, Judge.

Action by Charles W. List against V. I. Sandell to determine plaintiff's ownership and right to an interest in a grain crop or the reasonable value thereof, in which the People intervened, claiming right to property or money in question. Judgment for plaintiff, and intervener appeals.

Affirmed.

KLETTE, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal taken by intervener, the People of the State of California, from a judgment of the Superior Court of Kings County, in favor of plaintiff Charles W. List and against defendant V. I. Sandell, and intervener.

The action was brought by plaintiff, Charles W. List, against defendant, V. I. Sandell, to have the court determine that plaintiff was the owner, and entitled to a one-sixth interest in a certain crop of grain, or a one-sixth interest in the reasonable value thereof. Defendant appeared by answer, disclaiming any title or claim thereto, and admitted he was willing to deliver, or pay, to such person as the court might direct. The People of the State of California, after leave obtained, filed a complaint in intervention, alleging that they were entitled to the property or money in question.

It was stipulated between all the parties that the one-sixth of the proceeds of the crop then sold should be deposited with the clerk of the court, and that one-sixth of the remainder of the crop should be sold by defendant, at the best price obtainable, and the money deposited with the clerk. This was done, and the total money now in the hands of the clerk is $974.73, which is the subject of this action.

A trial was had upon stipulated facts which show: That plaintiff is, and was at all times since 1929, the owner of certain real property described in the complaint, excepting during that time that the title thereof was held by the state of California; that on June 26, 1937, the property was deeded to the state of California, by the tax collector of Kings county, by reason of nonpayment of taxes, theretofore duly levied thereon; that on September 29, 1938, the state controller executed a written lease upon said real property, for the crop year of 1938–1939, to the defendant, for a cash rental of $82, and one-sixth of the grain to be grown thereon; that on May 25, 1939, there was growing, and immature, on said real property, a crop of grain, planted by defendant; that on May 25, 1939, plaintiff redeemed said property, by paying the full amount of all taxes due thereon, and in accordance with law, there was executed and delivered to plaintiff, a certificate of redemption of said real property, by the county treasurer; that at all times subsequent to May 25, 1939, plaintiff was, and is now, the legal owner of said real property, and in possession thereof; that the crop of grain growing on said real property was harvested by defendant between June 15 and July 15, 1939.

The stipulation further specifies the amount of crop raised by defendant, and that defendant is ignorant of the respective rights of the parties, and makes no claim to the rental share of said grain, and is willing to pay and deliver such rental share to any person the court shall direct; that upon the delivery of the money for the one-sixth of the crop, by defendant, to the clerk of the court, the defendant shall be released from all further liability in the matter; that the money so deposited with the clerk shall be held by him, pending the final determination of this action.

Under these stipulated facts, the trial court found in favor of plaintiff, and rendered its judgment that the plaintiff was the owner of said sum of $974.73, and directed that the clerk pay said sum to plaintiff.

[1-3] The general rule is that growing crops are a part of the realty (Huerstal v. Muir, 64 Cal. 450, 2 P. 33; Dascey v. Harris, 65 Cal. 357, 4 P. 204), and remain a part of the realty as long as unsevered (Penryn Co. v. Sherman-Worrell Co., 142 Cal. 643, 76 P. 484, 100 Am.St.Rep. 150), or not agreed to be severed, Civ.Code, secs. 658, 660, and pass to the grantee under deed (Phillips v. Pacific Land & Cattle Co., 116 Cal.App. 290, 2 P.2d 566; Penryn Co. v. Sherman-Worrell Co., supra; Wilson v. White, 161 Cal. 453, 119 P. 895; Fiske v. Soule, 87 Cal. 313, 25 P. 430; Downs v. National Bank, 101 Cal.App. 712, 282 P. 420), unless reserved in writing. Wilson v. White, supra; Fiske v. Soule, supra; Sweet v. Watson's Nursery, 33 Cal.App.2d 699, 92 P.2d 812. Accruing rents, falling due after deed delivered belong to the vendee, where deed includes the words, "together with the rents, issues, and profits thereof" (Garber v. Gianella, 98 Cal. 527, 33 P. 458; Diepenbrock v. Luiz, 159 Cal. 716, 115 P. 743, L.R.A.1915C, 234, Ann.Cas. 1912C, 1084; Marshall v. Swaim, 102 Cal. App. 119, 282 P. 423), and even in the absence of such provisions (Fahrenbaker v. E. Clemens Horst Co., 209 Cal. 7, 284 P. 905), and there can be no apportionment of such rents. Fahrenbaker v. E. Clemens Horst Co., supra. From the authorities cited above, it appears that plaintiff, upon redeeming his property, became entitled to all the crops growing upon the premises, subject to such rights as the defendant, as tenant, might have therein, unless there is something in the peculiar facts of this case, or in the law, which takes this case out of the general rule. We are not able to find any such exception.

Section 3773 of the Political Code gives to the state controller the right and power to lease lands sold to the state for nonpayment of taxes. In case of redemption during the term of the lease, it authorizes the controller to refund to the lessee the unearned portion of any rental paid in advance. It is silent as to the collection of any crop rentals from crops then growing, and unharvested, on the redeemed premises. This section also provides that such lease shall contain a clause providing that upon redemption, the controller is authorized to cancel the lease, as of the date of redemption, and that the lessee shall be entitled to no damage, or reimbursement. This lease did not contain any provision for such cancellation upon redemption, but provided, instead, that the rental would be paid in full, and any claim made by the redemptioner would be adjusted by the controller.

Section 3817 of the Political Code provides that, upon redemption being made, the auditor shall report to the recorder who shall note on the margin of the record of the certificate of sale, or deed, the fact of such redemption, and thereupon such "certificate of sale, or deed, shall become null and void, and all right, title and interest acquired by virtue of the tax sale, shall cease and determine".

When, upon redemption, the rights of the state acquired under a tax sale become null and void, and all right, title and interest, acquired by virtue of the tax sale, shall cease and determine, it leaves no rights remaining in the state, and certainly no rights to the crops growing upon the redeemed property, of which, according to the stipulation of the parties, plaintiff has been the owner, and in possession, ever since redemption was made.

For the reasons stated, we find that the judgment of the trial court should be, and the same is, affirmed.

We concur: BARNARD, P. J.; GRIFFIN, J.

EPHRAIM v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

Civ. 11657.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 23, 1941.

1. Judges ⇐51(3)

Under statute requiring that party objecting to judge on ground of his disqualification set "forth the fact or facts constituting the ground of the disqualification of such judge", statements of disqualification are insufficient unless the facts constituting the alleged disqualification are set forth, and mere allegations setting forth the conclusions of affiant do not comply with the statute. Code Civ.Proc. § 170.

2. Judges ⇐51(4)

Where statement of disqualification of judge is legally insufficient, judge sought to be disqualified may disregard it or strike it from the files. Code Civ.Proc. § 170.

3. Judges ⇐51(3)

Where statement of disqualification of Superior Court judge merely set forth conclusions of affiant and did not set forth facts constituting the alleged disqualification, statement did not comply with statute and was insufficient. Code Civ.Proc. § 170.

Original proceeding by W. K. Ephraim for writs of prohibition and certiorari to restrain the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Frank H. Dunne, Judge, from any further proceedings in a matter pending before the court and judge until determination of the judge's qualifications.

Petition denied.

John J. Redhead, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

The petition for writs of prohibition and certiorari is denied.

[1-3] Petitioner seeks by this proceeding to restrain respondent court and judge from any further proceedings in a matter pending before said court and judge until the question of the judge's qualifications is passed upon as provided in section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section requires that the statement of a party objecting to the judge on the ground of his disqualification must set "forth the fact or facts constituting the ground of the disqualification of such judge". Under this section it has been held that such statements of disqualification are insufficient as a matter of law unless the facts constituting the alleged disqualification are set forth, and that mere allegations setting forth the conclusions of the affiant do not comply with the section. People v. Berman, 117 Cal.App. 334, 4 P.2d 226; People v. Nolan, 126 Cal.App. 623, 14 P.2d 880; People v. Emmett, 123 Cal.App. 678, 12 P.2d 92; Krebs v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 7 Cal.2d 549, 61 P.2d 931. These same cases establish the rule that when the statement of disqualification is legally insufficient the judge sought to be disqualified may disregard it or strike it from the files. An examination of the statement of disqualification filed herein demonstrates that it does not comply with the rule of the above cases in that it contains nothing but conclusions of the affiant. For that reason the trial judge properly disregarded it, and this petition must be denied.

BUSH et al. v. ROGERS et al.

Civ. 11307.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 20, 1941.

1. Mines and minerals ⇐68(2)

In action to quiet title to mining claims as against defendants' rights under lease from plaintiffs, evidence on question of forfeiture of defendants' rights for noncompliance with provisions of lease for diligent development of claims held sufficient to sustain trial court's finding that defendants substantially performed all terms and conditions of lease.

2. Appeal and error ⇐931(3)

In spouses' action to quiet title to mining claims as against defendants' rights under lease from plaintiffs, who contended that lease was invalid because claims were community property and plaintiff wife did not join in lease, it must be assumed, on appeal from judgment for defendants, that, if findings had been made on such question, they would have supported judgment. Civ.Code, § 172a.

3. Husband and wife ⇐267(9)

A wife may be "estopped" by her conduct to attack validity of instrument, executed by husband, because she did not join therein. Civ.Code, § 172a.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estopped".

4. Husband and wife ⇐267(9)

Where wife, not joining in husband's lease of mining claims, was present during conversations of husband, his attorney, and lessees concerning development of claims and terms of lease before execution thereof and subsequent conversation respecting prospective sale of leasehold interest, complaint, verified by wife, in spouses' action to quiet title to claims as against lessees, contained no allegation that her claim of ownership was based on community property interest, and she introduced no evidence that she ever denied giving her consent to execution of lease, circumstances were sufficient to show "waiver" of her interest, community or otherwise, in matter of lease. Civ.Code, § 172a.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waiver".

5. Estoppel ⇐110

Ordinarily, estoppel must be pleaded.

6. Quieting title ⇐34(1)

In action to quiet title, complaint may be framed in customary brief form, simply alleging that plaintiffs are owners and entitled to possession of property involved and that defendants claim interest therein adverse to plaintiffs without right.

7. Estoppel ⇐110

In spouses' action to quiet title to mining claims, where plaintiffs used brief form of complaint, answer alleged that defendants were entitled to possession under lease from plaintiffs, no amended complaint, alleging invalidity of lease, was filed, objection to introduction of lease in evidence was first made during trial, and subsequently attention was directly called to plaintiffs' claim that lease was invalid on motion to strike out contract on grounds that premises were community property and that plaintiff wife did not join in execution of lease, defendants were not precluded from raising defense of estoppel to deny validity of lease because of failure to plead such defense. Civ.Code, § 172a.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Edward Henderson, Judge.

Action by M. T. Bush and wife against Sterling C. Rogers and others, to quiet title to gypsum mining claims. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Matthew S. Platz, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Albert D. White, of Long Beach, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

Plaintiffs, husband and wife, brought this action to quiet title to two gypsum mining claims in Ventura County as against rights asserted by defendants in connection with their twenty-year lease of the property. The complaint in brief form alleges that plaintiffs are the owners and entitled to the possession of the premises, real estate and mining claims, and that defendants claim an interest therein adverse to plaintiffs, but that said claim is without any right or validity whatever. Defendants Rogers and Mosher filed a general denial, and in addition alleged that they were in rightful and lawful possession of the premises by virtue of a lease executed between plaintiffs and themselves. The answer of defendant Prince is similar except that he claims to be the owner of the Mosher interest through sale and assignment. The findings recite that on June 1, 1936, the mining claims stood of record title in the sole name of M. T. Bush as locator; that he and Josephine Bush entered into a written twenty-year lease of the property with Rogers and Mosher; that Josephine Bush was personally present when the lease was executed and that she consented to its execution; that the lease is a valid and binding agreement upon the parties; that Prince is the assignee of the Mosher interest, and that the defendants have on their part substantially performed all of the terms and conditions of the lease. Judgment was entered for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Plaintiffs contend that the lease was invalid because the mining claims were community property and plaintiff wife did not join in the lease as required by Civil Code, sec. 172a, also that defendants' rights have been terminated by notice of forfeiture for failure to comply with provisions of the lease in regard to diligent development of the claims.

[1] If plaintiffs' contention with regard to the forfeiture is correct, the controversy is at an end. We will therefore first consider that question, and the evidence pertaining thereto. The lease provided:

"* * * that said Lessees do hereby covenant and agree with said Lessor as follows, to-wit:

"1. To on or before 90 days from date hereof, to enter upon said above described Gypsum claim and continuously open up and develop the same in order that the greatest amount of Gypsum may be taken out on a commercial basis.

"2. To work and develop said Gypsum claims continuously in such workman-like manner as the maximum tonnage of said Gypsum may be removed and sold; and that any failure to work said Gypsum claims with sufficient force for a period of 90 days consecutively may be by said Lessor considered a violation of this covenant and a termination of this lease."

The evidence shows that defendants immediately upon the execution of the lease made surveys, built a trail, tested the ground for quality and area and to determine the status of the deposit; installed a metal chute and laid pipes for a distance of four hundred feet; caused assays to be made of powder and rock, and expended over $1,000 for materials and labor. There was a period when the roads were impassable on account of weather conditions, and this, together with the impracticability of mining gypsum when dampened (by rain), caused a delay in working the mine. However, gypsum was mined on the claims and sold. On the question of forfeiture, the court from the evidence presented found for the defendants. We are unable to interfere with the finding that they substantially performed all of the terms and conditions of the lease.

With regard to appellants' contentions that a mining claim, the location of which was perfected during marriage, is community property, regardless of the fact that it was located and stands in the name of the husband alone, and second, that the lease was invalid because the wife did not join therein as required by section 172a of the Civil Code, respondents contend that where a wife participates in negotiations preliminary to the making of a lease, makes no objection thereto, and by her actions indicates her approval of its execution, her consent is established and she is estopped to deny its validity.

If respondents' position is correct, it will not be necessary to decide in this case whether the location of a mining claim by the husband alone during coverture constitutes community property.

[2] Appellants assert that the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to constitute an estoppel, and that this defense is not available to respondents because they did not plead it. It should be noted that there is no direct finding on community rights of the wife herein, or on the question of estoppel. It must be assumed that had findings been made thereon, they would have supported the judgment. Creason v. Creason, 123 Cal.App. 455, 11 P.2d 451; Bliss v. Sneath, 119 Cal. 526, 51 P. 848.

[3, 4] Under Civil Code, sec. 172a, a wife by her conduct may be estopped to attack the validity of an instrument because she did not join therein. Vierra v. Periera, 12 Cal.2d 629, 86 P.2d 816; Mark v. Title Guarantee, etc., Co., 122 Cal.App. 301, 9 P.2d 839; Rice v. McCarthy, 73 Cal.App. 655, 239 P. 56. Mrs. Bush was present during a conversation between defendant Mosher and her husband about ten days before the execution of the lease, at which the development of the claim under the proposed lease was discussed. She was present also in the office of her husband's attorney during a general discussion of its terms on the day of and just prior to its execution, and she was present also during a conversation held in the month of November relative to a prospective sale of the leasehold interest. Mrs. Bush verified the complaint in this quiet title action. No allegation appears therein that her claim of ownership was based upon a community property interest, and there is no evidence by her, although she was present at the trial, that she ever denied giving her consent to the execution of the lease.

There is no intention herein to hold that a wife's failure to sign a lease necessarily implies that she consents to its execution by her husband. However, the circumstances of this transaction are sufficient to show a waiver on the part of the wife of her interest, community or otherwise, in the matter of a lease on the property.

[5-7] The matter of appellants' contention that respondents are precluded from raising the defense of estoppel because they did not plead it, necessitates a consideration of the pleadings. Ordinarily an estoppel must be pleaded, but there are exceptions to this rule. A quiet title action may be framed in the customary brief form, simply alleging that plaintiffs are the owners and entitled to possession, and that defendants claim an interest, adverse to plaintiffs, which is without right. Plaintiffs used the simple form. Defendants answered, alleging they were entitled to possession by virtue of a lease. In the matter of pleading, it was not necessary at this point to anticipate that plaintiffs would claim the lease to be invalid under the provisions of section 172a. The discussion by the parties, as the evidence shows, related primarily to the question of the sufficiency of the work performed by defendants under the terms of the lease. After answer, no amended complaint was filed alleging the lease to be invalid. It is true that at the opening of the trial, plaintiffs' counsel referred to the property as community property, and stated it was necessary that the wife join in the execution of the lease, "and we may show it as the case progresses a little farther". Plaintiffs' counsel also stated that prima facie proof of location was all that was necessary, but that additional matters might be taken up, depending upon the defense. For the first time during the trial, an objection was made to the introduction of the lease, and subsequently on a motion "to strike out the contract on the ground it is shown that this is community property and the wife has not joined in the execution of the lease", attention was directly called to the fact that plaintiffs were relying upon the claim that the lease was invalid. In the pleadings in this case, plaintiffs relied upon ownership; in the evidence, particular attack was leveled at non-performance by defendants of the terms of the lease.

In Kenny v. Christianson, 200 Cal. 419, 424, 425, 253 P. 715, 717, 50 A.L.R. 1297, in discussing the necessity of a plea of estoppel as applied to a quiet title proceeding, the court said: "* * * the defendant is not required in his pleadings to anticipate such other contentions as the plaintiff may seek to rely upon when her main reliance for her right of recovery has failed her, and which do not appear upon the face of her complaint. In such cases the defendant may await the assertion by the plaintiff in her proof of such additional foundation for her right of recovery and may then oppose the same with his evidence of an equitable estoppel." California S. F. Corp. v. Riverside F. Co., 111 Cal.App. 151, 295 P. 555; Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Kurtz Kauffman, Judge.

Action by the Santa Monica Ice and Cold Storage Company against Wayne Rossier and others for an injunction against disclosure and unlawful use of trade secrets and confidential information obtained by some of defendants while in plaintiff's employ. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

M. Tellefson, of Culver City, and William A. Sherwin, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Donald J. Dunne, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

For a number of years the plaintiff had been engaged in the sale of ice in the city of Santa Monica through distributors who were paid a salary and commission. The defendants, Rossier, Matheson and Matheson, as co-partners, were selling ice out of Culver City under the trade name of Pure Ice Company. The defendants, Jacobs, Sr., Jacobs, Jr., and Tanner, were employees of plaintiff. In March, 1938, the three last named defendants left plaintiff's employment and engaged to work for the partnership in competition with plaintiff. The Santa Monica district had been divided by plaintiff into two working territories designated in the evidence as route No. 1 and route No. 2. While employed by plaintiff, Jacobs, Jr., had worked route No. 1, Tanner had worked route No. 2, and Jacobs, Sr., had worked both. Jacobs, Sr., was the father of Jacobs, Jr., and the father-in-law of Tanner. In an effort to avoid a charge of unfair competition the partnership assigned Jacobs, Jr., to route No. 2 and Tanner to route No. 1, while Jacobs, Sr., worked with both in both territories. Before leaving the employment of plaintiff, Jacobs, Jr., notified his customers of the proposed change and asked them to patronize Tanner. Jacobs, Sr., took Tanner through the district and urged his former customers to give him their trade. At the beginning of their new employment one or more of these defendants was accompanied by Rossier, to whom their former customers were designated. In some instances when the party had been a customer of the employee accompanying Rossier the latter personally made the deliveries. The plaintiff was able to show that, because of these activities of the several defendants, it had lost a large number of its customers. Its application for an injunction to restrain these activities was granted, and all defendants appeal. They attack the judgment both as to the restraint placed upon the three former employees of the plaintiff, and as to that placed upon the partnership which gave them their new employment.

The gravamen of the action is the alleged disclosure and unlawful use of trade secrets and confidential information obtained by the former employees through the good will and personal contacts fostered by their employers. Particular emphasis is laid on the "route books" which it is charged these employees made use of in their new employment. The respondent states the character and value of these books as follows: "Each of the distributors has a particular established trade route. The names and addresses of plaintiff's customers are kept in specially prepared loose leaf volumes, containing the names and addresses of the customers, the days upon which deliveries of ice are to be made and other information such as whether the customer is a cash customer or charge customer, together with any special information respecting the habits, customs and preferences of the customer. Each driver is furnished with such a volume (known as a route book) covering the particular territory and route which has been assigned to such driver. A duplicate of the list is kept in the office of the Company and from time to time is checked with the route book so as to add new customers who may from time to time be acquired. These lists have been compiled and are maintained at the expenditure of a substantial sum of money by the Company and enable the plaintiff to keep a check upon its business and to increase and extend it where possible."

The trial court found that the appellants constituting the partnership employed the other appellants for the purpose of learning the trade secrets of respondents and that all the appellants were working in co-operation for the purpose of taking away the business of respondent; that the secrets and other information obtained by the former employees of respondent through use of the "route books" and otherwise was disclosed one to the other "so that each of the said defendants would be able to go forth and solicit the business of plaintiff's customers whether on the route theretofore served by respective defendants personally or the route of the other defendants and to turn the business and trade secured thereby over to the Pure Ice Company; that in furtherance of said scheme and plan the said defendants in this paragraph named exchanged their respective trade routes and territories in the manner herein alleged for the purpose and with the object of attempting to evade their duties and obligations to plaintiff arising by reason of their employment by plaintiff and the knowledge and information acquired by them while in the course of their employment by plaintiff and for the further purpose of evading the principles of justice, right and equity established by law for the protection of the trade secrets of plaintiff as the former employer of defendants, and each and all of them."

[1] There is substantial evidence to support this finding as well as all others merging into the judgment. Appellants are not able to contend otherwise. Their references to minor conflicts in the evidence have no bearing in face of the rule that a finding will not be disturbed on appeal when supported by substantial evidence. In short, the appellants rest their case on the specious argument that each of the former employees was soliciting in the territory heretofore served by another. But the evidence is plain that the three worked in co-operation, one soliciting for the other and the three for all. We attach no importance to the fact that some deliveries were made to "card customers" —parties displaying a card showing that ice was wanted. These cards had all been left with the customers by these former employees after they had been first solicited as customers.

[2, 3] The case comes squarely within the rule stated in 28 Am.Jur., p. 304, as follows: "The disclosure by an employee of trade secrets and other confidential information obtained by him in the course of his employment is a breach of trust, and it is well settled that a court of equity will restrain any threatened disclosure or use thereof to the detriment of the employer. The character of the secrets, if peculiar and important to the business is not material. They may be secrets of trade, secrets of title, secrets of process of manufacture, or any other secrets of the employer important to his business." This principle is carried into the State Labor Code, section 2860, St.1937, p. 260, reading: "Everything which an employee acquires by virtue of his employment, except the compensation which is due to him from his employer, belongs to the employer, whether acquired lawfully or unlawfully, or during or after the expiration of the term of his employment."

The same principle is found in 14 Cal. Jur., p. 198, 199, reading: "If a person establishes a trade or business which depends for its continuance upon keeping secret the names of customers or other valuable information known to such person, no agent or employee having been intrusted with such secrets in the course of his employment, may thereafter utilize his secret knowledge against the interests or to the prejudice of such person. * * * This rule rests also upon the broad general principle that an agent has no right to employ, as against his principal, materials which the agent has obtained only for his principal and in the course of his agency. Accordingly, in proper cases, an injunction will issue to protect the rights of a principal as against his agent who has taken an unfair advantage of the confidential relationship which exists between them".

The leading case in this state on the subject, Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, 165 Cal. 95, 130 P. 1180, 44 L.R.A.,N.S., 1159, Ann.Cas.1914C, 628, has been followed repeatedly, and no authority to the contrary is cited. The later cases, such as Gloria Ice Cream, etc., Co. v. Cowan, 2 Cal.2d 460, 41 P.2d 340, and Langendorf United Bakeries v. Phillips, 5 Cal.2d 150, 53 P.2d 363, complete an unanimous adherence to the rule.

[4, 5] The suggestion that the partnership is not subject to the remedy sought is not sound. The evidence showed that it employed the other appellants for the purpose of discovering and using the trade secrets which these employees had obtained while in the service of respondent. It appeared that the partnership was using this information to the damage of respondent. In Pasadena Ice Company v. Reeder, 206 Cal. 697, 275 P. 944, 276 P. 995, Gloria Ice Cream, etc., Co. v. Cowan, supra, and Langendorf United Bakeries v. Phillips, supra, the injunctions ran against the new employer restraining him from using the information obtained by the new employee as agent of his former employer. In this manner the remedy to which the plaintiff has been found to be entitled to is made effective and complete. It is a cardinal rule of equity that the court has power to make its decrees effective and that when it has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter its decree will be complete in order to terminate the litigation if possible. 10 Cal.Jur., p. 559; 21 Cor.Jur., p. 134; Rolapp v. Federal Bldg., etc., Ass'n, 11 Cal.App.2d 337, 343, 53 P.2d 974. We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

WALKER et al. v. ETCHEVERRY et al.

Civ. 2538.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 17, 1941.

1. Death ⇐41

In action by infants, by and through their mother as guardian ad litem, for death of father, failure to join the mother as widow resulted in "misjoinder of parties" plaintiff, since death statute gives single joint cause of action so far as heirs are concerned. Code Civ.Proc. § 377.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Misjoinder of Parties".

2. Appeal and error ⇐1170(1)

Misjoinder of parties plaintiff does not of itself necessitate reversal of judgment for plaintiffs unless the party complaining has been misled to his prejudice or the error otherwise appears to have been injurious. Code Civ.Proc. § 475; Const. art. 6, § 4½.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1170(1)

In action by infants, by mother as guardian ad litem, for father's death, wherein misjoinder resulting from failure to join mother as widow was apparent on face of amended complaint and must have been known to defendants more than six months before date of trial, and no issue of misjoinder was raised until trial, and judgment roll only was before reviewing court, such misjoinder did not result in "miscarriage of justice" and was not prejudicial. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 377, 475; Const. art. 6, § 4½.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Miscarriage of Justice".

4. Trial ⇐400(1)

In cause tried without a jury, court had statutory power to change or add to findings if there was evidence to support such action, irrespective of whether second amended complaint was filed. Code Civ.Proc. § 662.

5. Appeal and error ⇐907(2)

Where evidence was not before reviewing court, reviewing court must assume in absence of showing to the contrary that there was evidence to support finding added by trial court sitting without a jury. Code Civ.Proc. § 662.

6. Appeal and error ⇐1170(3)

In action by infants, by their mother as guardian ad litem, for death of father, permitting the filing of amended complaint, alleging that mother was not dependent upon father at time of accident and did not claim damage but joined as plaintiff merely to comply with statute so as to prevent misjoinder, did not result in "miscarriage of justice" and was not prejudicial. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 377, 475, 662; Const. art. 6, § 4½.

7. Judgment ⇐597

A widow, by bringing death action as guardian ad litem for children, was barred by "estoppel" from thereafter bringing an action in her own right. Code Civ.Proc. § 377.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estoppel".

8. Action ⇐53(2)

Since there can be but one action under statute for wrongful death, widow could not bring a second action for her own damage after bringing action for death as guardian ad litem for children. Code Civ.Proc. § 377.

Action by Thomas E. Walker and others, by and through their mother, Roxie Walker, as guardian ad litem, against Filbert Joe Etcheverry and others, to recover for death of Thomas W. Walker. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order on motion for new trial adding to findings already made, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Borton, Petrini, Conron & Borton, of Bakersfield, and Farnsworth, Burke & Maddox, of Visalia, for appellants.

Bradley & Bradley, of Visalia, for respondents.

KLETTE, Justice pro tem.

This action was instituted by plaintiffs and respondents Thomas E. Walker, Leon Walker, and Clara Mae Walker, minors, by and through their mother, Roxie Walker, now Roxie Goree, as guardian ad litem, to recover for the death of their father, Thomas W. Walker, through the alleged negligence of Filbert Joe Etcheverry and Mariana Etcheverry, defendants and appellants. An amended complaint was filed by plaintiffs, to which a general demurrer was interposed by defendants. This demurrer being overruled, an answer to the amended complaint was duly filed. The case was then regularly set for trial on June 27, 1939, on which day defendants and appellants, by leave of the court, filed an unverified amendment to their answer, alleging for the first time, misjoinder of parties plaintiff, because all of the heirs of Thomas W. Walker were not joined as plaintiffs, in that Roxie Walker, the widow of Thomas W. Walker, was not joined.

Trial was had on that date before the court, sitting without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the three minor children of deceased, for $4,740. Findings and judgment were filed August 7, 1939, and a motion for a new trial was made and set for hearing on August 28, 1939.

On September 6, 1939, a second amended complaint was filed, which for the first time, contained the following allegation: "That said plaintiff, Roxie Goree, formerly Roxie Walker, was not at the time of said accident dependent upon said Thomas W. Walker, the deceased, and does not claim nor has sustained damage by reason of the death of said Thomas W. Walker, but joins herein as party plaintiff as an heir of said deceased for the purpose of complying with the provisions of Section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California."

On the same day the court denied the motion for a new trial, and in its order recited the filing of the second amended complaint, by leave of the court, and stated that Roxie Goree, formerly Roxie Walker, was a necessary party plaintiff to the action, and ordered an addition to the findings already made, as follows: "That said plaintiff, Roxie Goree, formerly Roxie Walker, was not at the time of said accident dependent upon said Thomas W. Walker, deceased, and that she does not claim nor has she sustained damage by reason of the death of said Thomas W. Walker."

This appeal is taken from the judgment made and entered August 7, 1939, from the judgment and decision as modified by the "Order on Motion for New Trial", and from the "Order on Motion for New Trial", dated September 6, 1939.

Orders were made by the trial court, on motion, terminating proceedings for preparation of transcript on appeal, and denying relief from default. An appeal was taken from these orders, which were affirmed. Walker v. Etcheverry, 38 Cal.App.2d 611, 101 P.2d 709. Motion was then made to dismiss the appeal, which was denied. Walker v. Etcheverry, 39 Cal.App.2d 188, 102 P.2d 758. The case is therefore before the court on the judgment roll alone.

It appeared on the face of both the petition for appointment of guardian ad litem and the amended complaint, that Roxie Walker, now Roxie Goree, was the mother of the minor plaintiffs, and the widow of Thomas W. Walker, for whose death said minors were seeking damages. It also appeared from the amended complaint that the widow was not seeking any damage for herself.

[1] Section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure gives a cause of action to the heirs or personal representatives of a person whose death has been caused by the wrongful act or negligence of another. It has been held that so far as the heirs are concerned, a single joint cause of action is given. Daubert v. Western Meat Co., 139 Cal. 480, 69 P. 297, 73 P. 244, 96 Am.St. Rep. 154; Salmon v. Rathjens, 152 Cal. 290, 92 P. 733.

[2] While we must conclude there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff in this action, that fact does not, of itself, necessitate a reversal of the judgment on appeal, unless the party complaining has been misled to his prejudice, or the error otherwise appears to have been injurious. There are many cases to this effect, of which the following are a few of the more recent. Mayer v. West, 96 Cal.App. 31, 273 P. 849; House v. Pacific Greyhound Lines, 35 Cal.App.2d 336, 95 P.2d 465; Union Oil Co. v. Domengeaux, 30 Cal.App. 2d 266, 86 P.2d 127; Moon v. Marker, 26 Cal.App.2d 33, 78 P.2d 460; sec. 475, Code Civ.Proc.

[3] The judgment roll only being before us, there is of course nothing which shows that defendants and appellants have been misled to their prejudice, or that the error otherwise appears to have been injurious. Indeed, it is difficult to see how the appellants could have been misled, prejudiced, or injured, when such misjoinder was apparent on the face of the amended complaint, and must have been known to them, more than six months before the date of trial, and no issue was raised upon that point until the trial.

This brings us to the final point of the case, as to whether the court erred in permitting the second amended complaint to be filed, and in adding to its findings, at the time of denying the motion for a new trial.

[4-6] In section 662 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to motions for new trial, it is provided: "In ruling on such motion, in a cause tried without a jury, the court may, on such terms as may be just, change or add to the findings". This power the court had, whether the second amended complaint was, or was not filed, if there was evidence to support such finding. The evidence is not before us, and in the absence of a showing to the contrary, we must assume that there was evidence to support this added finding. It it unnecessary, therefore, to pass upon the question as to whether it was error to permit the filing of the second amended complaint.

Section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "No judgment, decision, or decree shall be reversed or affected by reason of any error, ruling, instruction, or defect, unless it shall appear from the record that such error, ruling, instruction, or defect was prejudicial, and also that by reason of such error, ruling, instruction, or defect, the said party complaining or appealing sustained and suffered substantial injury, and that a different result would have been probable if such error, ruling, instruction, or defect had not occurred or existed. There shall be no presumption that error is prejudicial, or that injury was done if error is shown."

If we were to assume that it was error for the court to permit the filing of the second amended complaint, and to make the added finding, where can appellants show that they have been prejudiced thereby, or sustained substantial injury, or that a different result would have been probable, if such error had not been made.

[7, 8] The widow, by bringing this action, as guardian ad litem for the children, was estopped from thereafter bringing an action in her own right. Girard v. Irvine, 97 Cal.App. 377, 275 P. 840. By the amendment, in the second amended complaint, she disclaimed any right to damage, and the added finding held she was not entitled to any. This was not harmful to appellants, but favorable to them. Since there can be but one action under section 377, supra, the widow could not bring a second action for her own damage. Daubert v. Western Meat Co., supra; Salmon v. Rathjens, supra. The failure to name the widow as plaintiff was not to the disadvantage of appellants, for, had she been named, the effect would have been, as said in Salmon v. Rathjens, supra [152 Cal. 290, 92 P. 736], "to enhance rather than to diminish the damage".

The court concludes that the errors, if any, that appear in the record, have not been prejudicial to appellants, have not caused them to suffer any substantial injury, and that a different result would not be probable, had such errors not occurred. Such errors have not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, within the meaning of section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution of California.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

OLSON et al. v. FOSTER et al.

Civ. 12197.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 21, 1941.

1. Trusts ⇐169(1)

The superior court has power to appoint trustees of a private trust when the office becomes vacant or upon misconduct of a trustee.

2. Pleading ⇐249(3)

Where original complaint named defendants therein, both personally and as trustees, whereas amended complaint named them only in their representative capacity, there was not a change of the character of the cause of action, as against contention that amended complaint was filed in an effort to state a cause of action in equity rather than at law for sole purpose of depriving defendants of their right to trial by jury.

3. Pleading ⇐249(3), 252(1)

Where original complaint to recover value of legal services was filed against defendants personally and as trustees of certain trusts and amended complaint named defendants only in their representative capacity, the nature of the suit remained the same and the amended complaint merely dismissed the action as to the defendants sued personally.

4. Jury ⇐14(5)

Where amended complaint filed against trustee sought to recover judgment for legal services rendered in behalf of certain trusts and to impress upon trust property a lien, complaint stated a cause of action in equity, so that court properly proceeded to try issues without a jury.

5. Jury ⇐14(5)

Original complaint naming defendants therein both personally and as trustees and seeking to establish reasonable value of legal services rendered for benefit of trust estates, stated a cause of action in equity rather than a cause of action at law as to which defendants would have been entitled to a jury trial.

6. Jury ⇐14(5)

Amended complaint against trustees in their representative capacity seeking value of legal services rendered and also to charge amount thereof against trust properties and decree directing payment from trust fund stated a cause of action in equity as to which defendants were not entitled to jury trial.

7. Trusts ⇐250

Creditors when required by their contract of employment to look solely to trust estate for compensation may proceed in equity for satisfaction of such claims out of trust estate.

8. Jury ⇐14(5)
Trusts ⇐211

Where contract employing plaintiffs as attorneys was made by defendants as individuals at a time when defendants were only unit holders in a trust but where following defendants' appointment as trustees and while acting in that capacity, defendants recognized plaintiffs as their attorneys and as attorneys for all unit holders and accepted benefits of plaintiffs' legal services, such conduct of trustees amounted to a "ratification" of the contract so that attorneys' action to enforce rights under the contract was one in equity as to which defendants were not entitled to jury trial.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ratification".

9. Trusts ⇐211

Where contract employing plaintiffs as attorneys was made by defendants as individuals, at a time when they were only unit holders in a trust, it was within the scope of defendants' authority, after their appointment as trustees, for defendants as trustees to avail themselves of plaintiffs' legal services under the existing agreement and in doing so they bound the trust property to compensate plaintiffs for such services. Civ.Code, § 2267.

10. Trusts ⇐211

Where contract employing plaintiffs as attorneys was made by defendants as individuals at a time when defendants were only unit holders in a trust but after defendants' appointment as trustees they made substantial payment to plaintiffs on account of the employment contract, there was a "ratification" of the contract by the trustees rendering trust property liable for services rendered by the attorney. Civ.Code, § 2267.

11. Trusts ⇐250

Action by attorneys to establish reasonable value of services rendered for benefit of trust estate, to recover value of services, to charge the amount thereof against trust property and to obtain decree directing payment from trust funds was properly brought in a court of equity notwithstanding legal relief ensued as an incidental part of judgment rendered.

12. Jury ⇐13(3)

In an equity proceeding a jury trial is not a matter of right.

13. Trial ⇐374(2)

Even though a court may, in the exercise of its discretion, call a jury to assist in the trial of a case in equity, the court is not bound by findings of the jury.

14. Trusts ⇐263

In action against trustees of four trusts to recover reasonable value of services rendered for benefit of trust estate and to impress charge upon trust property for amount thereof, findings declaring that services were rendered and fixing value of services and balance due was not objectionable on ground that they failed to find value of services to each of the trusts where contract of employment related to all of the trusts, and partial payments were made on behalf of all the trusts and services were performed as to all the trusts.

15. Trusts ⇐240

Where contract of employment of attorneys related to all four trusts for which trustees were acting, partial payments were made to attorneys by trustees on behalf of all trusts and services were performed as to all trusts, and all of the trusts in behalf of which trustees negotiated the employment contract received benefits therefrom, the liability imposed upon the trusts for the attorneys' services was both joint and several. Civ.Code, § 1659.

16. Contracts ⇐184

The statute providing that where all parties who unite in a promise receive some benefit from the consideration, whether past or present, their promise is presumed to be joint and several does not require that several obligees to a promise shall receive benefits in equal proportions but only that the several obligees receive some benefit from the contract. Civ.Code, § 1659.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Action by C. L. Olson and others against F. E. Foster and others, personally and as trustees for holders of participating interest in certain trusts, to recover for value of legal services. By supplemental and amended complaints, defendants were sued only as trustees of certain trusts and trust estates and in addition to seeking recovery of amount of fees allegedly due, plaintiff sought to impress trust property and assets with a lien. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Paul R. Hutchinson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

C. L. Olson and Olson & Ahlport, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WHITE, Justice.

C. C. Julian was the lessee of two oil and gas leases. He undertook to drill and operate four oil wells on them, setting up a separate trust as to each, being wells one, two and three on one lease, and well eleven on the other. A bank was made passive trustee to hold title and act as depositary and distributor of funds on them. He was active trustee to operate them. He sold participating interests in the separate trusts to different persons known as unit-holders.

[1] In an action pertaining to the title to the leases and other matters, Redfield, Foster and Penn intervened. Respondents were there attorneys. Later R. S. Brenneman was substituted for Redfield. In that action the court appointed these interveners as the trustees in place of C. C. Julian, pursuant to the power of the superior court to appoint trustees of a private trust when the office becomes vacant or upon the misconduct of the trustee. Respondents were retained by the interveners before they intervened and before they were appointed trustees. They continued to represent them thereafter in all matters pertaining to their intervention.

Subsequent to the completion of the litigation just mentioned, respondents filed an action to recover the value of their legal services against appellants "personally and as trustees for the holders of participating interests in Julian Wells 1, 2, 3 and 11, Santa Fe Springs oil district, Los Angeles County, California", wherein judgment was prayed for against the aforesaid defendants named therein for the value of respondents' services when the same was determined by the court. An attachment was also issued following the filing of this complaint. Appellants herein, as defendants in that case, filed an answer, and the cause was set for trial. Promptly upon service of the "setting card" upon them, defendants made demand for a jury, and the necessary jury fees were deposited and remained on deposit at all times thereafter. The case was accordingly set for trial before a jury. Thereafter respondents, obtaining leave of court, filed a supplemental and amended complaint, to which a demurrer was interposed and overruled, following which an answer was duly filed. When the cause was called for trial the court, over appellants' objection and notwithstanding compliance by them with all statutory requirements, ruled that they were not entitled to a jury trial as a matter of right, and proceeded to try the cause without a jury. It should here be noted that by their supplemental and amended complaint respondents sued appellants only "as trustees of certain trusts and trust estates known and described as Julian Wells One, Two, Three and Eleven, Santa Fe Springs Oil District, Los Angeles County, California", and in addition to seeking a recovery of the amount of fees allegedly due them, sought to impress the trust property and assets with a lien therefor. Following trial, judgment was rendered in favor of respondents and provided further that respondents have a lien upon and against the moneys, funds, properties and estates of said trusts and each of them.

[2-4] As a first ground of appeal, it is urged that the amended complaint fails to state a cause of action. In support of this claim it is argued that the original complaint was an action at law and not in equity; that the amended complaint was filed in an effort to state a cause of action in equity rather than at law for the sole purpose of depriving appellants of their right to a trial by jury. In this contention we do not agree with appellants. The original complaint named the defendants therein both personally and as trustees, while the amended complaint named them only in their representative capacity. This does not change the character of the cause of action. The nature of the suit remained the same, and the amended complaint merely dismissed the action as to certain defendants sued personally in the original pleading. Seeking as it does to recover judgment for services rendered in behalf of certain trusts and to impress upon the trust property a lien, the amended complaint filed against the trustees clearly stated a cause of action in equity, for reasons to be hereinafter pointed out. The demurrer was properly overruled, and the action of the court in proceeding to try the issues without a jury was correct.

[5-7] We are not in accord with appellants' claim that the original complaint set up a cause of action at law. It was clearly brought in equity to establish the reasonable value of services rendered for the benefit of a trust estate, and while it named the defendants individually, it also joined them in their capacity as trustees. That the amended complaint, which in addition to seeking the value of services rendered also sought to charge the amount thereof against the trust properties and a decree directing payment from the trust funds, stated a cause of action in equity, is beyond question. That creditors such as were respondents here, when required by their contract of employment to look solely to the trust estate for compensation, may proceed in equity for the satisfaction of such claims out of the trust estate, is firmly established as the law of this state. Cullinan v. Mercantile Trust Co., 80 Cal.App. 377, 252 P. 647.

[8-10] Appellants' next contention is that the action is not one in equity because the contract upon which it is predicated was made at a time prior to the appointment of appellants as trustees by the court and was never ratified or adopted by them as their contract subsequent to their appointment as such trustees, and that the contract is "vague, indefinite and insufficient upon its face". True, the contract was made by appellants as individuals and at a time when they were only unit-holders and interested parties, but it was alleged in the amended complaint and remained unchallenged by the answer thereto that following their appointment as trustees and while acting in that capacity appellants continued to recognize respondents as their attorneys and as the attorneys for all the unit-holders, and accepted and received the benefits of respondents' legal services in contemplation of and with full knowledge and approval of the terms, conditions and provisions of the employment agreement. Such conduct on the part of appellant trustees certainly amounted to a ratification of the existing contract. It was within the scope of their authority as trustees for appellants to avail themselves of respondents' services under the existing agreement, and in so doing they bound the trust property to compensate for such services. Civ.Code, § 2267. It further appears that such ratification also took the form of making substantial payments by the trustees to respondents on account of the employment contract following the appointment of appellants as such trustees. We find nothing "vague, indefinite or insufficient" upon the face of the contract, while a review of the findings made by the trial judge indicates that he experienced little, if any, difficulty in construing and interpreting the agreement in question.

[11-13] Considering the nature of the rights involved in the instant litigation, as indicated by the pleadings and the facts, though legal relief ensued as an incidental part of the judgment herein rendered, nevertheless the gist of the action is for the enforcement of rights against a trust and rights against trust properties, both cognizable in equity, and the proceeding was properly brought in a court of equity. Cullinan v. Mercantile Trust Co., supra. It is a well-established rule in this state that in an equitable proceeding a jury trial is not a matter of right, and even though a court may in the exercise of its discretion, call a jury to assist in the trial of the matter, nevertheless the court is not bound in such a case by the findings of the jury. 15 Cal.Jur. 331, § 11; Cauhape v. Security Savings Bank, 127 Cal. 197, 59 P. 589; Pomeroy v. Collins, 198 Cal. 46, 243 P. 657; Union Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Broderick, 196 Cal. 497, 238 P. 1034; Ballou v. Avery, 175 Cal. 641, 166 P. 1003; Bettencourt v. Bank of Italy, 216 Cal. 174, 13 P.2d 659.

[14-16] Finally, appellants challenge the sufficiency of the findings as being deficient in that they fail to find on the value of respondents' services to each of the trusts of which appellants were trustees. This claim is without merit. As admitted by appellants, the findings declare that the legal services were rendered by respondents as alleged. Then follows a finding as to the value of such services and the balance due respondents. The contract of employment related to all the trusts, and the partial payments made to respondents by appellants on account of the contractual services were made on behalf of all the trusts, while the services were performed as to all the trusts. Each and all of the trusts in behalf of which the trustees negotiated the employment agreement received benefits therefrom, and consequently it must be held that the liability imposed upon the trusts was both joint and several. Civ. Code, § 1659. The cited section does not require that several obligees to a promise shall receive benefits in equal proportions, but only that the several obligees receive some benefit from the contracts.

For the reasons herein set forth, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Replevin ⇐8(3, 4)

To sustain an action for recovery of specific personalty, plaintiff must have the right to immediate and exclusive possession of the personalty at the time of the commencement of the action, although it is not essential that he should show that he ever had actual possession of it.

A chattel mortgage which provides that on default mortgagee may immediately take possession of the property and sell it to pay the debt, gives mortgagee a "special interest" in the mortgaged property and the right to its immediate possession, sufficient to maintain an action for its recovery should the mortgagor after demand refuse to surrender possession.

4. Assignments ⇐1

The word "assign" in the ordinary legal sense means to transfer title or ownership of property and is usually but not always used in connection with the transfer of a thing in action, and may be used to indicate an act whereby title to property is conveyed by one living person to another.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Assign".

5. Assignments ⇐1

In legal phraseology, the word "transfer" is commonly used to denote the passing of title in property, usually realty, or an interest therein from one person to another. Civ.Code, § 1039.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Transfer".

6. Assignments ⇐1

The word "transfer" in its ordinary use has a very general meaning, including the removal of a thing from one place or person to another, the changing of its control or possession, or the conveyance of title to it, and a transfer of property may be effected by delivery of its possession to another.

7. Assignments ⇐1

Where a document is prepared by one skilled in the law, the word "transfer" may be synonymous with the word "convey" and connote the passing of title by legal instrument. Civ.Code, § 1039.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Convey".

8. Appeal and error ⇐1008(3)

When a contract is susceptible of two or more reasonable interpretations, it is the province of the trial judge to construe it.

9. Appeal and error ⇐1008(3)

If interpretation placed by trial judge on contract is reasonable, the trial judge's decision will not be disturbed on appeal, even though there is another equally reasonable interpretation.

10. Appeal and error ⇐1008(3)

Where contract relating to liquidation of indebtedness, provided that assets of debtor's business should be immediately "assigned and transferred" to creditor in case of default, trial judge's construction of contract to mean that debtor would execute instrument conveying title to creditor, and not that debtor would give immediate possession to creditor, which precluded creditor from maintaining claim and delivery action to recover the assets because of absence of right to immediate possession which was "condition precedent" to maintenance of such an action, was reasonable, and could not be disturbed on appeal, even though another equally reasonable construction might have been placed on the contract.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Condition Precedent".

11. Contracts ⇐170(1)

Where terms of contract are uncertain and capable of more than one reasonable construction, the practical construction put upon it by the parties furnishes one of the most reliable means of arriving at their intention when executing it.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery by the Commercial Discount Company against O. L. Cowen to recover possession of certain property. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Chapman & Chapman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred A. Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action in claim and delivery to recover all motor vehicles, machinery, furniture, office and garage furnishings, fixtures, equipment, cash and checks, and all accounts, notes and contracts receivable at defendant's place of business in Barstow, California. It was alleged that plaintiff was entitled to the immediate possession of this property, and had demanded immediate possession from defendant which had been refused. Among other things, the answer put in issue plaintiff's right of possession and its demand for immediate possession. The trial court found in favor of defendant on these issues and entered judgment for him. This appeal followed.

The determination of this appeal rests largely on the interpretation to be placed on a contract entered into by the parties on March 15, 1937. This contract recites that defendant had three places of business in connection with his motor vehicle business. One was located in San Bernardino, a second in Rialto and a third in Barstow.

Defendant had become indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $53,000 which it was desired to liquidate. He had a prospective sale or plan of liquidation of the business in San Bernardino and Rialto. He agreed to open an escrow within ten days, having as its object the liquidation of the assets of those places of business. The term of the escrow was fixed at thirty days. A period of sixty days after the closing of the escrow was given within which to proceed with the liquidation, with an option of terminating it at an earlier date given to plaintiff should the operations prove unprofitable.

A separate section of the contract dealt with the Barstow business. It opens as follows:

"4. It is understood and agreed that the operations of the said O. L. Cowen business now located at Barstow, California, shall not be included in the proposed escrow and during the life of this Agreement, said operations at Barstow shall remain the property of the said O. L. Cowen, subject, however, to the following terms and conditions:

"In the event of any breach or prior termination of this Agreement, for any reason whatsoever, except by payment in full by the said second party, any and all of the assets of said Barstow operations shall be immediately assigned and transferred to First Party herein for liquidation in any manner and under any process which said First Party may desire; the net proceeds of said liquidation to be credited by said First Party to the indebtedness of said O. L. Cowen, as aforesaid." Then follows details of the plan for liquidation of the Barstow business which are not material here.

[1, 2] It is well settled in California that "To sustain an action for the recovery of specific personal property the plaintiff must have the right to immediate and exclusive possession of such property at the time of the commencement of the action, although it is not essential that he should show that he ever had actual possession of it. While plaintiff must have a general or special property in the thing sought entitling him to such right of possession, it is not essential that he be the absolute owner: a special property therein entitling him to such right of possession is sufficient. But whether the right in the property is general or special, it must entitle the plaintiff to immediate and exclusive possession." 5 Cal.Juris. 160.

[3] This special property in personalty, with the right to its immediate possession which gives the right to bring an action of this kind, is illustrated by the cases involving chattel mortgages which provide that on default a mortgagee may immediately take possession of the mortgaged property and sell it to pay the debt. It is held that such an agreement gives a mortgagee such special interest in the mortgaged property, and the right to its immediate possession, sufficient to maintain an action for its recovery should the mortgagor, after demand, refuse to surrender possession to the mortgagee. Plaintiff relies strongly on such cases. See Commercial & Savings Bank of Stockton v. Foster, 210 Cal. 76, 290 P. 583; Riverside Portland Cement Co. v. Taft, 192 Cal. 643, 221 P. 357; Tuohy v. Linder, 144 Cal. 790, 78 P. 233.

The theory upon which these decisions rest is that the mortgage and the covenant of the mortgagor to deliver possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee for the purpose of sale immediately upon default and demand for possession, gives the mortgagee a special interest and right of immediate possession that will support an action for its possession, after refusal of a demand for possession. The question here is: Does the promise of defendant that the Barstow property "shall be immediately assigned and transferred" to plaintiff amount to a covenant to deliver possession of that property to plaintiff or is it a promise to do some other act which, when performed, but not before, will give plaintiff the right of possession and special property necessary to maintain this action? The answer to this question depends upon the meaning to be given to the words "assigned" and "transferred" which are used in the contract as the measure of defendant's immediate duty under it.

[4] The word assign, in the ordinary legal sense, means to transfer title or ownership of property. Burkett v. Doty, 176 Cal. 89, 167 P. 518. The word is usually, but not always, used in connection with the transfer of a thing in action. It may be used to indicate an act whereby title to property is conveyed by one living person to another. 3 Cal.Juris. 233, et seq.; Offer v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 114, 228 P. 11.

[5, 6] Section 1039 of the Civil Code provides that, "Transfer is an act of the parties, or of the law, by which the title to property is conveyed from one living person to another." See Scholle v. Finnell, 173 Cal. 372, 159 P. 1179; Chambers v. Lamb, 186 Cal. 261, 199 P. 33; In re Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 P. 826. In legal phraseology it is commonly used to denote the passing of title in property, usually realty, or an interest therein from one person to another. In re Okahara, 191 Cal. 353, 216 P. 614; In re Estate of Steehler, 195 Cal. 386, 233 P. 972. In re Estate of Peabody, 154 Cal. 173, 97 P. 184, it was said that while the word "transfer" as used in the Civil Code indicates the passing of title from one person to another, in its ordinary use it has a very general meaning, including the removal of a thing from one place or person to another, the changing of its control or possession or the conveyance of title to it. It is also true that a "transfer" of property may be effected by delivery of its possession to another. In re Estate of Dunphy, 147 Cal. 95, 81 P. 315.

Applying these definitions to the words used in the contract before us, we find, if we regard the words "transferred and assigned", as used in their legal sense, that defendant promised to execute a conveyance of title to the property in question to plaintiff and not to deliver immediate possession to it. Under such circumstances, the right of possession usually follows, but ordinarily does not precede the passing of title. If we adopt the meaning of the words when used in their legal sense we find that defendant promised to execute a document conveying the title of the property to plaintiff, but did not promise to deliver immediate possession to it. On the other hand, if we give to the word "transfer" its meaning in ordinary use, it might mean either the delivery of possession to plaintiff or the conveyance of title to it.

[7] A further rule of construction of assistance to us is announced in Re Estate of Spreckels, 162 Cal. 559, 123 P. 371, where it is held, in effect, that when a document is prepared by one skilled in the law the word "transfer" may be synonymous with the word "convey" and connote the passing of title by a legal instrument. Cheda v. Bodkin, 173 Cal. 7, 158 P. 1025. The contract in question was evidently prepared by one skilled in the law.

[8, 9] It is well settled that when a contract is susceptible of two or more reasonable interpretations it is the province of the trial judge to construe it. If the interpretation which he puts upon it is reasonable, even though there is another equally reasonable, his decision will not be disturbed on appeal. Adams v. Petroleum Midway Co., Ltd., 205 Cal. 221, 270 P. 668; In re Estate of Mallon, 34 Cal. App.2d 147, 93 P.2d 245.

[10] Here, the trial judge construed the contract to mean, not that defendant would give immediate possession of the Barstow property to plaintiff for the purpose of sale and liquidation, but that he would execute an instrument conveying title to plaintiff; that the right of possession would not precede the execution of this document. Under the authorities cited this construction was reasonable and cannot be disturbed here even though he might have placed another equally reasonable construction on the contract.

[11] Support is given the construction put upon the contract by the trial judge by the demand served on defendant by the attorney for plaintiff. He did not demand the immediate possession of the property, but made a demand "for an immediate delivery to said company of your duly executed bill of sale covering the Barstow business". Where the terms of a contract are uncertain and capable of more than one reasonable construction, the practical construction put upon it by the parties furnishes one of the most reliable means of arriving at their intention when executing it. Skousen v. Herz, 135 Cal. App. 116, 26 P.2d 498.

The right to the immediate possession of the property in question was a condition precedent to maintaining this action. Under the findings, plaintiff had no such right of immediate possession. As these findings are supported by the evidence, we cannot disturb the judgment here.

Judgment affirmed.

HONTOU et al. v. ORVIS.

Civ. 6411.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 23, 1941.

1. Appeal and error ⇐931(1)

On appeal the facts must be viewed in the light most favorable to the respondent in support of the judgment.

2. Automobiles ⇐150

All drivers of vehicles on a public highway must keep a vigilant lookout ahead so as to avoid, if reasonably possible, a collision with any other vehicle or person lawfully on the highway, and failure to keep such lookout or failure to see that which may be readily seen, if the driver is looking, constitutes negligence as a matter of law.

3. Automobiles ⇐150

The rule with respect to the lookout required of drivers of vehicles on a public highway to avoid collision with any other vehicle or person lawfully on the highway had no application to action for death of rider of horse which collided with automobile driven by defendant, where, until automobile was almost alongside of the horse, the horse was 10 feet off the highway.

4. Appeal and error ⇐999(3), 1008(1)

In an action for damages resulting from an automobile striking some object on the highway, the question whether the motorist, in looking, sees all that he should have seen, is a fact question for the court or jury.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1008(1)

In action against motorist for death of horseman in collision between automobile and horse, when horse, which motorist contended was 10 feet off the highway, suddenly plunged over onto the highway, the question whether motorist was negligent was solely for the trier of facts, though motorist testified that he did not see the horse until it was about 20 feet away. Vehicle Code, § 532, St.1935, p. 184.

6. Appeal and error ⇐1008(1)

In action against motorist for death of horseman in collision between automobile and horse, when horse, which motorist contended was 10 feet off the highway, suddenly plunged over onto the highway, whether motorist violated the section of the Vehicle Code providing that the driver of any vehicle approaching any ridden animal shall exercise proper control of his vehicle and reduce speed or stop as may appear necessary, or as may be requested by the rider, was for the finder of the facts. Vehicle Code, § 532, St.1935, p. 184.

7. Automobiles ⇐201(2)

Even if that section of the Vehicle Code requiring the driver of any vehicle approaching any horse-drawn vehicle, or any ridden animal, to exercise proper control and reduce speed or stop as may appear necessary, or as may be requested, is violated by a motorist, it does not follow that the motorist is liable for damage or injury arising from collision, but it must be further proved that the violation of the statute contributed directly to the damage or injury. Vehicle Code, § 532, St.1935, p. 184.

8. Appeal and error ⇐1008(1)

In action against motorist for death of horseman in collision between automobile and horse, when horse, which motorist contended was 10 feet off the highway, suddenly plunged over onto the highway, whether motorist's violation of statute requiring the driver of any vehicle approaching a ridden animal to exercise proper control of his vehicle and to reduce speed or stop as may appear necessary or as may be requested, contributed directly to the collision, was for the trier of the facts. Vehicle Code, § 532, St.1935, p. 184.

9. New trial ⇐164

On motion by plaintiffs for a new trial, trial court was authorized under statute to set aside the findings made by the court and adopt new findings more favorable to the defendant in lieu thereof, notwithstanding that plaintiffs did not ask the court to set aside the findings and adopt other findings. Code Civ.Proc. § 662.

10. New trial ⇐164

The statute authorizing a court to set aside its findings and adopt new findings on motion for new trial gives that power when a motion for new trial is made by either party, and the right to adopt other findings thereupon arises, and is not dependent on any other or further application to the trial court. Code Civ.Proc. § 662.

11. New trial ⇐164

The statute authorizing a trial court to set aside findings and adopt new findings in lieu thereof on motion for new trial is a remedial statute and should be liberally construed. Code Civ.Proc. § 662.

12. New trial ⇐164

The statute authorizing a trial court to set aside findings and adopt new findings in lieu thereof on motion for new trial constitutes a grant of power to the trial court to correct judicial errors, to readjudicate the case on the facts, and to make a new decision and judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 662.

13. New trial ⇐164

The obvious purpose of the statute authorizing a trial court to set aside findings and adopt new findings in lieu thereof, on motion for new trial, was to give to the trial court, on denying motion for a new trial, the broad power to change its findings and to modify its judgment and thus avoid the necessity of a new trial. Code Civ.Proc. § 662.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; W. D. L. Held, Judge.

Action by Mary Hontou and others against C. D. Orvis to recover for the death of the husband and father of the plaintiffs. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Burke & Rawles, of Ukiah, and John B. Harman, of Fort Bragg, for appellants.

Honey & Mayall, of Stockton, and James E. Busch, of Ukiah, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice.

This action was brought to recover damages arising out of a collision between an automobile and a horse which Frank Hontou was riding. The latter died as a result of injuries received, and the surviving widow and four children are plaintiffs herein. The trial was by the court, and findings were entered in favor of respondent upon all issues. The appeal is taken from the judgment rendered pursuant to the findings.

[1] Viewing the facts in a light most favorable to respondent, as we are bound to do on appeal, in support of the judgment, the record shows the following circumstances: On the morning of October 25, 1938, the deceased was riding his horse northerly along the right side of the right-of-way of State Highway No. 101, and at a point about a mile from the city of Ukiah. The time was 8:50 a. m., and the weather was dry and clear. Respondent was driving his automobile on the right side of said highway, northerly, and therefore approached the horse from the rear. He was proceeding at a speed of about 45 miles per hour. The first time that he saw the horse it was 10 feet or more off the paved portion, and about 20 feet away. He saw the horse jumping and plunging. It finally plunged over on the highway and against the right front of his car. He was unable to turn out to the left because of a passing car. The deceased was thrown from his horse and received injuries which resulted in his death. The foregoing is a summary of respondent's testimony. His version of the occurrence is corroborated by the driver of a school bus, who saw the entire affair, as he was approaching the scene about 100 yards behind respondent. We quote a portion of his testimony.

"A. Well, I was just—oh, about 100 yards from where this accident happened, and I seen the horse going alongside of the road; I don't know how long I had seen the horse before the accident happened, but the horse evidently just broke and run, run kind of catty-cornered across the road like it was trying to head the car off, and from what I seen, why the horse hit the front fender with its front legs, and its rear end flew around and hit the door of the car, and at that time Mr. Hontou left the horse and went clear over the top of the car. * * *

"Q. And when you first saw the horse and rider at the side of the road, was the horse acting up in any way? A. I couldn't tell you that; I didn't pay any attention to the horse. I seen the horse. I don't generally pay much attention to them until I get up closer to them.

"Q. Was there anything unusual about the horse that attracted your attention? A. Not that I noticed.

"Q. When you say when he acted as though he was trying to head the car, did he rear up or go around? A. He came out of there just like he was either scared or else like a horse does when you spur them and try to head a steer or something, he went out of there as hard as he could go, catty-cornered.

"Q. Where he started this wheeling motion, was that from out on the dirt? A. Out on the edge of the road, I don't know where it was, on the dirt, or where it was, but by the side of the road was where the horse was when I first seen it.

"Q. That motion from there over to the car, was that a rapid motion? A. Yes, very rapid."

[2] It is the contention of appellants that respondent was guilty of negligence as a matter of law; hence the finding that he was free from negligence was not supported by the evidence. They point out that he testified that he did not see the horse and rider until he was within twenty feet of them. They urge that as he did not see the horse before he was within twenty feet of it, he was guilty of negligence, under the rule that—"All drivers of vehicles on a public highway are required by law to keep a vigilant lookout ahead so as to avoid, if reasonably possible, a collision with any other vehicle or person lawfully upon such highway. Failure to keep such lookout, or failure to see that which may be readily seen, if the driver is looking, would constitute negligence as a matter of law." Berlin v. Violett, 129 Cal. App. 337–340, 18 P.2d 737, 738.

The foregoing statement of the law is approved in Holibaugh v. Ito, 21 Cal.App. 2d 480, 69 P.2d 871. They also rely upon section 532 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 184, which reads as follows: "The driver of any vehicle approaching any horse drawn vehicle, any ridden animal or any live stock shall exercise proper control of his vehicle and shall reduce speed or stop as may appear necessary or as may be requested by any person driving or riding any animal or by any person in charge of any such live stock in order to avoid frightening and to safeguard any such animal or live stock and to insure the safety of any person driving or riding such animal or in charge of such live stock."

[3-5] In respect to the first contention, respondent states that appellants start with an incorrect premise, in that they assume that the horse was upon the highway at all times. The criticism is well taken. We must take the evidence most favorable to the prevailing party, and, as we have seen, there is testimony to the effect that deceased was riding 10 feet off the highway, in the dirt. While it was unquestionably the duty of respondent to keep a vigilant lookout ahead on the highway on which he was traveling, we know of no rule or law which requires a driver to continually scan the entire right-of-way, at the expense of keeping a proper lookout on the portion of the road on which he was traveling. To require the driver to take his eyes off the highway and cover the range of the entire right-of-way would be to invite disaster. None of the cases cited by appellants involves the failure to see objects which were not upon the highway. Furthermore, in such cases, the question of whether one who looks, sees all that he should have seen, is one of fact for the court or jury. Prato v. Snyder, 12 Cal.App.2d 88, 55 P. 2d 255. Here, the court found, impliedly, that respondent saw all he should have seen, the horse not being on the highway, but 10 feet to the side thereof, and the question as to whether or not he was negligent, was one solely for the trial court.

[6-8] As to the second contention of appellants, relating to section 532 of the Vehicle Code, it was a question for the trial court as to whether it was "necessary" for respondent to reduce his speed or stop. He was traveling at a lawful rate of speed, and the horse was some distance off the highway. We do not believe that it can be said, as a matter of law, that said section was violated, and even if it had been, it does not follow that defendant would be liable. It must be further proved that the violation of the statute contributed directly to the injury. 19 Cal.Jur. p. 636, sec. 67. That, also, was a fact for the trial court, whose finding adverse to plaintiffs must be sustained.

Appellants refer to the cases of Furtado v. Bird, 26 Cal.App. 152, 146 P. 58, and Eddy v. Stowe, 43 Cal.App. 789, 185 P. 1024, as being the only two cases they could find which involved collisions between automobiles and persons on horseback. Neither of these cases is of any assistance in the instant case. In the Furtado case, the evidence showed that the defendant was driving at an excessive rate of speed, and ran down the plaintiff when he was riding a horse completely off the main traveled portion of the highway, and on the side of the road. In the instant case, just the reverse is true: the horse and rider ran from a position of safety on the side of the road, onto the highway into defendant's car.

The discussion of the facts in the case of Eddy v. Stowe, contained in appellants' brief, clearly shows the inapplicability of this case, as it appeared that the drivers of the offending vehicles knew that the plaintiff's horse was frightened, in time to have slowed down, stopped, or otherwise avoid a collision. In the instant case the facts show conclusively that from the time decedent's horse went out of control, it bolted and ran across the highway and into the side of defendant's car with such rapidity as to make any attempt on defendant's part to avoid the animal an impossibility.

[9-12] The third contention made by appellants is that the trial court did not have the power, on motion for new trial, to set aside the findings and adopt new findings in lieu thereof. The general power to thus proceed is given under section 662, Code of Civil Procedure. Appellants state that they merely moved for a new trial, and did not ask the court to set aside the findings and adopt other findings. The point is without merit. The statute gives the power when a motion for new trial is made by either party. The right to adopt other findings thereupon arises, and is not dependent upon any other or further application to the court. Appellants contend, however, that the second findings were more favorable to defendant than the first. Assuming that this is true, there is nothing in the section which restricts the action of the trial court or which limits the scope of the second findings. The statute is a remedial one, and should be liberally construed. In 8 Cal.Jur.Supp. page 544, sec. 103a, it is said: "The statute constitutes a grant of power to the trial court to correct judicial errors, to readjudicate the case on the facts, and to make a new decision and judgment. In proper circumstances, the trial court may change or add to its findings of fact, modify the judgment, grant a new trial as to part of the issues, or reopen the case for further proceedings."

[13] In Spier v. Lang, 4 Cal.2d 711–714, 53 P.2d 138, 140, it is stated: "The obvious purpose of the statute, discerned from the language employed, was to give to the court, on denying the motion for a new trial, the broad power to change its findings and to modify its judgment and thus avoid the necessity of a new trial. This was to subserve the ends of justice and to prevent unnecessary delays in cases where the court deemed itself mistaken as to its previous view of the evidence or in the application thereto of the law. Where the question of the extent of the power of the court under the section has previously been considered, the reviewing courts have felt no hesitancy in holding that the trial court had such a broad power under the provisions of the section."

The case of Del Barrio v. Sherman, 16 Cal.App.2d 407, 60 P.2d 559, relied upon by appellants, holds that where the defendant alone moves for a new trial in respect to a money judgment, the trial court has no power under said section to increase, by modification, the amount of such judgment. No authorities are there cited which thus restrict and limit the power of the court. The statute makes no limitation of the power. The case can, however, be distinguished upon the ground that the second judgment imposes a more onerous burden upon plaintiff than the first. Here, the judgments are identical—"that plaintiff take nothing".

The judgment is affirmed.

WOLD v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 12702.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 20, 1941.

1. Workmen's compensation ⇐1724

The determination of whether compensation claimant's injury is "permanent" is question of fact to be ascertained from the evidence.

2. Workmen's compensation ⇐1939

The percentage of disability of compensation claimant is matter for determination of the Industrial Accident Commission in the exercise of its sound discretion based upon fair view of all circumstances.

3. Workmen's compensation ⇐1644

Evidence sustained award granting compensation for 78 per cent. permanent disability, to nurse who became afflicted with poliomyelitis in the course of her employment, as against contention of nurse that she was entitled to compensation based on 100 per cent. permanent disability.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇐1939

Where there is substantial evidence to support finding and order of Industrial Accident Commission, the district court of appeal may not substitute its views for those of the commission and annul the award.

5. Workmen's compensation ⇐1939

Where findings of Industrial Accident Commission are based upon reports of medical experts which are in substantial conflict, the district court of appeal may not disturb the findings and conclusions of the commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Amanda Eleanor Wold, claimant, opposed by the County of Los Angeles, employer. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation for 78 per cent. permanent disability and the claimant petitions for review, contending that she is entitled to 100 per cent. permanent disability.

Affirmed.

Spencer C. Olin, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice.

While petitioner was employed on June 9, 1934, as a nurse in a hospital operated by the county of Los Angeles she became afflicted with poliomyelitis, an injury arising out of and in the course of her employment. She was then 27 years of age.

Petitioner filed with the Industrial Accident Commission an application for adjustment of her claim against the county for compensation and on January 30, 1936, a hearing was had before the Commission. On June 9, 1939, the Commission filed its findings and award finding that petitioner had a 62 per cent permanent disability and awarding her compensation in the sum of $3,417.77, payable $13.78 per week; also reimbursement of $124.50 for dental care, and medical care for life. Petitioner was granted a rehearing on December 19, 1939, and on April 15, 1940, the Commission filed its decision finding that petitioner had a 78 per cent permanent disability entitling her to $13.78 per week for 240 weeks and thereafter a life pension of $3.82 per week plus other advantages of the value of $10 a month, together with reimbursement of $124.50 for dental care, and medical care for life. Petitioner now seeks to annul the award, claiming that the findings are not supported by the evidence. She contends that the Commission's finding that she is entitled to 78 per cent permanent disability is arbitrary and is not supported by the evidence and that the evidence adduced before the Commission sufficiently establishes that she is entitled to 100 per cent permanent disability.

[1-3] The determination of the question as to whether petitioner's injury is permanent is a question of fact to be ascertained from the evidence. The percentage of such disability is a matter to be determined by the Commission in the exercise of its sound discretion, based upon a fair view of all the circumstances. Although the reports of some of the physicians bear out petitioner's contention that she is totally and permanently disabled the record discloses ample evidence to support the findings of the Commission.

After a rehearing had been granted the Commission appointed on February 16, 1939, two medical examiners to examine petitioner, Dr. Francis M. McKeever, an orthopedist, and Dr. John B. Doyle, a neurologist. Dr. McKeever reported, in part: "From an orthopedic viewpoint she is able to carry on some form of light work." Dr. Doyle stated in part: "There will be no permanent disability." On June 23, 1939, Dr. Doyle in a further report stated in part: "She is now capable of looking after herself." Dr. Eugene Ziskind on November 8, 1939, reported in part: "In view of the absence of organic findings, we can give no prognosis as to disability."

Dr. Paul E. McMaster and Dr. William T. Grant were appointed as medical examiners by the Commission on February 7, 1940. In a report dated February 14, 1940, Dr. McMaster stated in part: "It is my opinion that this patient will show some improvement over a prolonged period of time so that she would be able to engage in some light work. I do not believe that this patient will have total permanent disability but will very likely, from an orthopedic standpoint, have some partial permanent disability in the form of muscular weakness." Dr. Grant in answer to a specific question reported as follows: "I do not feel that there is any permanent disability."

Although there is a substantial conflict in the opinions of the physicians as to the extent of the disability suffered by petitioner, there is little if any conflict in the fact petitioner is in need of permanent medical care, but this she has been given by the award of the Commission.

[4, 5] If there is substantial evidence to support the finding and order of the Commission this court may not substitute its views for those of the Commission and annul the award. Hartford A. & I. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 202 Cal. 688, 262 P. 309, 58 A.L.R. 1392. Where as here the findings of the Commission are based upon the reports of medical experts which are in substantial conflict the court may not disturb the findings and conclusions of the Commission. Brandon v. Industrial Accident Commission, 211 Cal. 341, 294 P. 1064.

The award is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Takako Inai and another against Charles Ede and Takeo Takeuchi for injuries sustained by plaintiffs when struck by defendant Takeuchi's automobile which had been struck by defendant Ede's automobile. The complaint against defendant Takeuchi was based on his alleged negligence in parking his automobile partially on the highway. From a judgment in favor of defendant Takeuchi after sustaining of a demurrer to an amended complaint without leave to amend, the plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed with directions.

Ralph H. Lewis and Schwab & Schwab, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

Chas. V. Barfield, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PULLEN, Presiding Justice.

This appeal is from a judgment in favor of defendant Takeo Takeuchi, after the sustaining of a demurrer to an amended complaint without leave to amend.

It is alleged therein that a state highway runs between Colfax and Emigrant Gap, and at the point of the accident here involved the paved portion of such highway was twenty feet wide; that its course was north and south with a five per cent grade dipping toward the south. At the time and place in question, and for a considerable distance north and south thereof, the highway was covered with snow, ice and slush, and was wet and slippery. That Takeo Takeuchi so parked his automobile on the easterly side of the highway that the rear of his car extended more than three and one-half feet from the easterly edge of the pavement into the line of traffic upon the easterly half thereof, although at that time it was practical to have parked the car completely off the paved portion of the highway. There were many people in this area (it being a popular spot for snow sports) and by reason of the angle at which the Takeuchi car was parked, pedestrians along the easterly edge of the highway were, in order to pass the Takeuchi car, compelled to walk out onto the paved portion of the highway more than three and one-half feet from the easterly edge. Plaintiffs were pedestrians going southerly along the easterly edge of the highway, and just as they were passing around the Takeuchi car, a car traveling southerly and being operated by Charles Ede, slipped or skidded across the highway, because of the snow and ice upon the highway, and struck the Takeuchi car, which in turn struck plaintiffs, causing the injuries here complained of. It is also alleged that the slushy, icy, wet and slippery condition was known to Takeuchi, and that because thereof, and because of the grade in the highway, and because of the narrowness of the pavement he was bound to have anticipated the danger. Do these allegations state a cause of action against Takeuchi? In other words did the admitted negligence of Takeuchi in parking his car as he did, proximately contribute to the injuries of plaintiffs?

Two questions are presented: Was the alleged negligent parking of respondent's car a proximate cause of the injury, and did the parking of respondent's car under the circumstances here existing constitute actionable negligence?

[1, 2] Disposing first of the latter contention as to whether Takeo Takeuchi was guilty of actionable negligence: Respondent Takeo Takeuchi was guilty of a violation of section 582 of the Vehicle Code, St. 1935, p. 190, which provides that no person shall leave standing any vehicle upon a paved or improved or main traveled portion of the highway when it is practical to park such vehicle off such portion of such highway.

It is alleged in the complaint that at the time and place in question it was practical to park respondent's automobile completely off the paved portion of the highway, and that there were then and there numerous automobiles so parked. Respondent claims this statute was enacted for the benefit and protection of other motorists in order that there might be unobstructed passage for motor traffic traveling over that half of the highway which such forbidden parking might impede or obstruct. However, plaintiffs also were lawfully upon the highway and entitled to use the same, and to the full protection of all the laws affecting traffic thereon. In McKay v. Hedger, 139 Cal. App. 266, 34 P.2d 221, 225, it is so held, the court saying: "The enactment in question [section 138 of the California Vehicle Act, now section 586 of the Vehicle Code] was undoubtedly passed for the benefit of all persons lawfully using the public streets." It is the safety of the general public, regardless of their means of using the highways, that the legislature was protecting when it enacted the statute in question.

Here it is alleged plaintiffs were walking southerly along the easterly edge of the highway, thereby complying with section 564 of the Vehicle Code, in that they were walking close to their left-hand edge of the highway, and by reason of the projecting car of respondent, were compelled to go out onto the highway far enough to pass around the obstruction. Plaintiffs were therefore of a class for whose benefit the statute was enacted, and Takeo Takeuchi in parking his car in such a manner as to force plaintiffs onto the highway was guilty of actionable negligence.

[3, 4] The next question, and one fraught with some difficulty, is whether the negligent parking of the car by respondent was the proximate cause of the injury. The courts have often attempted to state what is meant by proximate cause (termed "legal cause" in the Restatement of the Law) and the definition most frequently given is that proximate cause is that cause which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces the injury, and without which the injury would not have occurred. Again it is said a "person guilty of negligence should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced man, fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed, whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not, would at the time of the negligent act have thought reasonably possible to follow, if they had occurred to his mind". Williams v. San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co., 6 Cal.App. 715, 93 P. 122, 123. Also the negligence of defendant need not be the sole cause of the injury; it is enough that it be a cause, for if the separate and distinct negligent acts of two persons are in substantially simultaneous operation and contribute to cause the injury, "each is and both are the proximate cause".

The negligence of Takeo Takeuchi did not cease the instant he left his car projecting into the highway. By permitting his car to remain standing as it was, he was guilty of a continuing negligence, and that negligence was active up to the very instant of this accident.

In Pastene v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87, defendant had negligently piled lumber near the street. While plaintiff was walking close to the pile, another person drove his truck in such a manner as to strike a projecting timber, causing the timber to fall upon plaintiff. The court held the negligent piling of the lumber was a continuing negligence, and concurring with the negligence of the driver of the truck, was a direct and proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff. Here the negligent parking of the car of Takeo Takeuchi was likewise a continuing violation of the Vehicle Code and was a concurring negligence with the negligence of Ede, the driver of the oncoming car.

In Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 74 Cal.App. 303, 240 P. 53, a pipe line of defendant carrying gas was parallel to and 5 feet distant from a bridge. An automobile which plaintiff was driving on the bridge skidded, going through the guard rail, and in falling, struck and broke the pipe line, and the escaping gas becoming ignited by the fire from the exhaust of the automobile, injured plaintiff. The defendant company claimed it was not bound to anticipate the chain of events which led up to the accident. It was held, however, that the negligent act of installing unprotected gas mains near the bridge was an act of negligence which the company, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have anticipated, although it might not have foreseen the particular injury which did happen.

The court there also held that one who is himself free of negligence may rely upon the presumption that others will exercise due care, and such a one is not negligent if he fails to anticipate danger which can come only from a violation of law upon the part of another, but one guilty of negligence may not excuse himself by reliance upon such a presumption.

In Marton v. Jones, 44 Cal.App. 299, 186 P. 410, defendant maintained a barbed wire fence near a sidewalk in violation of an ordinance. Plaintiff, walking along the sidewalk, slipped on some gravel and fell against the fence. Defendant admitted the negligent maintenance of the fence but claimed the gravel was an independent intervening cause. In holding defendant liable, the court, however, said that the act of a third person contributing a condition necessary to the injurious effect of the original negligence will not excuse the first wrongdoer if such act ought to have been foreseen.

Respondent cites us to the case of Mounts v. Tzugares, 9 Cal.App.2d 327, 49 P.2d 883. There a truck owned by defendant Tzugares, traveling in a westerly direction, stopped on the north side of the highway. While so parked on the highway a car traveling west swung out around the parked truck and struck a car approaching from the east which had also swung out to pass a slower moving east-bound car. The highway was forty-three feet wide at the point of collision; it was daylight and the highway was dry. It was held the position of the parked truck did not contribute to the accident. In the instant case the highway was not so wide by twenty feet,—there was a five per cent grade at the point where the Takeuchi car was parked and the highway was covered with snow and slush and very slippery. These facts, we believe, are sufficient to deferentiate the instant from the cited cases.

Respondent also cites Klarquist v. Chamberlain & Proctor, 124 Cal.App. 398, 12 P.2d 664, 665. There a contractor was lawfully building a sidewalk, and because of barriers around the work plaintiff was compelled to walk into the street, where he was struck by a negligently operated car. There the contractor was constructing a necessary public work, under the authority of a municipality—and the contractor was therefore not bound to have anticipated the reckless act of a third person. There plaintiffs attempted to invoke the rule applicable to concurrent and negligent causes of injury, under which, liability of the defendant contractor would arise from the fact it should have anticipated the negligence of the driver in leaving his regular course, but the court said "* * * their argument fails to convince us that liability of one legally constructing a necessary public way, under the authority of a municipality, who cannot be said to have anticipated the reckless act of a third party, should be predicated upon or measured by the same rules". If, however, after completing its work of laying the sidewalk, the contracting company had then negligently placed a pile of gravel in the street alongside the sidewalk and had negligently permitted it to remain there unguarded, and a truck had, by reason thereof, been thrown from its course and struck a pedestrian, undoubtedly the company would have been liable, or at least put upon its defense.

That an obstruction lawfully placed upon a highway is subject to an entirely different rule than an unlawful obstruction, as we have here, is clearly stated in Stockton Automobile Co. v. Confer, 154 Cal. 402, 97 P. 881, 883:

"An individual who erects an unlawful obstruction to the free use of a highway, in its nature a nuisance, by reason of his wrongful act, is charged in law as an insurer against accident to a person properly traveling the highway and meeting injury by reason of such unlawful obstruction. [Citing cases.] But where the highway is obstructed under license and by authority, the person responsible for such obstruction is chargeable only with ordinary care to see that such obstruction does not become a cause of injury to any person lawfully traveling the highway." See, also, Lacy v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 220 Cal. 97, 29 P.2d 781.

[5, 6] Can a court say as a matter of law that the negligence of Takeo Takeuchi in parking his car in such a manner as to permit a portion thereof to project about three and one-half feet onto the highway, in violation of a statute, under the conditions then existing, did not in any sense contribute proximately to plaintiffs' injuries? The question of causation is one of fact depending upon the circumstances of each particular case and is ordinarily for the jury to determine. (19 Cal.Jur. p. 562.) In Fishman v. Silva, 116 Cal.App. 1, 2 P.2d 473, 475, it is said:

"It is the unquestioned law of this state that, where one is injured by the concurring negligence of two persons, each is and both are the proximate cause of the injuries, and the injured party may recover from either or both at his election. * * *

" 'Whether or not the negligence of either driver was a proximate cause of the collision and resultant injuries and whether or not the negligence of each concurred with that of the other is a question of fact to be decided by the jury' or by the court where no jury is present, and where there is evidence to support the determination so made it cannot be disturbed, even though the facts would warrant a different conclusion."

"Whether cause in fact exists is often difficult to determine," says Mr. Charles E. Carpenter in an article in Rules for Determining Proximate Cause in volume XX of California Law Review, at page 399, "but where reasonable men can differ as to its existence or non-existence, it is a question for the jury to determine under appropriate instruction." In this treatise by Mr. Carpenter, beginning in the Law Review of March, 1932, will be found a very informative discussion of the rules for determining Proximate Cause.

The judgment is reversed and the trial court directed to overrule the demurrer and respondents given a reasonable time to answer.

PEOPLE v. GEORGE.

Cr. 3410.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

1. Arson ⇐4

To constitute the crime denounced by statute providing that a person who willfully and maliciously sets fire to any dwelling house, either the property of himself or of another, shall be guilty of arson, there must be both a willful and a malicious act, and unless one burns his own property with "malice", that is, with the wish to injure another person or do a wrongful act, he cannot be convicted. Pen.Code, § 7, subd. 4; § 447a.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Malice".

2. Arson ⇐40

Whether accused's act in burning his own dwelling was willful and malicious within arson statute was a question of fact to be determined by jury from all the evidence. Pen.Code, § 447a

3. Arson ⇐2

The statute, providing that any person who willfully and maliciously burns his own or another's dwelling is guilty of arson, is a proper exercise of the "police power". Pen. Code, § 447a.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Police Power".

4. Nuisance ⇐1, 59

Every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under implied liability that his use of it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to rights of community.

Constitutional law ⇐250, 257

The statute denouncing as a felony the willful and malicious burning or setting fire to any dwelling, including one's own, is not an arbitrary interference with the owner's property rights in violation of "due process of law" and "equal protection" clauses of Federal Constitution. Pen.Code, § 447a; U. S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Due Process of Law" and "Equal Protection of the Laws".

6. Criminal law ⇐13

The statute denouncing as a felony the willful and malicious burning or setting fire to any dwelling, including one's own, is not too indefinite to constitute a reasonable standard of conduct. Pen.Code, § 447a.

7. Statutes ⇐228

The general terms of a statute are subject to implied exceptions, founded on rules of public policy and maxims of natural justice, so as to avoid absurd and unjust consequences.

8. Constitutional law ⇐70(3)

It is strictly within the province of the legislature to determine whether the public is to be served by defining certain acts as crimes.

9. Arson ⇐2
Constitutional law ⇐250, 257

The statute denouncing as a felony the willful and malicious burning or setting fire to any dwelling, including one's own, is not invalid as arbitrary and capricious and as not based on a distinction affecting the public health or safety, and it is, therefore, valid under the "equal protection" and "due process" clauses of Federal Constitution. Pen. Code § 447a; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

10. Constitutional law ⇐210

A law need not affect every person exactly alike in order to avoid the prohibition against inequality by the equal protection clause of the Federal Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 14.

11. Constitutional law ⇐211

Under the "equal protection" clause of the Federal Constitution, the Legislature may make a reasonable classification based on substantial difference and which has a reasonable relation to the objects or persons dealt with and to the public purpose sought to be achieved by the legislation. U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 14.

12. Constitutional law ⇐211

The "equal protection" clause of the Federal Constitution does not forbid discrimination with respect to things that are different. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

13. Constitutional law ⇐70(1)

Enactment of laws for the protection of society is for the legislature and not for the courts, unless a constitutional right is clearly violated by the statute.

14. Constitutional law ⇐48, 70(3)

The courts must view a statute, such as the one denouncing as a felony the willful and malicious burning or setting fire to any dwelling, including one's own, as intended to promote the general welfare and protect the public interest, and court cannot go behind findings of Legislature and determine that there did not exist conditions which would justify the enactment. Pen.Code, § 447a.

15. Constitutional law ⇐211

It is only when, beyond reasonable doubt, all rational men would agree that factual background does not warrant the enactment of a statute ostensibly designed to preserve the general welfare, that court can say that a statute is arbitrary and capricious so as to violate equal protection clause of Federal Constitution. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles W. Fricke, Judge.

Samuel George was convicted of arson and of burning insured property, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied; CURTIS, HOUSER, and CARTER, JJ., dissenting.

Gladys Towles Root, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Lewis Drucker, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

Appellant and his codefendant Farrell were accused by information of the crime of arson (count 1) and of burning insured property (count 2). Count 1 is based upon section 447a of the Penal Code while count 2 is based upon section 548 of the Penal Code. Both defendants were convicted. Motion for a new trial was granted as to Farrell but from the order denying his motion and from the judgment, appellant has appealed.

The sole ground of appeal is that the conviction for the burning of his own dwelling is a violation of his right to dispose of his property and deprives him of equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The defendants were owners of a residence known as 3006 5th avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. Prior to July 5, 1940, the dwelling was occupied by tenants who on that day, pursuant to the request of appellant, vacated the premises. On the evening of July 10, 1940, about 11 o'clock p. m., one Nelson, occupant of the house on the adjoining lot observed a man and woman going into the rear of the premises of appellant's property from the alleyway; saw them deposit by the garage two packages of the size of five gallon tins wrapped in newspaper and then return to the alley. His description of the man who had deposited the packages tallied with that of appellant. After Nelson had retired, some eight minutes later, on peering through the window of his bedroom, he saw the same two persons return and quietly make two or three trips on tiptoe to the back door of the same dwelling. Ten minutes later, an explosion occurred and the dwelling was instantly in a mass of flames. Nelson had seen the appellant on four occasions before the day of the fire and pointed out appellant in the courtroom as resembling the man who had made the nocturnal entries into the rear of his tenantless house. Appellant was identified in the courtroom by two witnesses as the man who ran from the scene of the fire under a very strong street light. The explosion caused an immense fire in the two bedrooms, living room and dining room. Within a short time after the fire was extinguished, an investigator of the arson bureau of the Los Angeles Fire Department found that various seams and joints of the floor in the dwelling were charred in various locations and the baseboards throughout the entire dwelling were blistered. At other points the timbers were completely burned or charred. The investigator detected an odor like that of kerosene through the entire building. Plaintiff had taken out insurance on this property in the sum of $3,000, which was in effect on the day of the fire. The property had been purchased in August, 1937, by appellant and his codefendant at a price of $3,000 with a down payment of $200. On the day of the fire they still owned it and there was due on the purchase price the sum of $2,000.

Inasmuch as the appeal is aimed to establish the unconstitutionality of section 447a of the Penal Code, we shall confine our discussion to that proposition since the validity of section 548, which denounces as a felony the burning of any property to defraud the insurer—the crime charged in count 2, is conceded.

Section 447a of the Penal Code reads as follows: "Any person who willfully and maliciously sets fire to or burns or causes to be burned or who aids, counsels or procures the burning of any dwelling-house, or any kitchen, shop, barn, stable or other outhouse that is parcel thereof, or belonging to or adjoining thereto, whether the property of himself or of another, shall be guilty of arson, and upon conviction thereof, be sentenced to the penitentiary for not less than two nor more than twenty years." Appellant contends that the quoted section was enacted solely for the protection of dwelling houses from destruction by fire; that it is unreasonable and arbitrary in that it makes it unlawful for a man to burn his own unoccupied dwelling, inanimate property, and that the section indicates no intention of the legislature to protect human beings or to safeguard public property.

In 1929 section 447 of the Penal Code was repealed. That section denounced as arson the burning of the property of another, a crime at common law. It was then no offense to burn one's own dwelling. Under that section, it was necessary in charging arson to aver ownership of the building in another or that another rightfully occupied the building. Contemporaneously with the repeal of section 447, the legislature enacted as a part of the title on "Crimes Against Property" and as a part of the chapter on "Arson", sections 447a, 448a and 449a, which forbade respectively the wilful and malicious burning of any dwelling house; the burning of a stable, barn or garage, etc.; burning of a crib, stack of hay, etc., belonging to another and of a value in excess of $25.

[1-7] In making his claims appellant has ignored the presence of three words in the statute, to-wit, "willfully and maliciously". Unless one burns his own property with malice, that is with a wish to injure another person or to do a wrongful act (Pen. Code, sec. 7, subd. 4) he could not be fairly accused of violating the section. Likewise though he may have every wish to do a wrongful act, an accidental burning of his own property would not be a violation. To constitute the crime denounced by the section, it must be both a wilful and a malicious act. Consequently, if he sets fire to property which he, himself, has created or constructed, with the intention to injure another, he has done the act denounced by the section as a crime against property and as an act of arson. If defendant's house stood in such close proximity to that of his neighbor as would permit a flame from his own house to extend to and ignite the latter, or if his house contained chattels belonging to his neighbor, or if his neighbor had insured defendant's property against destruction by fire, then there could be no doubt that setting fire to his own house would necessarily have been with an intent to injure another. Whether the act of burning his own house was wilful and malicious was a question of fact determined by the jury from all the evidence in the case. It is the wilfulness and malice of the act inhibited by the section which is a limitation upon his right to dispose of his own dwelling and which makes the statute a proper exercise of police power. "Every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community." Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 8th ed., vol. 2, p. 1224. Where a statute denounces as a felony the "willful and malicious" burning, or setting fire to any dwelling it is not an arbitrary interference with the owner's property right. Neither is the statute too indefinite to constitute a reasonable standard of conduct. Love v. State, 107 Fla. 376, 144 So. 843. "Society would be without protection in circumstances such as these were it not possible to provide for prevention of willful and malicious burning of dwellings. * * * There does not seem to be a suggestion of any doubt as to the constitutionality of the law." Voss v. State, 204 Wis. 432, 236 N.W. 128, 130. Where the statute is found in the chapter defining "offenses against property" it does not offend the Constitution. People v. Chimovitz, 237 Mich. 247, 211 N.W. 650, 651. "The general terms of a statute are subject to implied exceptions founded on the rules of public policy, and the maxims of natural justice, so as to avoid absurb and unjust consequences." Lewis' Sutherland Statutory Construction, 2d ed., 741.

[8] Appellant contends that his right to the equal protection of laws, as guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment, is violated by the judgment and the statute under which the indictment was drawn. He argues that there is no logical difference between a dwelling house and a pile of lumber or trash or other combustible material distinguishable in the matter of public interest. But it is strictly within the province of the legislature to determine whether the public interest is to be served by defining certain acts as crimes. In view of the frequently reported burning by owners of their dwellings and outhouses, it cannot be said that the legislature was unreasonable or arbitrary in forbidding the owner of a dwelling to destroy his property with intent to injure another. Moreover, because of the close proximity of most dwellings to buildings that house human beings or that house property of substantial value, the legislature acted well within the scope of its power in denouncing such an act as a crime. Unless we can say, therefore, that the legislature exceeded its constitutional limitations in declaring that the malicious destruction by a party of his own dwelling is a felony, the statute is valid.

[9-15] Appellant contends that the classification of the dwelling by section 447a is arbitrary and capricious and that such classification is not based upon a distinction which affects public health or safety. But loss need not affect every man, woman and child exactly alike in order to avoid the constitutional prohibition against equality. Under the equal protection guaranty of the fourteenth amendment, the legislature may make a reasonable classification which is based upon substantial differences and which has a "reasonable relation to the objects or persons dealt with and to the public purpose sought to be achieved by the legislation involved. The equal protection clause does not forbid discrimination with respect to things that are different." 12 American Jurisprudence, sec. 469, p. 131; Kookee Coke Co. v. Taylor, 234 U.S. 224, 34 S.Ct. 856, 58 L.Ed. 1288. The enactment of laws for the protection of society is for the legislature and not for the courts unless a constitutional right is clearly violated by the statute. The courts must view such a statute as section 447a as intended to promote the general welfare and to protect the public interest. It is beyond our province to go behind the findings of the legislature and determine that there did not exist conditions which would justify the enactment. It is only when, beyond reasonable doubt, all rational men would agree that the factual background did not warrant the enactment of a statute which was ostensibly designed to preserve the general welfare that we can say that a statute is arbitrary and capricious. If it be not thus rendered void, it is the fruitage of the proper exercise of police power. In the Matter of the Application of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 696, 124 P. 427. Therefore, it cannot be said upon a review of the statute and the authorities that the code section under consideration denies appellant equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

Ex parte CLARK.

Cr. 1748.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

1. Larceny ⇐32(2)

A complaint charging that defendant willfully and unlawfully took and attempted to carry away from immediate possession of lawful owner merchandise of value of $16 was defective in failing to state to whom the property taken belonged. Pen.Code, §§ 484, 1426.

2. Larceny ⇐32(2)

Although defendant in prosecution for theft was entitled to have name of owner of property taken set forth in complaint, failure to set forth that fact in complaint, which alleged crime of theft in charging defendant with unlawfully taking property of another, did not thereby deprive police court of jurisdiction. Pen.Code, §§ 484, 1426.

3. Habeas corpus ⇐30(2)

Although a writ of habeas corpus will lie when complaint under which conviction was had wholly fails to state a public offense, the writ cannot be made to serve office of a demurrer.

4. Habeas corpus ⇐30(2)

A complaint charging that defendant willfully and unlawfully took and attempted to carry away merchandise from immediate possession of lawful owner thereof, but failing to state name of owner of property, was not so defective as to entitle defendant to release on habeas corpus after conviction. Pen.Code, §§ 484, 1426.

5. Habeas corpus ⇐30(2)

A defendant convicted under complaint charging the unlawful taking and attempting to carry away merchandise from immediate possession of lawful owner was not entitled to release on habeas corpus on ground that complaint was so fatally defective that it would not constitute a bar to a subsequent prosecution for same offense. Pen.Code, §§ 484, 1426.

Proceeding by Mildred Clark to obtain a writ of habeas corpus.

Writ dismissed, and the petitioner remanded.

A. B. Reynolds, of Vallejo, for petitioner.

Philip Lynch, Dist. Atty., and Kenneth I. Jones, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Fairfield, for respondent.

PULLEN, Presiding Justice.

Petitioner was convicted in the Police Court of the City of Vallejo on a complaint charging that she did "on or about the 8th day of October, A. D. 1940, at and in the City of Vallejo * * * then and there wilfully and unlawfully steal, take and attempt to carry away from the immediate possession of the lawful owner thereof, merchandise of the value of sixteen dollars". To this complaint defendant entered a plea of not guilty and at the opening of the trial interposed an objection to the introduction of evidence, and after conviction, moved in arrest of judgment. The objections and motion were denied, and she was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail.

Having been delivered into custody of the sheriff under such judgment she now seeks to be discharged by this court on habeas corpus, contending that the complaint in the justice court did not state facts constituting a public offense.

The argument of counsel revolves around the two following sections of the Penal Code,—the one defining theft, and the other, the necessary averments of such offense. "Every person who shall feloniously steal, take, carry, lead, or drive away the personal property of another * * * is guilty of theft." Section 484 of the Penal Code. Section 1426 of the Penal Code provides in part, "all proceedings * * * before a * * * police court * * * for a public offense * * * must be commenced by complaint * * * setting forth the offense charged, with such particulars of time, place, person, and property as to enable the defendant to understand distinctly the character of the offense complained of. * * * In charging theft, it shall be sufficient to allege that the defendant unlawfully took the labor or property of another."

[1] While the complaint before us was defective in that it did not set forth all of the facts essential to a proper description of the crime,—it not appearing to whom the property taken belonged,—it did allege the element of the crime of theft in that it charged petitioner with unlawfully taking the property of another.

[2-4] Petitioner was entitled to the name of the owner of the property taken, but the failure to set forth that fact did not thereby deprive the police court of jurisdiction. It has frequently been held that while a writ of habeas corpus would lie when the complaint wholly failed to state a public offense, the writ cannot be made to serve the office of a demurrer. Petitioner, however, protected her right to appeal from the judgment of conviction by appropriate objections to the introduction of evidence and by a motion in arrest of judgment.

In Re Ah Sing, 87 Cal. 423, 25 P. 552, petitioner had been convicted of visiting a gambling house, a misdemeanor. His release was sought by habeas corpus, it being urged the justice court was without jurisdiction because the time of the offense was not set out in the complaint. The court held this defect did not affect jurisdiction and the petitioner was remanded.

In Re Hartman, 9 Cal.2d 583, 71 P.2d 921, a complaint in the justice court failed to allege the township or even the county in which the offense was committed. This error or omission was presented to the court upon a writ of habeas corpus, but there also the petitioner was remanded.

To the same effect was the holding in Re Kaster, 52 Cal.App. 454, 198 P. 1029, where the court refused to discharge the petitioner where the complaint failed to set forth the township.

It is seen from the foregoing that the omission to allege time in one instance and place in another is not ground for the issuance of the writ. It would appear from in Re Meisner, 30 Cal.App.2d 290, 86 P.2d 124, 125, that the failure to mention the name of the owner of the property did not go to the question of jurisdiction. In that case petitioner was charged as follows: "Said defendants * * * did * * * steal and take property not belonging to them, to wit, scrap iron which was located on railroad property adjacent to W. L. Plaugher's property on West Elm Street". Petitioner entered a plea of guilty and then sought his release on habeas corpus on two grounds, that the complaint failed to state the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the court and that it failed to state a public offense in that the complaint did not specifically allege the property stolen was the property of another. Upon the first point, while the criminal jurisdiction of a city or justice court is strictly limited, and although the complaint failed to state the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the court, the evidence dehors the record, and the plea of petitioner was a sufficient answer. As to the failure to allege the property taken was personal property of another, the allegation that petitioner stole property not belonging to him was sufficient, the plea of guilty negatived the claim that the property was abandoned.

In the application of Hayward, 62 Cal. App. 177, 216 P. 414, for a writ of habeas corpus, the court points out that such a writ may not be used as a demurrer or for the purpose of correcting errors. "The writ of habeas corpus is not intended to review the regularity of the proceedings in any case, but rather to restore to his liberty the citizen who is imprisoned without color of law." In re Kowalsky, 73 Cal. 120, 14 P. 399.

[5] Another point urged by petitioner is that the complaint is so fatally defective that it would not constitute a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense.

This objection is answered in Re Martin, 51 Cal.App. 706, 197 P. 365, where it is said: "If it is true, as alleged, that petitioner is being again prosecuted for an offense for which he was once in jeopardy, he may upon the trial of his case plead such conviction and establish the identity of the cases by evidence; the burden being on him." People v. Faust, 113 Cal. 172, 45 P. 261. Ex parte Winston, 160 Cal. 18, 116 P. 390. As early as Ex parte Turner, 75 Cal. 226, 16 P. 898, 899, where it was feared by petitioner the date of the offense might become material, the court said: "But, if the petitioner should ever have the misfortune to require evidence in support of such a plea of former conviction, he will be entitled to the whole record, and not simply to the judgment." In re Ring, 28 Cal. 247. Some objection was also therein made to the sufficiency of the judgment. The court further said: "To entitle the petitioner to a discharge we must necessarily assume that the record of conviction fails to show the commission of any offense. To reach this conclusion we should have to resort to a hypercritical, overnice, and technical examination of the commitment, convert the writ of habeas corpus into a writ of error, and defeat the ends of justice."

The writ is dismissed and the petitioner remanded.

5. Criminal law ⇐1167(5)

Any error in overruling a demurrer to a count of an information was immaterial where accused was acquitted of that charge.

6. Automobiles ⇐351

Under Vehicle Code provision prohibiting driving of automobile on left side of roadway, "when view is obstructed on approaching within 100 feet of * * * any intersection", count of information charging that defendant's wilful driving of automobile on left side of highway within 100 feet of an intersection while passing another automobile, was the proximate cause of death of pedestrian struck by defendant's automobile was sufficient, as against demurrer, without alleging that defendant's view of the "bridge, viaduct, or tunnel" which he was approaching was obstructed. Vehicle Code, § 530(b) 2, St.1939, p. 2198.

7. Automobiles ⇐335

A paragraph of Vehicle Code prohibiting driving on left side of roadway "when the view is obstructed upon approaching within 100 feet of any bridge, viaduct, tunnel, or when approaching within 100 feet of or when traversing any intersection or railroad grade crossing", prohibits driving of vehicle on left side of highway within 100 feet of an intersection, regardless of whether it is hidden from view of operator of car; the provision as to obstructed view of "bridge, viaduct, or tunnel" relating to another offense. Vehicle Code, § 530(b)2, St.1939, p. 2198.

8. Automobiles ⇐351

A count of an information charging unlawful and willful violation of Vehicle Code provision prohibiting driving of an automobile on the left side of roadway at a point less than 100 feet from an intersecting highway, constituted an allegation of negligent operation of the automobile. Vehicle Code, § 530(b) 2, St.1939, p. 2198.

9. Automobiles ⇐351

A count of an information charging willful and unlawful violation of Vehicle Code provision prohibiting driving automobile on left side of roadway at a point less than 100 feet from an intersecting highway and that such negligence proximately resulted in killing of pedestrian, charged "negligent homicide" within statute defining that offense. Rutherford, Rutherford & Rutherford, of Napa, for appellant.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The defendant was convicted on two separate counts of an information. The first one charged him, under section 480 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 170, with failing to stop his automobile, after it was involved in an accident, to render assistance to a pedestrian who was struck by his machine and instantly killed. The third count charged him with driving his machine on the left side of a roadway at a point less than one hundred feet from an intersecting highway, contrary to section 530(b)2, of the same Code, St.1939, p. 2198, resulting in the death of the same individual. The defendant was acquitted of the offense of "negligent homicide" as defined in section 500 of that Code, with which he was also charged in the second count of the information. He was sentenced to imprisonment in San Quentin state prison for the respective terms prescribed by law, upon each of the offenses of which he was convicted. It was, however, provided that the two sentences should run concurrently. The defendant demurred to each count of the information on the ground that it failed to state a public offense. He also moved to arrest the judgment. His motion for a new trial was denied. From the judgment which was rendered and from the order denying a motion for new trial this appeal was perfected.

It is conceded the evidence supports the charges of the offenses of which the defendant was convicted, but a reversal of the judgment is sought on the ground that each count fails to state a public offense, and that the court erred in instructing the jury.

The notice of appeal was given from the judgment rendered; from the order denying the motion for new trial and from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment.

[1, 2] The defendant is a married man 27 years of age. At 8 o'clock on the evening of July 21, 1940, he was driving an automobile in a southerly direction at the rate of forty miles or more an hour, along "Silverado Trail" a highway in Napa county, within one hundred feet of its intersection with Spring street. Seated in the rear seat of his machine was a friend by the name of Cullison, who had been previously convicted of a felony, and a girl sixteen years of age. Another young girl fifteen years of age was seated by the side of the defendant in the front seat. They overtook another machine driven by Melvin Collins, which was traveling ahead of their car at the rate of about thirty miles an hour. Collins was accompanied by a friend named Drapinski. Just before the accident occurred both occupants of the Collins car saw a man walking in the same direction along the extreme left side of the highway, nearly opposite their machine. Drapinski testified that the defendant's automobile overtook their car and "shot" by them on to the left side of the highway, traveling at about "twice our speed". He thought that the pedestrian, Giovanni Musanti, was walking along the shoulder of the roadway, just beyond the paved portion of the highway. Collins exclaimed, "My God, they are going to hit this man." As the defendant's machine struck the pedestrian, the occupants of the Collins car distinctly heard a "sickening thud" and they saw his body thrown over the hood of defendant's car to the left-hand side, a distance of ten feet or more from the paved portion of the highway.

The speed of the defendant's machine was slackened slightly, but it continued on its course without stopping. Collins and Drapinski followed for a short distance and they procured the number of the defendant's car. They then returned to the scene of the accident and found the body of the deceased lying in the grass several feet from the pavement. Musanti was apparently dead. They immediately drove to Napa and notified the sheriff's officers of the "hit-and-run" accident.

The defendant testified that he was traveling forty miles an hour when he passed the Collins car, but he claimed that he did not see the pedestrian walking along the left-hand side of the highway. He said that they did feel a dull thud and heard the crashing of glass at the time of the accident and that someone said he wondered what they had hit. But they did not stop their machine until they reached a point at the "Triangle", three blocks beyond the point where the accident occurred. The defendant then turned his car around and drove back to see what his machine had hit, but he claims that they saw no object at that place which they could have struck. He did not stop his machine, but continued to drive about for half an hour. After that they once more returned to the scene of the accident. When they arrived the second time at that point they found two other machines parked there. The defendant then stopped, and he was immediately confronted by Deputy Sheriff Karl Graham, who had been previously notified of the accident by Collins. The body of Musanti lay in the grass sixteen feet from the edge of the concrete pavement. He was dead. The defendant was taken in custody, and he was subsequently charged with the crimes of which he was convicted. The left-hand front lamp of the defendant's machine was broken off and smashed. There was a large dent in his left front fender. He claimed he did not see the body of the deceased as it was hurled over the hood of his machine at the time he admits that he felt the bump.

There is an abundance of evidence to support the judgment of conviction of the offenses charged in both the first and the third counts of the information. There is no doubt the defendant wilfully failed to stop his automobile when the accident occurred, and that he deliberately refrained from attempting to render assistance to Musanti, after he knew that his machine had struck and either injured or killed his victim. The circumstances which were adduced in evidence warranted the jury in finding that the defendant knew his automobile violently struck a pedestrian at the side of the roadway, and that the victim was probably seriously injured. Collins and Drapinski, who were riding in the other car, clearly saw the pedestrian walking along the shoulder of the highway. Drapinski said their car was traveling thirty miles an hour, and that the defendant's machine passed them at nearly twice that rate of speed. If that be true, the defendant passed the Collins car on the left side of the highway at the rate of sixty miles an hour. The defendant was evidently paying little attention to the highway along which he was traveling. He and his male companion were taking two young girls out for a ride. They had been previously drinking beer, although there is no evidence that any of them were intoxicated. It is not unreasonable to assume the defendant's attention was diverted from reasonable scrutiny of the highway. Both Collins and Drapinski saw the accident and clearly observed the body of the deceased hurled over the hood of the defendant's car. They also heard a "sickening thud" when the pedestrian was struck. The left front lamp of the defendant's car was broken off and smashed. His left front fender was badly damaged. The defendant and all the occupants of his car admitted they felt the thud when the machine came in contact with the body of the pedestrian. They knew they had struck some object for they twice returned to the scene of the accident, but failed to immediately stop even to ascertain whether assistance was necessary or could be rendered. It seems impossible that the defendant and his companions could have failed to see the body of the deceased as it was hurled over the hood of their machine. The force of the blow, the sound of the contact with the body, the crashing of the lamp, and the sight of the form as it was thrown over the hood of their machine to the left side of the highway must have warned them of the nature of the accident.

In this case the jury was specifically instructed, at the request of the defendant, that, unless the evidence proved he knew or by the exercise of reasonable care should have known, his machine struck and either injured or killed a pedestrian, they could not find him guilty of failing to stop his car or of neglecting to offer to render assistance. We are convinced the defendant did know, as every occupant of his machine must have known, that his automobile hit and injured a pedestrian. The jury so found.

[4] There is no merit in the contention that the first count of the information fails to state a public offense because it does not allege the defendant had knowledge of the fact that his automobile struck and either injured or killed a pedestrian. That count is couched in substantially the language of section 480 of the Vehicle Code. It sufficiently complies with sections 950, 951 and 952 of the Penal Code. It alleges that the defendant's machine, at a specified time and place, was "involved in an accident causing injuries and death to another person, to-wit: Giovanni Musanti" and that the defendant "did wilfully fail to immediately stop said motor vehicle * * * and (he wilfully neglected) to render aid as provided in section 482(a) of the Vehicle Code". The allegation that the defendant "did wilfully fail to stop his car" is equivalent to a statement that he knew his machine had injured or killed a man and that he deliberately refrained from stopping to render aid. That very criticism of an information couched in almost the identical language of this challenged count was determined adversely to this defendant's contention in the case of People v. Odom, 19 Cal.App.2d 641, 66 P. 2d 206. The demurrer to the first count of the information was properly overruled.

[5] It is immaterial that the demurrer to the second count was overruled, for the defendant was acquitted of that charge.

[6, 7] The demurrer to the third count was also properly overruled. That count charged the defendant in substantially the language of section 530(b)2 of the Vehicle Code with wilfully driving his automobile at a specified time and place, in passing another machine "on the left side on Silverado Trail, a public highway, within one hundred (100) feet of an intersection, to-wit: The intersection of Spring street and Silverado Trail", in violation of the section above mentioned, which "unlawful act was the proximate cause of the death of one Giovanni Musanti". It was not necessary to also allege that at the point where the defendant unlawfully drove his machine onto the left side of the highway, his view of the "bridge, viaduct or tunnel" which he was approaching was obstructed. That suggested omission has reference to an entirely different offense contained in the same paragraph. It may be conceded that section is susceptible of the construction placed upon it by the appellant, but we think the legislature intended thereby to prohibit the driving of a vehicle on to the left side of a highway within one hundred feet of an intersection, regardless of whether it was hidden from the view of the operator of the car, for the reason that such conduct would increase the hazard of a collision with some other machine which might be approaching around the corner on the same side of the highway. The portion of the designated section which is applicable to count three of the information reads as follows: "No vehicle shall at any time be driven to the left side of the roadway * * * 2. * * * when approaching within one hundred feet of or when traversing any intersection or railroad grade crossing."

The preceding offense has reference to the approach of intersecting highways. It has no reference to the approach of a "bridge, viaduct or tunnel". It is not necessary that the view of the intersection shall be obstructed in order to constitute an offense by driving the vehicle on to the left side of the highway.

[8, 9] The charge of wilfully and unlawfully violating that statute constituted an allegation of negligent operation of the automobile. Since it is also alleged that the negligent manner of driving the machine proximately resulted in the killing of Giovanni Musanti, it constituted a charge of "negligent homicide" as that crime is defined in section 500 of the Vehicle Code.

[10] The defendant may not complain that he was convicted of two counts of an information, each of which is based upon the same facts resulting in the death of an individual, since in pronouncing judgment the court determined that the sentences under each count should run concurrently. People v. Anderson, 75 Cal. App. 365, 371, 242 P. 906; People v. Sharp, 58 Cal.App. 637, 209 P. 266.

[11] The defendant's term of imprisonment is not extended by virtue of the fact that both offenses grow out of the same facts. Nor would the term of his sentence be affected even though he was wrongfully convicted of the offense charged in the third count. The conviction of the offense charged in the first count is sufficient upon which to uphold the sentence which was pronounced against the defendant. There was no prejudicial error in overruling the demurrer to the several counts of the information.

The defendant has challenged as erroneous seventeen of the twenty-eight instructions which were given to the jury at the request of the prosecution. He has also challenged three instructions offered by himself which were modified by the court. We have carefully examined each instruction in view of the asserted errors. It would be an unwarranted task to attempt to analyze each separate instruction. It is true that some of the instructions are not prepared with the skill which might have been exercised. The fact that the defendant was being tried on three separate offenses at the same time created a more difficult task in drawing instructions applicable to each count, which, nevertheless, should be free from criticism. After carefully reading the entire charge we are of the opinion the jury was very fully and fairly charged, and that it was not misled by any of the challenged instructions. We are of the opinion that any inaccuracies which the charge may contain do not constitute reversible error.

[12] Even though certain instructions, with respect to the third count, may be considered erroneous provided the appellant's theory that section 530(b)2 makes it unlawful to drive on the left side of a roadway within one hundred feet of an intersection only when that intersection is hidden from the driver's view, still the verdict of conviction of the offense charged in the first count is valid, and the judgment should not be reversed on that account. The record does not disclose a miscarriage of justice in convicting the defendant of the offenses with which he was charged. Even though it be deemed that some of the instructions are erroneous, they do not constitute reversible error in view of article VI, section 4½, of the Constitution.

[13] Conceding that section 480 of the Vehicle Code, read in connection with section 482(a) of the same Code, defines two separate offenses, namely, (1) failing to "immediately stop such vehicle at the scene of such accident", and, (2) neglecting to "render to any person injured in such accident reasonable assistance", it was not error under the circumstances of this case for the court to fail in its instructions to distinguish between those two offenses. The evidence is uncontradicted that the defendant neglected to immediately stop his car at the scene of the accident, in spite of the fact that there is an abundance of evidence to show he had knowledge, or as a reasonable person should have had knowledge, that his machine struck and injured a pedestrian. The victim of that accident was found dead by the roadside within half an hour of the time of the accident. There is no evidence that he was not instantly killed. The defendant concedes that Musanti was instantly killed. The record of this case leaves no room to assert that any or all of the jurors may have concluded the defendant failed to render necessary aid to an injured man. Since he was dead, it may be conceded no assistance could have been given to him. It may therefore not be reasonably said the verdict is void because the jurors may not have all agreed upon the defendant's guilt of the same offense. Under the uncontradicted evidence in this case we are bound to assume the jurors all agreed that he was guilty on the first count of failure to stop his machine after striking a pedestrian so as to enable him to ascertain whether he had killed or merely injured a human being, and whether he could render assistance to the stricken man. There is no substantial merit in the criticism of the instructions.

If the defendant is correct in asserting that it is unlawful under section 530(b)2 of the Vehicle Code only when the operator of an automobile drives on "the left side of the roadway" within one hundred feet of an intersection when the driver's view of the intersection is obstructed, and that the verdict on the third count is therefore void because there is no evidence that the intersection was not visible within one hundred feet, that fact would not alter the judgment of conviction of the first count of the information for failure to stop his car and offer to render assistance to his victim. The sentences on both counts run concurrently. The invalidity of the verdict on the third count is ineffectual to reverse the judgment which is perfectly valid as to the first count. There is no uncertainty regarding the guilt of the defendant of the offense charged in the first count. All jurors united in finding him guilty of both the first and the third counts. Judgment on the first count should be affirmed regardless of whether the verdict on the third count be deemed valid or invalid. We think both convictions are valid. The motion for new trial was properly denied.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILDE.

Cr. 460.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 20, 1941.

Hearing Denied Feb. 17, 1941.

1. Criminal law ⇐1086(13)

Where record did not show entry of judgment on verdict of guilty of grand theft, an appeal from the judgment was not properly before appellate court.

2. Criminal law ⇐1023(8)

An order denying a motion to quash a count in an information is not an "appealable order."

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Appealable Order".

3. Criminal law ⇐1023(8)

An order denying a motion in arrest of judgment is not an "appealable order."

4. Criminal law ⇐1023(13)

Where appeal from a judgment of conviction was not properly before appellate court because record did not show that a judgment had been entered and orders denying certain other motions were not appealable, the only appeal which appellate court could consider was that from order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

5. Embezzlement ⇐10

Where client turned over pension checks to attorney for investment without any restriction against investments in realty, and over a period of years client made no objection when he knew attorney was investing in realty, and made use of the investments in that form in numerous instances, there was no fraudulent appropriation prior to client's demand for return of money.

6. Embezzlement ⇐10

Where there was no fraudulent appropriation by attorney of client's money left for investment up to client's demand for return of money, which had been invested in realty, client was not entitled, by the demand, to set aside the original right he had given attorney to invest the money in realty and thereby make amount immediately due in cash, and make attorney's inability to comply with demand "grand theft" by embezzlement.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Grand Theft".

7. Embezzlement ⇐11(1)

Under theory of "constructive conversion" by attorney of client's money left with him for investment, there must be not only a demand by client, but a failure of attorney to make proper compliance with that demand.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Constructive Conversion".

8. Embezzlement ⇐10

Where attorney authorized by client to invest pension checks without restriction against investment in realty, invested money in realty, he was not required, on demand, to return a corresponding sum of money, but a proper demand and a sufficient compliance therewith involved his turning over the things in which money had been invested, and his offer to do so, or in the alternative, if reasonable time were given him to convert investments into cash and return it in that form precluded his conviction of grand theft by embezzlement.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

W. C. Wilde was convicted of grand theft by embezzling money belonging to his client, and from the judgment and from orders denying defendant's motion to quash the information as to a certain count thereof, and denying his motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, he appeals.

Order denying motion for a new trial reversed, with directions to grant the motion. Appeal from the other orders and the judgment dismissed.

Thomas Whelan and Vincent Whelan, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., Eugene M. Elson, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James B. Abbey, Dist. Atty., and William P. Mahedy, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The defendant was charged with grand theft on the theory that he had embezzled certain sums of money belonging to one Michael J. White.

Prior to 1929, the defendant, who is a lawyer, had acted as attorney for White in the probating of his wife's estate, and had also assisted him in obtaining a pension based upon his services in the Spanish-American War. It appears without dispute that over a period of nearly ten years, beginning in 1929, White turned over to the defendant various sums of money for investment purposes. In May, 1939, White wrote to the defendant saying he was about to retire and asking him where his money was invested. The defendant replied, telling him that his money was invested in four certain parcels of real property which stood in White's name, asking him whether he would himself look after these properties or whether he desired defendant to continue doing so, and offering to furnish information about names of tenants, amounts of rentals, taxes, water bills, etc. White replied, asking the defendant to continue paying the water bills and collecting rents for the following month. During the next month, at his request, the defendant furnished White with itemized lists of all amounts which he had received from him or for him.

On August 8, 1939, an attorney retained by White called the defendant on the telephone and made a "flat demand" for the return of White's money, which he estimated at $10,000. The defendant told this attorney that he did not have the money, that White's money was invested in these four parcels of real property, and that these stood in White's name, but offered to sell the properties and obtain the money if given time in which to do it. On August 9, 1939, the defendant delivered to this attorney deeds to the four parcels of real property which then stood in the name of White. At that time the attorney told the defendant that they wanted the cash, that he knew the defendant did not intend to pay, and that if he did not immediately pay over the amount due in cash he was going to have him indicted, prefer charges against him before the Bar Association, and sue him.

On August 12, 1939, this attorney brought an action against the defendant and his wife, attaching all properties standing in their names, including their bank account. On August 26, 1939, this criminal action was brought, charging the defendant with six counts of grand theft, each count charging that on August 8, 1939, the defendant unlawfully and fraudulently appropriated for his own use, and not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, a certain sum of money, the property of Michael J. White. Thereafter, some time in October, 1939, the parties entered into a settlement agreement pursuant to which White conveyed the four parcels of real property to the defendant's wife and the defendant paid to White $12,000 which White admitted to be the full amount due him, with interest.

[1-4] This criminal action was continued, however, an information being filed in the superior court on November 24, 1939. A motion to quash and set aside the information was granted as to the first five counts thereof and the action proceeded to trial before a jury on the sixth count. This count charged the appropriation on August 8, 1939, of $3,216.17 in lawful money belonging to White, that amount being made up of one hundred twelve pension checks, none of which was for over $40, which White had turned over to the defendant over a period beginning in September, 1929, and ending in December, 1937. The jury returnd a verdict of guilty on this count and the defendant has appealed from an order denying his motion to quash the information as to the sixth count, from an order denying his motion for a new trial, from an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment, and from the judgment. The record does not show the entry of a judgment, probably because an application for probation was pending at the time this appeal was taken. Since an appeal from the judgment is not properly before us and orders denying a motion to quash and denying a motion in arrest of judgment were not appealable orders (People v. Williams, 8 Cal.App. 595, 97 P. 684; People v. Williams, 184 Cal. 590, 194 P. 1019), the only appeal which may here be considered is the one from the order denying a new trial.

The first and main point presented is whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict of conviction. It was and is appellant's contention that he was authorized to and did invest White's money in the four parcels of realty for which he obtained deeds in White's name and which White later conveyed to appellant's wife in connection with the settlement agreement. The respondent however, contends that the appellant was not specifically authorized to invest White's money in real estate, that while the appellant honestly believed that he was entitled to so invest these trust funds that use was in fact unauthorized, and that the appellant's refusal or failure to pay over the amount due in cash after demand made on August 8, 1939, constituted a constructive conversion as of that date which is sufficient to support the verdict.

Of the four deeds which were turned over to White's attorney on August 9, 1939, one conveyed a lot from a man named Perrault to White, being dated February 2, 1931, and recorded February 28, 1931. Another conveyed two other lots from Perrault to White, being dated November 30, 1931, and recorded July 6, 1937. Another conveyed a lot from one Amo to White, being dated April 1, 1931, and recorded July 6, 1937. The fourth conveyed a lot from Perrault to White, being dated August 29, 1938, and this deed was not recorded. The respondent contends that these grantors, Perrault and Amo, were "dummies" and that these four properties at all times belonged to the appellant's wife. There is evidence that appellant's wife originally had some interest in these properties.

White testified that he turned over these various amounts, including the pension checks, to the appellant for investment, that he thought possibly they were to be invested in first mortgage loans "or something that way", but that absolutely nothing was said by him or the appellant as to how the monies were to be invested. All parties involved lived in San Diego, and White testified that he frequently visited the appellant and his wife on Sundays, and that on numerous occasions they took him around to look at these properties and others owned by the appellant. While he testified that he had not told the appellant to invest his money in real estate, at another time he testified that he had told the appellant to do this. He further testified that he thought the appellant was using this money to build houses and improve houses on his own properties, and was satisfied at the time, that from 1930 to 1938 he knew that the appellant had been using his money in this way and was satisfied, and that he knew that the appellant was investing his money in property which stood in the appellant's name and that this was satisfactory to him.

While testifying as to this knowledge and approval White insisted, at the trial, that he had never known that any of the real property in question had been deeded to him. However, it fully appears that each year from 1931 to 1938 White claimed a veteran's exemption in connection with the taxes on one of these properties, stating in the affidavits that he was the owner thereof. He admitted on the stand that the appellant had told him that this property had been conveyed to him, although he claimed he understood that this was only for the purpose of claiming the tax exemption. Moreover, White lived on another of these properties from the time it was deeded to him in 1931, up to the time of the settlement, in October, 1939, without paying any rent. It further appears, without conflict, that in 1934 when the federal government was attempting to reduce or cancel his pension, on the ground that his income had been too great in the year 1933, White signed and submitted to the government a statement claiming that he had lost certain amounts during 1933 on three or four of the parcels of real estate here in question, in order to show that his income for 1933 was not sufficient to prevent a continuance of his pension.

[5, 6] Assuming that the jury believed the statement of the complaining witness that he did not know that any of these properties had been deeded to him, in spite of the strong evidence to the contrary, that fact becomes immaterial, since it appears, without dispute, that he had turned the money over to the appellant for investment without providing that it should not be invested in real estate, and since he made no objection over a period of years when he knew the appellant was putting the money into an investment of that kind. He was not only satisfied therewith at the time, but he himself made use of and claimed the benefit of the investment in that form in at least eight or nine instances scattered through the entire period. Under these circumstances there was no fraudulent appropriation of the money up to the time of the demand, the money had then been invested in real property, and whether or not the complaining witness knew the properties had been deeded to him he was not entitled by a demand to set aside the original right he had given to invest the money, and make the amount immediately due in cash.

The respondent admits and insists that it "conclusively" appears from the evidence "that in appropriating White's money to purchase the four pieces of property, title to be vested in White's name, appellant did so honestly believing that the trust so authorized him"; that up to the time of the demand there had not been a fraudulent conversion; that "there was therefore no proof of fraudulent conversion until the demand and refusal of August 8, 1939"; that "the entire theory of the case of the prosecution was constructive conversion, namely, that the appropriation accompanied by fraudulent intent did not take place until the demand and refusal which was well within the three-year period"; and that "we are without then, a fraudulent conversion until the demand was made and appellant refused to comply. When he refused, he ipso facto appropriated to his own use" the money in question. The respondent particularly relies upon the case of People v. McEnerney, 112 Cal.App. 609, 297 P. 568, in which the defendant received certain funds as the administrator of an estate and failed to show what he had done with the money when a demand was made upon him several years later, and where it was held that there was a constructive conversion at the time of the demand. In that case, the defendant was not authorized to invest the funds and he failed to account for them upon demand. The distinction is obvious between that case and the one now before us where the appellant was authorized to invest the funds and where he accounted and turned over the proceeds before and at the time the demand was made.

[7, 8] Even under the theory of a constructive conversion there must not only be a demand but a failure to make a proper compliance with that demand. Having invested these funds as he was supposed to do the appellant was not required to immediately turn over a corresponding sum of money, but both a proper demand and a sufficient compliance therewith involved his turning over the things in which the money had been invested. He not only did this, but offered, if it was desired and reasonable time were given, to convert the investments into cash and return it in that form. The absence of a fraudulent intent up to the time of the demand is conceded and we are unable to find any evidence either showing such an intent at that time or disclosing a failure to comply with a proper demand that he turn over the things in which the money had been invested. In our opinion, the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict and the motion for a new trial should have been granted.

Because of the views herein expressed it is unnecessary to consider the other points raised by the appellant.

The purported appeal from the judgment, the appeal from the order denying the motion to quash the information, and the appeal from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment are dismissed. The order denying the motion for a new trial is reversed and the trial court is directed to grant said motion.

BECK v. SIROTA.

Civ. 12772.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 20, 1941.

1. Negligence ⇐32(1), 56(1), 65, 82

In determining whether defendant in personal injury action by invitee was negligent, and, if so, whether his negligence was the sole proximate cause of invitee's injuries and whether invitee was negligent, and, if so, whether his negligence contributed to his injuries, jury were privileged to consider the defendant's statutory obligation to an invitee on his premises as well as his contractual duty.

2. Automobiles ⇐244(3)

In action against operator of automobile parking station by employee of one engaged in washing outside walls of building adjacent to parking station, for injuries sustained in fall from scaffold when electric light cord hanging from scaffold was caught on automobile which one in charge of parking station was driving from where it was parked almost beneath scaffold, pursuant to agreement between operator of station and one engaged in washing walls, verdict in favor of injured employee was sustained by substantial evidence.

3. Appeal and error ⇐996

Merely because it might have been inferred that defendant in personal injury action was not negligent or that plaintiff was negligent, or that plaintiff's negligence contributed to his injuries, was not sufficient to upset verdict for plaintiff.

4. Appeal and error ⇐996

In personal injury action, it was for the jury to choose between the contradictory statements or contradictory inferences and, by such choice of the jury, the District Court of Appeal was bound.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1001(1)

A reversal is proper only where there is no substantial evidence in support of the verdict.

6. Appeal and error ⇐1002

In dealing with appeals involving a conflict of testimony, the reviewing court is not privileged to upset the findings of a jury merely because there are several witnesses in support of a fact as against one witness whose testimony convinced the jury.

7. Appeal and error ⇐996

The jury is the exclusive judge of the weight and value of the inference that may be drawn from the evidence, and a usurpation by an appellate court of the power to determine the facts is contrary to law.

8. Appeal and error ⇐996

The fact, that some inference other than that which the jury drew from the evidence in the case is possible, is not sufficient to warrant interference with the jury's verdict by the appellate court.

9. Negligence ⇐4

"Ordinary care" is a relative term, and the amount of care must be in proportion to the danger to be avoided and the consequences reasonably to be anticipated.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ordinary Care".

Where operator of automobile parking station agreed with one engaged in washing outside walls of building adjacent to the parking station, that automobiles underneath the scaffold would be moved, the obligation imposed on operator of parking station to use due care not to injure one on scaffold was enlarged by reason of the dangerous nature of the objects to be moved.

11. Negligence ⇐68

A person is justified in assuming that he is not exposed to a danger which can come to him only from a breach of a duty owed him by another.

12. Automobiles ⇐155

Where operator of automobile parking station agreed with one engaged in washing outside walls of building adjacent to parking station that automobiles underneath the scaffold, being used in washing the building, would be moved, the obligation of operator of parking station to use due care not to injure anyone on the scaffold was "ex contractu" and "ex delicto", and operator of parking station owed duty to exercise reasonable care in removing the automobiles. Civ.Code, § 1708.

One in charge of automobile parking station, in moving automobile parked almost beneath scaffold being used in washing outside walls of building adjacent to parking station, in accordance with agreement of operator of automobile parking station that the automobiles would be so removed, had the duty in the exercise of "ordinary care" to ascertain before driving automobile away whether it was likely to be hooked to a looped electric light cord suspended from the scaffold. Civ.Code, § 1708.

14. Automobiles ⇐206

One who was engaged in washing outside walls of building from a scaffold had the right to presume that operator of automobile parking station adjacent to the building, who had agreed that automobiles would be moved from beneath the scaffold, and his agents would perform their duty by removing the automobiles in such a manner as would avoid injuring him.

15. Negligence ⇐68

Generally, every person has a right to presume that every other person has performed his duty and has obeyed the law.

16. Negligence ⇐68

In absence of reasonable grounds to think otherwise, it is not negligence for one to assume that he is not exposed to danger which can come to him only from a violation of law or duty by some other person.

17. Appeal and error ⇐996

Where jury determined under proper instructions that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, their finding on that point would not be disturbed so long as reasonable minds might have differed on the question as to whether the acts of the plaintiff constituted negligence on his part.

18. Automobiles ⇐240(3)

In action against operator of automobile parking station by employee of one engaged in washing outside walls of building adjacent to station for injuries sustained in fall from scaffold when electric light cord hanging from scaffold was caught on automobile which one in charge of station drove from almost beneath scaffold pursuant to agreement between operator of station and one engaged in washing walls, there was not a "fatal variance" between allegata and probata, because it was alleged that automobile was parked below scaffold when it was parked three feet to one side of scaffold, where pleadings were broadened by allegations of answer.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Fatal Variance".

19. Appeal and error ⇐1170(5)

Since the purpose of an allegation is to apprise the defendant of the claims of the plaintiff, and of the facts he intends to prove, the failure of a complaint to indicate all facts to be relied on is cured where one trial has already occurred and the facts adduced at the second trial are identical with those presented at the first. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

20. Appeal and error ⇐989

If a cause of action has been stated and proved, appellate courts are concerned with the facts established, provided the adversary party has had full opportunity to present his evidence and his argument to the trial court.

21. Automobiles ⇐246(39)

In action against operator of automobile parking station by employee of one engaged in washing outside walls of building adjacent to station for injuries sustained in fall from scaffold when electric light cord hanging from scaffold was caught on automobile which one in charge of station was driving from where it was parked almost beneath scaffold, pursuant to agreement between operator of station and one engaged in washing walls, instruction that operator of station was required to use such care as an ordinarily prudent person would have used where movement of "any" automobile at station would endanger safety of workmen was not erroneous, where no issue arose with respect to any automobile except the automobile on which light cord caught.

Where operator of automobile parking station agreed to move automobiles away from wall adjacent to parking station while wall was being washed, agreement required operator of station to remove automobiles in such close proximity to operations of workmen as to imperil the safety of any automobile, and hence operator of station would not be relieved from liability for injuries sustained by workman when electric light cord hanging from scaffold was caught on automobile, causing workman to fall from scaffold, merely because automobile was not directly below scaffold. Civ.Code, § 3533.

23. Trial ⇐260(1)

Refusal to give defendant's requested instruction was not error where everything embraced within that instruction was contained in other instructions which were read to the jury.

Trial ⇐234(7)

The giving of plaintiff's instruction that, where there is other evidence that conflicts with presumption of exercise of ordinary care, it is jury's duty to weigh the evidence against the presumption, to determine which, if either, preponderates, was not prejudicial error, where plaintiff because of his injuries was prevented from giving a clear narrative of the events concerning the accident.

25. Trial ⇐194(1), 240, 260(1)

Trial court properly refused to give requested instructions which were argumentative or which commented on the effect of the evidence, or which repeated the contents of instructions given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Parker Wood, Judge.

Action by Paul Beck against Ben Sirota, to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while working as a wall cleaner. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Hearing denied; EDMONDS, J., dissenting.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Philip C. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frances J. Gabel and J. L. Kearney, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

Defendant appeals from a judgment of $10,000 pursuant to verdict for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff September 14, 1937, while working as cleaner of a wall. The judgment followed the second trial.

The bases of the appeal are: (1) The insufficiency of the evidence; (2) fatal variance between plaintiff's pleading and proof; (3) error in giving certain instructions; (4) errors in refusing certain instructions.

(1) On December 14, 1937, one Bates had a contract to wash the walls of the building occupied by the Southern California Gas Co., located near the corner of Eighth and Flower street in the city of Los Angeles. Plaintiff was one of his workmen. Defendant operated a parking station on the north side of the building and the witness Welch was in charge of the parking station at the time of the occurrence that resulted in plaintiff's injuries. Prior to commencing the washing of the building, Bates contracted with the defendant to have the cars moved away from the wall after 8 p. m. so that it would be safe for his men to work there and to prevent injuries to the cars by chemicals used in washing the building. Welch knew of the contract between Bates and defendant and pursuant thereto, and at plaintiff's request, undertook to move some 10 or 12 cars parked along the north wall, prior to plaintiff's beginning work at about 8 o'clock in the evening. In order to apply the chemicals to the building, plaintiff stood upon a scaffold which hung from the roof. Having mounted the scaffold, he took the 150-foot cord which had been plugged into an outlet on the sixth floor, turned on the five 100-watt bulbs and then lowered the looped cord to the ground 39 feet below. In order to see that it was safe to move the cars, Welch walked between the building and the cars to inspect them and removed all cars standing directly below the scaffold, including car No. 7. After checking out a customer, he returned to remove car No. 6. He stepped on its running board and looked toward the building wall but saw no cord suspended. He entered the car with the windows closed, gunned the motor, pulled forward about 15 feet when he felt a sharp tug on the vehicle. He stopped the car and learned that the light cord hanging from the scaffold had become attached to the rear bumper and had jerked down the scaffold throwing plaintiff to the ground.

Plaintiff was about 25 years of age, had worked at his trade for eleven months, washing buildings and cleaning machinery and tanks. He sustained a broken back, broken feet and a split of the crotch. He was confined in the hospital for ninety-six days; walked on crutches for six or seven weeks and was suffering from pain in his feet and back at the time of the trial two years subsequent.

Appellant claims that by reason of the fact that car No. 6 was 3 feet west of the scaffold he was not required to remove it to accommodate Bates and his workmen. This is answered by the fact that the parties themselves construed their agreement to mean that he should remove car No. 6 to another part of the lot and that construction is evidenced by the fact that Welch, without any specific order or special agreement, was attempting to remove the car at the time he dragged plaintiff from the scaffold. Whether car No. 6 was partially under the scaffold or entirely out is of no moment. The best that can be said for appellant is that the car was at the wall and in close proximity to the area directly under the scaffold. This would have subjected the car to the spray of the chemicals used by the cleaners. At the same time it was reasonable to anticipate that ropes and cords would be suspended from the scaffold and would contact the cars below. The removal of car No. 6 was undertaken pursuant to the contract as well as from a sense of duty to an invitee. In his attempt, Welch failed to exercise reasonable care in that he failed to go around it as he had done prior to moving the cars directly beneath the scaffold. The knowledge of the average person that ropes and cords may sway and swing when suspended from an elevation of 40 feet was sufficient to put Welch on notice that the suspended cord was likely to attach to some part of an automobile within 5 feet of the point perpendicularly below the position where plaintiff had stood as he let down the cord. This operation of plaintiff was done with care as a task to be performed in the course of cleaning the wall. The use of electric lights by plaintiff was known to defendant and his employees. In view of the fact that the scaffold had to be raised and lowered, it was readily to be understood that the cord would necessarily hang below the scaffold when the latter was above the earth. Furthermore, the consciousness of Welch that the loop of the cord might have caught on to a car was evidenced by his careful inspection of the cars removed prior to his moving car No. 6. His anticipation of danger was further demonstrated by his mounting the running-board of car No. 6 to ascertain whether it could be moved with safety.

[1] The jury had to determine (1) whether defendant was negligent, and, if so, (2) whether his negligence was the sole proximate cause of plaintiff's fall. In making a finding upon these questions, they had to consider (3) whether plaintiff was negligent and, if so, (4) whether his negligence contributed to his injuries. In determining these questions, the jury were privileged to consider the defendant's statutory obligation to an invitee upon his premises as well as his contractual duty.

[2-8] That there was substantial evidence to support the verdict is established by the foregoing recitals. Merely because it might have been inferred that defendant was not negligent or that plaintiff was negligent and that his negligence contributed to his injuries, is not sufficient to upset the verdict. It was for the jury to choose between the contradictory statements or contradictory inferences and by such choice this court is bound. Raggio v. Mallory, 10 Cal.2d 723, 76 P.2d 660; People v. Crownover, 34 Cal.App.2d 7, 92 P.2d 929. By thus choosing they decided that defendant was negligent and that his negligence was the sole proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. A reversal is proper only where there is no substantial evidence in support of the verdict. Ibidem. In dealing with appeals involving a conflict of testimony, the reviewing court is not privileged to upset the findings of a jury merely because there are several witnesses in support of a fact as against one witness whose testimony convinced the jury. People v. Crownover, supra. The jury is the exclusive judge of the weight and value of the inference that may be drawn from evidence and a usurpation by an appellate court of the power to determine the facts would be contrary to law. Also the fact that some inference other than that which the jury drew from the evidence in the case is possible is not sufficient to warrant the interference with the jury's verdict by the appellate court. Hamilton v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 12 Cal.2d 598, 86 P.2d 829.

[9-11] Ordinary care is a relative term. The same quantum of care that might have been exercised by defendant in removing a farm wagon from the wall is much less than that which was imposed upon defendant in moving a dangerous instrumentality, such as a modern automobile. The amount of care must be in proportion to the danger to be avoided and the consequences reasonably to be anticipated. Thus was the obligation placed upon defendant enlarged by reason of the dangerous nature of the objects to be moved. 19 Cal.Jur., 579. A person is justified in assuming that he is not exposed to a danger which can come to him only from a breach of a duty owed him by another. 45 Cal.Jur., 954.

[12-16] Defendant's obligation was two-fold, ex contractu and ex delicto. Although the contract with plaintiff's employer imposed upon him the necessity of exercising reasonable care, the same obligation obtains by virtue of statute. Defendant owed the duty to plaintiff as an invitee to exercise reasonable care in removing the automobiles. Civ.Code, sec. 1708; 45 C.J., 838; 19 Cal.Jur., 618. Such care imposed the task of ascertaining whether before driving a car away from the space it occupied against the wall it was likely to be hooked to a looped cord suspended from the scaffold. Less than that would have been less than ordinary care. But that obligation was increased by virtue of the contract he had made with plaintiff's employer to move the cars "so it would be safe" for plaintiff and his fellow workmen on the scaffold. 1 R.C.L., 321. His promise was coincidental with his statutory obligation. Jones v. Kelly, 208 Cal. 251, 280 P. 942. Plaintiff had a right to presume that the defendant and his agents would perform their duty by removing the machines in such a manner as would avoid injuring the cleaners. It is a general rule that every person has a right to presume that every other person has performed his duty and obeyed the law. In the absence of reasonable grounds to think otherwise, it is not negligence for him to assume that he is not exposed to danger which can come to him only from a violation of law or duty by such other person. Robbiano v. Bovet, 218 Cal. 589, at page 597, 24 P.2d 466; Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, at page 58, 161 P. 1155, L.R.A.1917C, 477, Ann.Cas.1918E, 560; Moreno v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 44 Cal.App. 551, 186 P. 800; Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal. App. 242, 137 P. 1078.

[18-20] (2) Appellant contends that there is a fatal variance between the allegata and the probata in that plaintiff alleged that as he was standing upon the said platform or scaffold, the defendants, well knowing that ropes and wiring were hanging therefrom to the ground, negligently parked an automobile in the space below the scaffold and carelessly moved the same with rope or wiring from the scaffold caught around a fender, causing the scaffold to be swung out, throwing plaintiff to the ground and injuring him. But, contends appellant, the proof was that before plaintiff mounted the scaffold the cars directly beneath it had been moved and that that car No. 6, which brought plaintiff to his sorrow, was parked 3 feet west of the scaffold and that the light cord at the time plaintiff mounted to begin his work was not attached to the automobile or near it. But the narrow construction given the contract by appellant is not in keeping with the circumstances surrounding the incident or with the understanding of both parties as to the nature of the obligation imposed upon defendant. Steam and acids sprayed upon a brick or concrete wall do not converge in a narrow channel by which they find their way to earth. They are easy victims of the winds and air currents that from an altitude of 40 feet are conveyed to neighboring spaces, too often farther than 3 feet horizontally from the point at which they have been applied to the surface. If the agreement contemplated the safety of the cleaners, that safety could have been imperiled only by the ropes and cords suspended from the scaffold to the space below or in immediate proximity thereto. Not only were the issues created by the allegation of the complaint, the substance of which is given above, but the issue was broadened by the allegations of the answer to the effect that defendant had contracted to remove the automobiles from the wall underneath the scaffold and would keep the cars from being parked in that space while the cleaners were at their work to the end that they might work in safety. With the issues thus broadened, it was competent for plaintiff to prove that the safety of the workmen on the scaffold was to be secured by the careful removal of the cars parked against the wall. To grant the contention of appellant would operate to defeat justice by adhering to an over-wrought technicality in the construction of the language of the agreement and the duties of defendant to his invitees. The defendant having thus enlarged the issues, they embraced the negligence of defendant to an invitee upon his premises. Wantz v. Union Bank, etc., Co., 137 Cal.App. 98, 29 P.2d 882, 31 P.2d 826; Woods Central Irrigating Ditch Co. v. Porter, etc., Co., 173 Cal. 149, 159 P. 427. Furthermore since the purpose of an allegation is to apprise the defendant of the claims of the plaintiff and of the facts he intends to prove, the failure of a complaint to indicate all of the facts to be relied on is cured where one trial has already occurred and the facts adduced at the second trial are identical with those presented at the first. Bridge v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co., 129 Cal.App. 355, 19 P.2d 76. Therefore, defendant cannot plead prejudice or surprise by plaintiff's proof that the removal of car No. 6 caused his injuries; under these circumstances to reverse the judgment because of a variance would do violence to section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution, which forbids a reversal except for prejudicial error. The theory of the pleading is not the controlling doctrine under such circumstances. California Western States Life Ins. Co. v. Tucker, Cal.Sup., 98 P.2d 511. If a cause of action has been stated and proved, appellate courts are concerned with the facts established provided the adversary party has had full opportunity to present his evidence and his argument to the trial court. 19 Cal.Jur., 692, sec. 115. The authorities cited by appellant in support of his claim of a variance (Brown v. Northern California P. Co., 14 Cal.App. 651, 114 P. 54, 74; McKeon v. Lissner, 193 Cal. 297, 223 P. 965; Marin Municipal Water Dist. v. Peninsula Co., 34 Cal.App.2d 647, 94 P.2d 404) do not apply. In neither the Brown case nor the Marin case was any negligence proved. In the McKeon case the allegation of negligence consisted in defendant's failure to keep the elevator and its operating apparatus in repair. But at the trial the only proof of negligence was that the hallway leading to the elevator was dark and confusing which condition was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries.

[21, 22] (3) Plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: "You are instructed that the defendant was required to use such care as an ordinarily prudent person would have used for the safety of workmen who might be engaged in work where the movement of any automobile on said parking lot would endanger the safety of said workman. If you find that the defendant failed to exercise such care for the safety of Paul Beck as an ordinarily prudent person would have used, under the same or similar circumstances, you will find that the defendant was negligent in that regard." This instruction was not error. It would have been in better form had the word "any" been omitted therefrom, but no issue arose with respect to any car outside of the area immediately below the scaffold except car No. 6. There was no dispute as to the duty of defendant to move with reasonable care the car from the space seven. Indeed, appellant's brief stated: "Welch testified that prior to moving the car in lane 7 he walked between the rear of the cars and the building wall to see if there were any ropes but did not do so when he returned a moment later to move the car in lane 6." These were the only two cars specifically discussed in the course of the trial. Defendant's agent thus demonstrated his own caution as well as defendant's view of his obligation under the circumstances in ascertaining whether there was any rope affixed to the car in lane 6. Appellant proceeds upon the theory that, because some of the evidence was that car No. 6 was some 3 feet west of the west end of the scaffold, it was not immediately beneath the scaffold and therefore he was not obliged to remove it in order to give safety to the cleaners or to the cars that were parked near the wall. The law disregards trifles. Civ. Code, sec. 3533. But in view of the fact that the plaintiff was cleaning the wall with steam and acids which, on being blown against the building would have been detrimental to any car sprayed with it, we cannot conclude otherwise than that a fair interpretation of the contract between Bates and Sirota required Sirota to remove the cars which were in such close proximity to the operations of the workmen as to imperil the safety of any automobile. Likewise, in view of the fact that there was no car by the wall and yet outside of the space directly beneath the scaffold except car No. 6, the instruction with reference to "any car" could have directed the attention of the jury to no car other than car 6. The attempt of appellant to apply the rule laid down in Marovitch v. Central, etc., Co., 191 Cal. 295, 216 P. 595, is unavailing. In that case, and in others there cited, specific allegations of negligence are made which the court held should have guided the trial court in giving instructions with reference to the negligence charged. But in view of the construction given by the parties themselves and of the fact that a reasonable interpretation of the contract would require the defendant to move cars that were sufficiently near the scaffold to suffer harm from the cleaning operations, it cannot be said that the phrase in plaintiff's pleadings in describing "the space immediately below said scaffold" could mean only the cars perpendicularly beneath the scaffold.

quested instruction XXXIV. That instruction reads as follows: "Plaintiff specifically alleges that at the time of the accident the defendant, knowing that ropes and wiring were hanging from the scaffold to the ground, negligently parked, or permitted to be parked, an automobile in the space immediately below said scaffold, and negligently moved the same with a rope or wire from said scaffold caught around a fender or bumper of said automobile thereby causing said scaffold to be swung out from the wall of the building throwing plaintiff to the ground. Unless plaintiff proves these allegations of the complaint by a preponderance of the evidence he cannot recover herein." But instruction III embraced substantially everything contained in his instruction XXXIV. Furthermore, if anything suggested in instruction XXXIV is not included in defendant's instruction III, it is found in plaintiff's instruction No. 27, both of which were read to the jury.

(4) Plaintiff's instruction No. 21 given by the court reads as follows: "At the outset of this trial, each party was entitled to the presumptions of law that every person takes ordinary care of his own concerns and that he obeys the law. These presumptions are a form of prima facie evidence and will support findings in accordance therewith, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Where there is other evidence that conflicts with such presumption, it is the jury's duty to weigh that evidence against the presumption to determine which, if either, preponderates. Such deliberations, of course, shall be related to, and in accordance with, my instructions on the burden of proof." Appellant assigns this instruction as error and urges that, inasmuch as plaintiff and his witnesses gave their testimony with reference to the manner in which the injuries of plaintiff were received, an instruction to the effect "that every person is presumed to take ordinary care of his own concerns and that he obeys the law" should not have been given. In support of this proposition, appellant cites three cases, Mundy v. Marshall, 8 Cal.2d 294, 65 P.2d 65; Paulsen v. McDuffie, 4 Cal.2d 111, 47 P.2d 709, and Speck v. Sarver, Cal.App., 106 P.2d 49. In the Mundy case, the court having heard the uncontradicted testimony of eye-witnesses, instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defense. Thus, from plaintiff's own witnesses it was made clear that "there [was] no room for the operation of the presumption that he [decedent] was exercising due care". [8 Cal.2d 294, 65 P.2d 66.] It had been declared in the case of Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269, 273, that the "presumption cannot be deemed to give rise to a conflict * * * unless the presumption on the one hand is irreconcilable with the evidence on the other". In the Paulsen case, it was established that the defendant was negligent and that under the law plaintiff had not assumed the risks of his employment. Under the United States statutes, he was entitled to all the rights and remedies granted to the railway employees under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51 et seq. In commenting upon the doubtful propriety of including among the instructions the presumption that plaintiff acted with ordinary care and obeyed the law, Mr. Justice Curtis observed that the presumption is evidence and "it is difficult to see how there was any place for a presumption as to the plaintiff's conduct". [4 Cal.2d 111, 47 P.2d 714.] The judgment for plaintiff was affirmed in spite of the criticised instruction. The Speck case is not pertinent for the reason that the instruction there complained of stated "that plaintiff is not guilty of contributory negligence". [106 P.2d 51.] This goes further than the presumption contained in the instruction complained of.

The giving of such instruction has been the subject of much discussion. The consensus of opinion is that it is not prejudicial error. Tuttle v. Crawford, 8 Cal.2d 126, 63 P.2d 1128; Parker v. Manchester Hotel Co., 29 Cal.App.2d 446, 85 P.2d 152; Whicker v. Crescent Auto Co., 20 Cal.App. 2d 240, 66 P.2d 749; Westberg v. Willde, 14 Cal.2d 360, 367, 94 P.2d 590, 594. In the Westberg case, all possible facts with respect to the negligence of the plaintiff were before the court. The court there remarked that it was difficult to perceive how any presumption as to defendant's conduct could add to or detract from the evidence presented and held that "the giving of such an instruction under the circumstances just related was not prejudicial". In Tuttle v. Crawford, supra, the giving of the instruction worked no material prejudice to the defendant. "The presumption is a natural one, and the bare Code section, as given by the court, told the jury nothing that the philosophy of life and human experience do not impart to the average person," said the court. "No instruction was given defining the force or effect of presumptions." [8 Cal.

2d 126, 63 P.2d 1131.] In Parker v. Manchester Hotel Co., supra, 29 Cal.App.2d at page 459, 85 P.2d 152, where the plaintiff had testified with respect to her own injuries, the court held that giving the presumption, even if erroneous, was not sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal. See Whicker v. Crescent Auto Co., supra; Varner v. Skov, 20 Cal.App.2d 232, 67 P. 2d 123. In the case of Varner v. Skov, supra, the judgment was not reversed on account of the giving of the instruction, although it was assigned as error. In Whicker v. Crescent Auto, supra, an elderly woman was injured by an automobile as she stepped from the safety zone. She apparently suffered some confusion accompanying the casualty and her recollection was "Far from clear". Neither did the testimony of the driver of the automobile destroy the probative weight of the fact presumed. It was held that where facts are admitted or established by proofs which are irreconcilable with the presumption it loses its evidentiary weight; also that there is no sound reason why the familiar doctrine that a party may contradict though not impeach his own witnesses, should not, if the circumstances are consistent with honesty and good faith, be applied when he is himself the witness.

[24] In the instant case the trial court must have been impressed that plaintiff suffered confusion resulting from his fall from the scaffold and that he was thereby prevented from giving a clear and uncontradictory narrative of the events concerning the accident. If he was confused, he was entitled to the benefit of the presumption; if he was not confused the instruction was not prejudicial error.

[25] (5) Appellant has assigned as error the court's refusal to give eight of his instructions, viz., XX, XXIX, XXXV, XXXVII, XXXVIII, XXXIX, XL, XLI, on the ground that they were necessary to the proper presentation of his theory of the case. We have scrutinized each of them and find that they are argumentative; that they comment upon the effect of the evidence, or that they repeat the contents of instructions given. No useful purpose can be served by setting them out herein in view of the fact that the court's instructions fully and correctly advised the jury with reference to all of the issues.

Judgment is affirmed.

HECHLER et al. v. McDONNELL.

Civ. 12743.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

1. Negligence ⇐135

In action for injuries sustained when restaurant patron slipped and fell while arising from stool on terrazzo platform, evidence warranted finding that patron, who knew that platform had been mopped while she ate, but who did not know and had not been warned that platform was still wet when she began to arise, was not negligent.

2. Negligence ⇐66(2)

To forget a known danger is not "negligence" unless such forgetfulness shows want of ordinary care.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Negligence".

3. Negligence ⇐68

A restaurant patron who knew that terrazzo platform had been mopped while she sat on stool and ate her lunch, would be justified in assuming when she began to arise from stool, that platform had been mopped properly and in a manner that would not endanger her safety, and that restaurateur would not expose patron to a danger that would come to patron only through violation of restaurateur's duty to patron.

4. Negligence ⇐44

A terrazzo floor is not inherently dangerous in and of itself, but such a floor becomes potentially dangerous when it is wet.

5. Negligence ⇐32(1), 68

A restaurateur's duty to exercise ordinary care for safety of invitees requires restaurateur installing terrazzo floor to take precaution not to allow floor to become or remain wet while invitees are present, and to see that mopping is done in such a manner as effectually to dry the surface mopped before an invitee is permitted to walk on such surface, and invitee is not required to look for wet floors.

6. Negligence ⇐32(1)

The keeper of a public place of business is bound to keep his premises in a safe condition and must use ordinary care to avoid accidents or injury to those properly entering upon premises on business.

7. Negligence ⇐134(3)

In action for injuries sustained when restaurant patron slipped and fell while arising from stool on terrazzo platform which had been mopped while patron ate, evidence warranted finding that restaurateur was negligent in allowing platform to be so wet as to lubricate it when patron arose.

8. Appeal and error ⇐1001(1)

The findings of jury will not be disturbed on appeal when supported by substantial evidence.

9. Trial ⇐296(9)

In action for injuries sustained when restaurant patron slipped and fell while arising from stool on terrazzo platform, instruction that "it is established that the employee who was mopping the floor in the restaurant at the time involved in the accident in question was acting as agent" for restaurateur, was not prejudicial error as assuming existence of disputed fact as to whether floor was mopped or swept, where jury were instructed that it was their exclusive province to determine the facts in the case and that trial judge did not intend to suggest inferences for jury to draw.

10. Negligence ⇐68

One to whom a duty of care is owing by another may assume that the latter will perform it, and, in the absence of reasonable grounds to think otherwise, is not negligent in assuming that he will not be exposed to a danger, which can arise only by violation of such duty.

11. Negligence ⇐68

An invitee can assume that keeper of public house will perform duty of care owing to invitee, and in absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise, invitee is not negligent in assuming that invitee will not be exposed by keeper to a danger which can arise only by violation of such duty.

12. Appeal and error ⇐1170(9)

In personal injury action, inclusion in damage instruction of element of compensation for damage to property was improper but was harmless, where no claim was made for damage to property and there was no evidence received of damage to property. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

13. Appeal and error ⇐932(1)

Where no claim or proof of damage to property was made, District Court of Appeal would not assume that jury intended to include such damage in the award, notwithstanding inclusion in damage instruction of element of compensation for damage to property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles E. Haas, Judge.

Action by Minnie Mae Hechler and another against M. A. McDonnell, for injuries sustained when the named plaintiff fell in defendant's restaurant. From a judgment for the plaintiffs, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

P. T. Howe and D. E. Ruppe, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harold David Geffen, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment, after verdict, in favor of plaintiffs in the amount of $3,500.

About 2:30 p. m. on July 18, 1938, plaintiffs, husband and wife, entered the restaurant of defendant, walked across a light-colored terrazzo floor to stools located upon a black-colored terrazzo platform which was 8 to 10 inches above the floor level. Plaintiff Minnie Mae mounted the platform, occupied a stool next to her husband, ordered and ate her lunch. While thus engaged in consuming her viands she observed a man enter from the kitchen and sweep the floor and platform. He retraced his steps to the kitchen, returned with bucket and mop and proceeded to mop the floor and platform where plaintiffs were seated. Mrs. Hechler finished her meal, turned her stool to the right and, with both feet on the platform, attempted to rise. Before she could gain her equilibrium both feet slipped from beneath her and she fell, fracturing her right hip.

Appellant contends that (1) plaintiff was negligent as a matter of law in having full knowledge of the wet platform; (2) that it was not established that appellant failed to exercise that degree of care required of a public house for the protection of invitees; and (3) that the giving of certain erroneous instructions to the jury constituted prejudicial error.

[1-3] The jury was warranted by the evidence in finding that Mrs. Hechler was not negligent. She never testified that she knew the floor was wet at the time she fell. She knew the janitor had mopped the floor while she ate, but there is no positive proof that she knew it was wet as she began to arise. From the fact that it was wet and that of its wetness she was unconscious, and that defendant was negligent in not warning her, and that such negligence was the sole proximate cause of her injuries were inferences that might fairly have been drawn from the evidence. Hamilton v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 12 Cal.2d 598, 86 P.2d 829; Raggio v. Mallory, 10 Cal.2d 723, 76 P.2d 660; Beck v. Sirota, Cal.App., 109 P.2d 419, this day decided. The manner of her attempted departure from the stool was natural and proper. To forget a known danger is not negligence unless it shows want of ordinary care, and this again was a question for the jury. Meindersee v. Meyers, 188 Cal. 498, 205 P. 1078; Jacobson v. Oakland Meat, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 425, 119 P. 653, Ann.Cas. 1913B, 1194. Even if plaintiff had given any thought to the platform before rising from the stool, she would have been justified in assuming that it had been mopped properly and in a manner that would not endanger her safety, and that appellant would not expose her to a danger that would come to her only through a violation of his duty to her. 20 R.C.L. 66; De Verdi v. Weiss, 16 Cal.App.2d 439, 60 P.2d 879; Tuttle v. Crawford, 8 Cal.2d 126, 63 P.2d 1128.

Appellant cites numerous authorities (Mautino v. Sutter Hospital Ass'n, 211 Cal. 556, 296 P. 76; Shanley v. American Olive Co., 185 Cal. 552, 197 P. 793; Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 P. 462; Weddle v. Heath, 211 Cal. 445, 295 P. 832; Funari v. Gravem-Inglis Baking Co., Cal.App., 104 P.2d 44; and Kauffman v. Machin Shirt Co., 167 Cal. 506, 140 P. 15) in support of his contention that because of plaintiff's conduct she was guilty of contributory negligence. But those and many other similar cases are authority for rejecting the demands of one who, being familiar with a building and its patent defects, was negligent as a result of which he received his injuries.

[4-8] (2) While a floor of terrazzo is not inherently dangerous in and of itself, yet when it is wet it becomes potentially dangerous, a fact concerning which defendant had superior knowledge. When defendant installed such a floor in his restaurant he knew that under his duty to exercise ordinary care for the safety of his patrons he was required to take precaution not to allow the floor and platform to become or remain wet while invitees were present. The mopping should have been done in such a manner as effectually to dry the surface mopped before an invitee was permitted to walk upon it. While this precaution was not taken by defendant, plaintiff was not obligated to look for wet floors. "The keeper of a public place of business is bound to keep his premises * * in a safe condition, and must use ordinary care to avoid accidents or injury to those properly entering upon his premises [on business]." Tuttle v. Crawford, supra [8 Cal.2d 126, 63 P.2d 1130]; De Verdi v. Weiss, supra. The jury having determined that defendant was negligent in allowing the platform to be so wet as to lubricate it, and that plaintiff was not negligent, its findings will not be disturbed when supported by substantial evidence. Hamilton v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., supra.

[9] (3) Appellant assigns as prejudicial error the following instruction, claiming that it assumes the existence of a fact on which there is a conflict, i. e., whether defendant's employee did actually mop the floor. It follows: "It is established that the employee who was mopping the floor in the restaurant at the time involved in the accident in question was acting as agent for the defendant, and within the scope of his authority, at the time of the events out of which the accident occurred. Therefore the acts and omissions of that agent were in contemplation of law the acts and omissions, respectively, of his principal, the defendant, McDonnell." This is an instruction upon the liability of the employer for the acts of his agent or employee. If the point made by appellant is that the instruction declared it was established that the janitor was mopping the floor, whereas appellant contends that it was a question of fact as to whether he mopped or swept the floor, still there is no prejudice in the instruction. The jury was admonished by the judge that he did not intend to suggest inferences for them to draw and that it was "their exclusive province to determine the facts in the case and to consider the evidence for that purpose". Respondents maintain that the phrase "who was mopping the floor", etc., was for the purpose of identifying the employee discussed, that it did not instruct the jury to find he was mopping the floor, and that even were it a "mere recital" it was not an instruction that said employee did mop the floor. Johnson v. Fletcher, 97 Cal.App. 153, 274 P. 1001. Further to establish that the contention made by appellant on this point is without merit we have only to recall that his statement of facts contains the following: "that the man then went back to the kitchen and came out with a bucket and large mop and mopped over the same place", etc.

[10, 11] Appellant assigns as prejudicial error the following instruction: "You are hereby instructed that the general rule is that one to whom a duty of care is owing by another has the right to assume that the person who owes such duty will perform it; and in the absence of reasonable grounds to think otherwise, it is not negligence on the part of the one to whom the duty is owing to assume that he will not be exposed to a danger which can come to him only through a violation of that duty by the person owing it." This identical instruction was approved in the cases of Gornstein v. Priver, 64 Cal.App. 249, 221 P. 396, and Hanson v. Cordoza, 106 Cal. App. 500, 505, 290 P. 62. Appellant's contentions (1) that the instruction implies that if appellant were negligent in any degree respondents would under all circumstances be entitled to recover, (2) that it did not leave for the jury's determination whether appellant exercised ordinary care, and (3) that it made appellant insurer of respondent Minnie Hechler's safety, have no basis. The instruction correctly defines the rights of an invitee as against the keeper of a public house. Touhy v. Owl Drug Co., 6 Cal.App.2d 64, 49 P.2d 405; Brown v. Holzwasser, Inc., 108 Cal.App. 483, 484, 291 P. 661; Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 P. 256, 5 L.R.A. 580; McClurken v. Ralph's Grocery Co., 130 Cal.App. 529, 28 P.2d 66.

[12, 13] Appellant also attacks as prejudicial error that part of the court's instruction relative to fixing damages, wherein the court included as one of the elements of damage "such sum as will reasonably compensate said plaintiff for damage to her property". It is true that this "element" should not have been included, but it was utterly harmless in view of the fact that no claim was made for damage to her property and there was no evidence received of damage to her property. The instruction upon the subject of damage given by the court was in printed form, and the several elements or items which might constitute damage are on several sheets of paper. In this instance it was evidently an accident that the language criticised was included among the sheets which contained the elements constituting damage in cases of personal injury. However, there having been no claim or proof of damage to property, we cannot assume that the jury intended to include such in its award. Under the circumstances no miscarriage of justice could have resulted from including as one of the factors in computing plaintiffs' damages the element expressed in the clause complained of. Tuttle v. Crawford, supra; art. VI, sec. 4½ of the Constitution.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

1. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

The provision of present charter of San Francisco that when civil service commission deems it practicable it shall provide for promotional examinations, and provision of former charter that "wherever practicable" such examinations must be given, mean substantially the same thing, and under both provisions the question of whether a promotional examination is practicable is confided to the limited jurisdiction of the commission.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

It is only when it appears that the limited discretion of the civil service commission of San Francisco in determining whether a promotional examination is practicable has been abused that courts are warranted in interfering.

* Subsequent opinion 117 P.2d 342.

3. Municipal corporations ⇐978(1)

Under charter of San Francisco requiring civil service commission to hold promotional examinations "when practicable", where there were at least 18 persons ready and willing to take a promotional examination for the position of adjuster in the office of tax collector, to which they were eligible under the qualifications prescribed by commission, commission's action in ordering an open examination instead of a promotional examination, on theory that promotional examination was not "practicable", constituted an abuse of discretion.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Practicable".

Officers ⇐11

Under San Francisco charter provision requiring civil service commission, whenever it deems practicable, to provide for promotion on basis of such examinations and tests as commission may deem appropriate and to give consideration to ascertained merit and record of city and county service applicants, the commission has wide discretion in determining what groups shall be included within the class permitted to take a promotional examination and the qualifications of those desiring to take it.

5. Mandamus ⇐168(2)

Where petitioners in mandamus proceeding against city civil service commission established a prima facie case of abuse of discretion by commission in giving notice of an open examination to establish an eligible list for a certain position in classified service instead of holding a promotional examination, burden was on commission of bringing forth any explanation it might have by way of defense.

6. Municipal corporations ⇐216(1)

A city civil service commission has wide discretionary powers in many of its fields of operation, but such commissions have only such powers as are conferred on them, and when they exceed or abuse their powers it is not only within the power, but it is the duty, of the judicial branch of government to prevent such excess or abuse on petition of those adversely affected.

7. Officers ⇐69

The purpose of civil service is to abolish the so-called spoils system, and to increase the efficiency of the service by assuring employees of continuance in office regardless of what party may be in power.

8. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

San Francisco charter provisions requiring civil service commission, whenever it deems it to be "practicable", to provide for promotion in service on basis of such examinations and tests as commission may deem appropriate, are mandatory.

10. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

The provision of the San Francisco charter requiring civil service commission, whenever it deems it to be practicable, to provide for promotion in civil service on the basis of such examinations and tests as commission may deem appropriate, constitutes a limitation on commission's discretion, and where it is practicable to hold a promotional examination such examination must be given.

11. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

Under San Francisco charter provision requiring civil service commission to give a promotional examination where it deems practicable, commission in determining whether it is "practicable" to give such examination has not an uncontrolled discretion, but if such an examination is not to be given a valid reason for not doing so must exist.

12. Mandamus ⇐75

Under city charter provision requiring civil service commission where practicable to provide for promotion on basis of examinations and tests, mandamus lies to compel commissioners to hold a promotional instead of an open examination where the decision of commissioners to hold an open examination is shown to constitute an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Mandamus proceeding by P. G. Allen and others against Howard M. McKinley and others, as Civil Service Commission of the City of San Francisco, its secretary and personnel director, to require respondents to hold a promotional examination instead of an open one for the purpose of creating an eligible list for positions in the Civil Service of San Francisco in the Tax Collector's office, designated as adjuster, Class G153. PETERS, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal by the Civil Service Commission of San Francisco, its secretary, and its personnel director, from a judgment directing the issuance of a writ of mandamus commanding the appellants to hold a promotional examination, instead of an open one, for the purpose of creating an eligible list for positions in the civil service of San Francisco in the Tax Collector's office designated as Adjuster, Class G153. The proceeding was instituted in the trial court by respondents, who are eighteen employees in the office of the Tax Collector in San Francisco, after the Civil Service Commission had given notice of an open and original examination to establish an eligible list for the positions in question. It is the theory of these respondents, upheld by the trial court, that, under the appropriate charter provisions, they, as employees lower in rank to that of Adjuster, G153, as well as others in the civil service, are legally entitled to take a promotional examination to fill that position, and that the action of the Commission in ordering an open examination, under the circumstances here involved constituted an abuse of discretion.

The case was decided upon the petition of respondents and the answer and certain amendments to the answer. Based upon these pleadings, the trial court granted the motion of petitioners for judgment on the pleadings.

In support of the judgment the respondents first urge that the record shows that many of them entered the employ of the City and County of San Francisco under civil service prior to January 8, 1932, the effective date of the present charter, and that, under the old charter, the right to a promotional examination was secured to them by section 8, art. XIII, of that charter, and that section 142 of the new charter preserves this right. Section 142 of the new charter provides, in part, that: "The civil service rights, acquired by persons under the provisions of the charter superseded by this charter, shall continue under this charter."

The old charter (section 8, art. XIII) in reference to promotions provided: "The Commissioners shall provide for promotion in the classified service on the basis of ascertained merit and standing upon examination; and shall provide, wherever practicable, that vacancies shall be filled by promotion. All examinations for promotions shall be competitive among such members of the next lower rank, as established by the Commissioners, as desire to submit themselves, to such examinations."

The comparable provision of the new charter is section 146, which provides as follows: "Whenever it deems it to be practicable, the Commission shall provide for promotion in the service on the basis of such examinations and tests as the Commission may deem appropriate, and shall, in addition, give consideration to ascertained merit and records of city and county service of applicants. The Commission shall announce in the examination scope circular the next lower rank or ranks from which the promotion may be made. All promotions in the police and fire departments, respectively, shall be made from the next lower rank on the basis of examinations and tests, seniority of service and meritorious public service being considered."

[1, 2] Appellants urge that, if the old charter conferred greater rights than the new, section 142 of the new charter, supra, does not operate to preserve such an inchoate right as the right to a promotional examination, but only preserves vested or already acquired rights. We do not find it necessary to pass upon this point for the reason that we are of the opinion that, whether the old or new charter measures the rights of respondents under both provisions it is the duty of the Commission to hold promotional examinations when "practicable". While the language employed in the two sections is not identical, and, while the new charter expressly provides that, when the Commission deems it practicable, it shall provide for promotional examinations, whereas the old charter provided that "wherever practicable" such examination must be given, it seems quite clear that the two sections should be construed to mean substantially the same thing—that is, that under the old section, as under the new, the question as to whether a promotional examination is practicable, is confided to the limited discretion of the Commission. Sound principles of administrative law, as well as the provisions of the statute, compel the conclusion that it is only when it appears that such limited discretion has been abused that the courts are warranted in interfering.

[3] There can be but little doubt that, under the facts alleged in the petition and admitted by appellants, an abuse of discretion appears.

In 1932 the Commission established, in the Tax Collector's office, a class of employment designated as License Adjuster, Class G152. On March 23, 1932, the Commission, pursuant to an examination theretofore held, created an eligible list for that position. The names of seven of the eighteen respondents were on that list. On April 8, 1932, M. J. Lawley (who was first on that list with a grade of 100 per cent) and I. A. Richardson (who was second on that list with a grade of 98 per cent) were appointed from that list as License Adjusters. On October 3, 1934, two other appointments were made from the eligible list to that position—Charles A. Burgess and Eugene Sheehy—who had grades of 87½ per cent. These last two men were ranked as numbers 10 and 10½ on the eligible list, ranking below five of the petitioners on the eligible list. Why the appointments were made of people so low on the eligible list does not appear. At that time, Sheehy, as well as several of the respondents, were employed in the Tax Collector's office as General Clerk, Class B222.

On March 23, 1936, the eligible list for License Adjuster, Class G152, expired automatically. At that time all but five of the respondents were General Clerks, Class B222, in the Tax Collector's office. Many of them had been so employed for many years. Of the five who were not so employed on that date, one of them, P. G. Allen, first entered the employ of the city for the Tax Collector's office in 1915 as Deputy Tax Collector. Subsequently, his position was classified as that of General Clerk, while still later he was appointed as Teller. The four other respondents were appointed General Clerks, B222, subsequent to March 23, 1936. Several of the respondents, from time to time, had been assigned to the bureaus in the Tax Collector's office known as the Bureau of Delinquent Revenue and the Bureau of Licenses.

After the expiration of the eligible list for License Adjuster, G152, in March of 1936, nothing was done to create a new eligible list for that position. Prior to June 1, 1938, there existed a vacancy in the Tax Collector's office in the classified position of General Clerk, Class B222. This general clerkship carried a monthly salary of $200. Other general clerkships in the same class carried lower salaries, and many of these lower salaried clerkships were held by the respondents. Instead of transferring one of the petitioners who was already in Class B222 to the vacant higher paid clerkship of the same class, the Commission proceeded in a different manner. By resolution of June 1, 1938, it abolished the class of License Adjuster, G152, and created a new class—Adjuster, G153. It further provided that persons theretofore holding the positions in Class G152 should be entitled, without examination, to hold positions in the new class, G153. The only persons thus entitled to be appointed to the new class of Adjuster, G153, were Lawley, Burgess and Sheehy, heretofore mentioned. What had happened to Richardson, who had been appointed with Lawley in 1932 to the position of License Adjuster, G152, does not appear. Apparently, he was no longer employed in that position. Accordingly, Lawley, Burgess and Sheehy were automatically given positions in the new class, G153.

By the same resolution of June 1, 1938, the Commission created a new class—Senior Inspector of Licenses, Class G154, with the further provision that this class should be deemed promotional from the newly-created class, G153. The resolution also provided that the vacant position of General Clerk, B222, should be allocated to the newly-created class of Adjuster, G153. Thereafter, Lawley was given an emergency appointment to the newly-created position of Senior Inspector of Licenses, and one Connolly was given an emergency appointment to the newly-created position of Adjuster, G153 (which had formerly been classified as General Clerk, B222). Respondents allege on information and belief that Connolly had not theretofore taken any examination for any position falling within the classified civil service. This allegation is admitted in the answer.

On July 27, 1938, the Commission gave notice of an examination for the position of Senior Inspector of Licenses, Class G154, restricting the examination to the persons who had theretofore been appointed to the abolished position of License Adjuster, G152. By this limitation, the Commission restricted the field of those eligible to take that promotional examination to Lawley, Burgess and Sheehy. Stated another way, the Commission provided for a promotional examination to fill the position in Class G154, restricting the field of those eligible to take the promotional examination to three men.

Thereafter, on August 3, 1938, the Commission gave notice of an open, nonpromotional examination to create an eligible list for the other new class, Adjuster G153. It was further provided that the examination might be taken by persons possessing either of the following qualifications:

1. One year of first-class experience, within the past eight years, in the investigation and adjustment of accounts and the investigation of claims, assets and attachable property in connection with such accounts, or in general office procedure; or

2. Permanent employees of the Tax Collector's office falling within classes of General Clerk, General Clerk-Stenographer, or in the old class of Deputy.

The notice for this examination also provided that those falling within Class 2, supra, might receive a rating of not to exceed one hundred out of a total of one thousand points for ascertained merit in City and County service.

It was the action of the Commission in thus providing for an open nonpromotional examination for License Adjuster, G153, that led respondents to file an application for a writ of mandate to compel the Commission to make the examination promotional in character. It should be noted that respondents do not seek to invalidate the action of the Commission in declaring the examination for Class G154 promotional, nor its action in reclassifying the various positions. They do not charge that the Commission was without right to appoint Burgess and Sheehy to positions in Class G152 in 1934, although five of the respondents were higher on the eligible list than were the two men appointed. Their attack is upon the action of the Commission in making the examination for the new class, G153, open rather than promotional. The other matters enumerated above are set forth for whatever bearing they may have on the question as to whether the Commission abused its discretion in noticing an open examination for Class G153.

There seems to be no escape from the conclusion that the facts alleged in the petition and admitted in the answer demonstrate that the Commission abused the discretion conferred upon it by section 146 of the charter, supra, in noticing an open examination for the position in question. Although the Commission provided in the notice for the examination that persons who have had one year of first-class experience in general office procedure are qualified to take the examination, the Commission likewise determined that it was impracticable to provide a promotional examination when there are eighteen employees of the Tax Collector's office who have had experience in office work in that office for from "several years" to over twenty-three years. Several of these employees have had several years' experience in the Bureau of Delinquent Revenue and the Bureau of Licenses. Furthermore, seven of the eighteen were on the eligible list for the old position, G152, five of them with ratings higher than Burgess and Sheehy, who have been appointed to G153. That the duties of Class G153, here involved, are generally similar to that of old Class G152 is indicated by the fact that, in abolishing Class G152, the Commission provided that the three persons then occupying positions in Class G152 should automatically, without examination, hold positions in Class G153.

[4] The respondents also point out that the judgment here appealed from does not determine that the promotional examination must be limited to the eighteen General Clerks in the Tax Collector's office. The Commission, under the charter provision here involved, has wide discretionary powers in determining what groups shall be included within the class permitted to take a promotional examination, and what the qualifications of those desiring to take the examination shall be. If one year of first-class experience in general office procedure is a qualification for eligibility to the position of Adjuster, G153, there is a large number of persons in the civil service outside the Tax Collector's office earning less than the salary provided for Class G153 who are eligible for this examination. Even if it were impracticable to hold a promotional examination limited to the eighteen qualified employees of the Tax Collector's office, it is obviously not impracticable to hold such an examination among the large group of civil service employees with the requisite qualifications.

Another factor which tends to show an abuse of discretion is that the Commission has provided a promotional examination for Class G153 to Class G154, although, as described by the Commission, the distinction between the duties of those two classes is greater than between old Class G152 and new Class G153, and although there are but three persons eligible to take the promotional examination for Class G154.

[5-9] Upon the showing made by respondents in their petition, and the admissions made by appellants in their answer and amended answer, the trial court correctly held that respondents established a prima facie case of abuse of discretion. This placed on the Commission the burden and duty of bringing forth any explanation it might have by way of defense. The Commission has offered no reasonable explanation or justification for its actions in either its pleadings in the trial court or in its briefs filed in this court. It takes refuge in the proposition that local administrative boards should be permitted to operate with as little interference as possible from the judicial branch of the government. They cite cases for the rule that administrative action of local boards is beyond judicial control unless abuse of discretion is clearly shown. Maxwell v. Civil Service Commission, 169 Cal. 336, 146 P. 869; Pratt v. Rosenthal, 181 Cal. 158, 183 P. 542; Mann v. Tracy, 185 Cal. 272, 196 P. 484; Mitchell v. McKevitt, 128 Cal. App. 458, 17 P.2d 789. We may agree with these principles but still come to the conclusion that the Commission has abused its discretion in the instant case. The Commission has wide discretionary powers in many of its fields of operation. However, such Commissions have only such powers as are conferred upon them. When they exceed or abuse their powers it is not only within the power, but it is the duty of the judicial branch of the government to prevent such excess or abuse upon the petition of those adversely affected. Here the people of the City and County of San Francisco have seen fit to insert in section 146 of the charter, supra, a provision requiring the Commission "Whenever it deems it to be practicable" to give promotional and not open examinations. This provision embodies one of the fundamental concepts of a sound civil service system. All authorities agree that promotions are an essential of a sound civil service system. The purpose of civil service is twofold—to abolish the so-called spoils system, and to increase the efficiency of the service by assuring the employees of continuance in office regardless of what party may then be in power. Efficiency is secured by the knowledge on the part of the employee that promotion to higher positions when vacancies occur will be the reward of faithful and honest service. Provisions such as section 146 of the charter, that promotional examinations shall be held when practicable, are intended to promote efficiency among public employees. People v. Errant, 229 Ill. 56, 82 N.E. 271; Ptacek v. People, 194 Ill. 125, 62 N.E. 530. Its provisions are mandatory, and must be complied with.

[10, 11] Section 146 of the charter, supra, constitutes a limitation on the discretion of the Commission. Where it is practicable to hold a promotional examination, such examination must be given. In determining whether it is practicable to give such an examination the Commission has not an uncontrolled discretion. If such an examination is not to be given, a valid reason why not, must exist. When the Commission's action is challenged, and the petitioner produces a prima facie case that a promotional examination is practicable, the burden is on the Commission to justify its action.

There appears to be but little case law on the exact problem here presented. The diligence of counsel, and independent research by this court, have unearthed but two cases where the problem has been passed upon directly by the appellate courts in this country. Both of these cases are in accord with the views herein expressed—in fact, in some respects, they go beyond the holding in this opinion.

In People v. Errant, supra, the Supreme Court of Illinois was presented with the following facts: The Chicago Civil Service Commission proposed to hold an open competitive examination instead of a promotional one for the position of Assistant Superintendent of Streets. Those next lower in rank contended that, under the civil service act and rules adopted pursuant thereto, a promotional examination should be given. The civil service act there involved Laws Ill.1895, p. 87, § 9, provided that the Commission "shall provide, in all cases where it is practicable, that vacancies shall be filled by promotion". This is substantially the same language used in the old charter of San Francisco (sec. 8 of art. XIII, supra), and in section 146, supra, of the present charter. In interpreting the Illinois section the court stated (82 N.E. page 274): "The phrase in section 9 above quoted, 'in all cases where it is practicable,' adds but little to the meaning of the section, and takes little or nothing from it. If this phrase was eliminated entirely from the statute, it would mean substantially the same as it does with it in. The meaning in both cases is that the vacancies are to be filled by promotion. If this is not possible, the office is not to remain vacant and the wheels of government stop; but the place is to be filled in another way and the functions of the government go on. In the case before us the determination of appellees that it was not practicable to fill the place by promotion should not precede, but come after, a promotional examination, where it is their duty to hold such examination. There are, it is admitted, at least 15 ward superintendents who are ready and willing to take the promotional examination for the position to be filled. If the examination is held, and two or more ward superintendents qualify, then it will be practicable to appoint the one making the highest grade. Until such examination is held, and these persons given a chance to pass, the appellees cannot know whether it is practicable to fill the place from the ward superintendents. The only prayer of the petition is that appellees be required to hold such promotional examination. This, we think, it is their clear legal duty to do."

A similar conclusion was reached by the same court in Ptacek v. People, supra. That was a proceeding in quo warranto brought to test the legal right of Ptacek to hold the position of Assistant Superintendent of Police, an office to which he had been appointed after having participated in an open examination held by the Commission. It was contended that the examination had been improperly and unlawfully held in that it should have been a promotional and not an open examination. The civil service act in question contained the same clause as is quoted in the Errant case, supra. The court held that a promotional examination was required, although there were but five men eligible to take a promotional examination. In so holding, the court stated (194 Ill. page 132, 62 N.E. page 533): "We do not understand how the civil service commission could, under its rules, hold an original examination for the position of assistant superintendent of police unless it is shown in some way that the vacancy in that office could not be filled by promotion, and this, we think, the pleas wholly failed to do."

In the briefs of the parties to this appeal a decision of Honorable Emmet H. Wilson, judge of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, in the case of Crowe v. Board of Civil Service Commissioners, L.A.No.427,601, is quoted in full. That case involved the question as to whether an examination for City Treasurer should be open or promotional, under charter provisions similar to those involved in the two Illinois cases, supra. The Commission pleaded that it had conducted an investigation as to the qualifications of all the employees of the City Treasurer's office, and all other classifications in the civil service, after such investigation had found that it was not practicable to fill the office by promotion. Nevertheless, the court granted the petitioners a judgment on the pleadings. It held that the provisions of the charter in reference to promotional examinations were mandatory, and that, if there were qualified persons in the service eligible to take the examination, the Commission could only ascertain that it was impracticable to give a promotional examination after those eligible had been given such an examination.

[12] The reasoning of these three cases is conclusive here. Under the provisions of section 146 of the charter, supra, promotional examinations, except for those in the lowest ranks, are required to be held unless they are not "practicable". In determining that fact the Commission does not possess unlimited discretion. There are doubtless many situations where it would be impracticable to give a promotional examination, and where the Commission could determine that an open examination was proper. But the facts of the instant case demonstrate that this case does not fall within that category. Here the Commission has determined, by fixing the qualifications as a condition precedent for the taking of the examination, that the eighteen petitioners, as well as many others, are fully qualified to take the examination, and, if they pass, fully qualified to fill the position. If there are large numbers of persons in the service fully qualified to take the examination for the eligible list for the position in question, how can the Commission determine before it gives a promotional examination to those persons, that it is not "practicable" to give such an examination? Obviously, under such circumstances, to so determine is an abuse of the discretion vested in the Commission.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

RHODEHAMEL v. CIVIL SERVICE BOARD OF CITY OF OAKLAND et al.*

Civ. 11221.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 21, 1941.

1. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

A city charter provision requiring civil service board to provide for promotion in the classified service on basis of ascertained merit, seniority in service, and standing on competitive examination, and where practicable, that vacancies shall be filled by promotion from among such members of the next lower rank established by the board as submit themselves for promotional examinations is mandatory.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

Under city charter provision requiring civil service board to provide in all cases where "practicable" that vacancy shall be filled by promotion from among such members of next lower rank established by board as submit themselves for examination, board in passing on question whether a promotional or an open examination shall be given does not possess an uncontrolled discretion, but, if it is "practicable" to give a promotional examination, board must give such examination regardless of its opinion as to relative merits of the two types of examinations.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Practicable".

3. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

If there are persons in the classified service who by reason of their position in the service possess the qualifications fixed by city civil service board as a prerequisite to take examination, board may properly ascertain that it is "impracticable" to give a promotional examination only after the persons eligible have been given a promotional examination.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Impracticable".

4. Municipal corporations ⇐216(1)

Local boards, such as city civil service boards have only such powers as the people see fit to confer on them, and, if such a board exceeds or abuses its powers, the courts are empowered to prevent such excess or abuse on petition of one adversely affected.

5. Mandamus ⇐168(4)

In mandamus proceeding to compel civil service board to hold a promotional examination to obtain an eligible list for position of senior account clerk and to terminate proceedings for an open examination, evidence of existence of classified positions known as "intermediate account clerk" and "senior account clerk," and as to respective duties of the positions, established a prima facie case that board abused its discretion in determining that a promotional examination was not practicable under city charter provision requiring such examinations to fill vacancies where practicable.

* Subsequent opinion 117 P.2d 349.

6. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

The question whether better employees will be secured by an open or a promotional examination is one of "legislative policy" and not of "administrative" or "judicial" policy, which was settled by city charter provision requiring civil service board to provide in all cases, where practicable, that vacancies be filled by promotion from among such members of next lower rank established by board as submit themselves for promotional examination, and neither the board nor District Court of Appeal, whatever its opinion as to merits of that policy, can substitute its opinion for that of the people as set forth in the charter.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Administrative Policy", "Judicial Policy", and "Legislative Policy".

7. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

Under city charter provision requiring civil service board to provide, where "practicable", that vacancies should be filled by promotional examinations from next lower rank established by board, it was no proper ground for holding an open instead of a promotional examination for position of senior account clerk on theory that the intermediate account clerks, who would be eligible to take such examination, would not be eligible to fill positions above that of senior account clerk.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Practicable".

8. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

A civil service board may not deny an employee the right to advance one rank by means of a promotional examination because he will not be able to be promoted to a still higher rank.

9. Mandamus ⇐168(4)

Evidence held to establish that duties of senior account clerk, as related to the lower position of intermediate account clerk, were such that the superior position was promotional from the inferior one under city charter provision requiring civil service board to provide, where "practicable", that vacancy shall be filled by promotional examination from members of next lower rank established by board.

10. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

City civil service board cannot substitute its present opinion on issue whether one position is promotional from another position in the classified service in place of the board's prior official description of the duties of the two positions, without any prior action in changing the description of those duties, under city charter provision requiring board, where practicable, to fill all vacancies by promotional examinations.

11. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

In order that one position should be "promotional" from another within city charter provision requiring that, where practicable, vacancy shall be filled by a promotional examination, it is not required that the duties of the two positions be identical, but real question is whether duties of the inferior position are such that they reasonably prepare employee for the superior position.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Promotional Position".

12. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

The fact that there were only eight intermediate account clerks and eight senior account clerks in classified service furnished no ground for holding an open examination to obtain an eligible list for position of senior account clerk instead of holding a promotional examination, which would have been limited to the intermediate account clerks under charter provision requiring civil service board to provide in all cases where "practicable" for filling of vacancies by promotional examinations from next lower rank established by the board, where, when board determined to give open examination, there was but one vacancy in the position of senior account clerk.

13. Municipal corporations ⇐217(5)

The fact that, when a promotional examination is held, none of those in the immediate rank below taking the examination will pass it, conclusively demonstrates that a promotional examination is not "practicable" within city charter provision requiring civil service board to provide, in all cases where "practicable", that vacancy shall be filled by a promotional examination from among members of next lower rank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Mandamus proceeding by Harry Rhodehamel against the Civil Service Board of the City of Oakland and others, to compel the board to hold a promotional examination to obtain an eligible list for the position of senior account clerk and to terminate the proceedings for an open examination. From a judgment denying his application for a writ of mandate, the petitioner appeals.

Reversed.

J. Paul St. Sure, of Oakland, for appellant.

F. B. Fernhoff, City Atty., and John W. Collier, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondents.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Petitioner appeals from a judgment denying his application for a writ of mandate to compel the civil service board of the City of Oakland to hold a promotional examination to obtain an eligible list for the position of senior account clerk, and to terminate proceedings for an open examination, as announced by the board. Petitioner is an employee in the classified civil service of the city, holding the position of intermediate account clerk. He filed the petition as such employee, and as a resident, taxpayer and elector of the city, and also as a member and on behalf of all members of the Oakland Municipal Civil Service Association.

The Oakland Charter, section 77, provides as follows: "The board shall provide for promotion in the classified service on the basis of ascertained merit, seniority in service, and standing upon competitive examination, and shall provide, in all cases where practicable, that vacancies shall be filled by promotion from among such members of the next lower rank established by the board as submit themselves for such examination for promotion. The board shall certify to the appointing power the names of not more than three applicants having the highest rating for each promotion." (Italics ours.)

It is urged by appellant that, under this charter provision, if it is practicable to give a promotional examination the board has no discretion, but must give such promotional examination; that under the facts of this case it amounted to an abuse of whatever discretion is vested in the board to order an open examination.

[1-3] The problem involved in this case is similar to that presented in Allen v. McKinley, Cal.App., 109 P.2d 429. The charter provisions involved in the two cases are substantially similar. What was said in that case concerning the proper interpretation of such a charter provision need not be repeated in this opinion. Upon the authority of, and for the reasons stated in, Allen v. McKinley, supra, we hold:

1. That such charter provisions are mandatory;

2. That in passing on the question as to whether a promotional or an open examination shall be given the board does not possess an uncontrolled discretion—that if it is practicable to give a promotional examination the board must give such examination regardless of what its opinion may be as to the relative merits of an open or promotional examination;

3. That if there are persons in the service who, by reason of their position in the service, possess the qualifications fixed by the board as a prerequisite to take the examination, the board may properly ascertain that it is impracticable to give a promotional examination only after those eligible have been given a promotional examination.

[4] As in Allen v. McKinley, supra, the board argues that whether it is "practicable" to fill a vacancy by promotion is confided to the discretion of the board, and that such discretion is not subject to judicial control. They cite the same cases that were cited by the San Francisco Civil Service Commission in Allen v. McKinley, supra, to the effect that local administrative boards should be permitted to operate with as little interference as possible from the judicial branch of the government. However, as was pointed out in the Allen v. McKinley opinion, supra, local boards such as the one here involved have only such powers as the people see fit to confer upon them. If such local boards exceed or abuse their powers the courts are empowered to prevent such excess or abuse upon the petition of one adversely affected.

Applying these principles to the facts here involved, and keeping in mind the fact that the trial court in the instant case has decided all controverted questions of fact in favor of the board, we have no hesitancy in stating that the record herein demonstrates, as a matter of law, that the board, in a legal sense, abused the limited discretion confided to

[5] The evidence shows that pursuant to the powers conferred upon the board it has classified all positions subject to civil service. Among the classified positions is one known as intermediate account clerk, and another as senior account clerk. On June 2, 1938, one vacancy occurred in the position of senior account clerk. There was no existing eligible list from which that position could be filled. The board, after several meetings, at which the question as to whether the examination should be open or promotional was discussed, decided to hold an open examination on the theory that there was no rank, for promotional purposes, next lower to the position of senior account clerk. Admittedly, all those holding the position of intermediate account clerk, as well as many others in the civil service, would be eligible to take the examination for senior account clerk.

There are various factors which demonstrate that the board abused the limited discretion vested in it. In the first place, the title "intermediate account clerk" tends to indicate that such position is of the same type, but lower in rank, to that of "senior account clerk". In the second place, evidence shows that each position has three salaries attached to it. For the position of intermediate account clerk these salaries are $140, $150 and $160 a month, depending upon merit and length of service. For the position of senior account clerk the three salaries are $160, $170 and $185 per month. This again tends to show that one position is the next advanced position from the other.

In the third place, the evidence shows that, in addition to classifying the positions, the board has officially described the two positions. Thus, the two positions have been described officially by the board as follows:

"Intermediate Account Clerk:

"Under direction, to do clerical work of average difficulty involved in the keeping and certifying of financial and other office records, and the handling of office routine; to interview callers; and to do other work as required.

"Senior Account Clerk:

"Under direction, to do difficult clerical work involved in auditing, keeping, and certifying financial records; and to do other work as required."

The "typical duties" officially described by the board are quite lengthy, and no useful purpose would be served by setting them forth in this opinion. Suffice it to say that an examination of such duties shows that they are quite similar, the differences being such as would be anticipated by reason of the higher salary of the superior position. This same conclusion follows from a consideration of the minimum qualifications officially fixed by the board for each position. They are as follows:

"Intermediate Account Clerk:

"Either (1) education equivalent to that represented by completion of the twelfth grade, and two years of clerical or other office experience, or (2) some other combination of education and clerical experience of equal or greater value; good knowledge of modern office methods and ability to operate modern office appliances; ability to understand and carry out oral and written directions; arithmetical aptitude; accuracy in computing and posting figures; resourcefulness; accuracy; good penmanship; orderliness; integrity; good address; and good judgment.

"Senior Account Clerk:

"Either (1) education equivalent to that represented by completion of the twelfth grade, including a standard course in bookkeeping and three years' experience as a bookkeeper, or (2) some other combination of education and experience of equal or greater value; knowledge of double and single entry bookkeeping and the keeping of financial accounts and records; intimate knowledge of accepted accounting principles and methods; skill in the operation of computing machines and other office appliances; accuracy in computing and posting figures; good penmanship; integrity; orderliness; and good business judgment."

In the fourth place, the evidence shows that previously the board had given a promotional examination for the position of assistant supervising officer, a position more advanced and carrying a higher salary than senior account clerk, and that intermediate account clerks were permitted to take that promotional examination.

From this evidence there can be no doubt that appellant presented to the trial court a prima facie case of abuse of discretion. From this evidence but one conclusion can be reached, namely, that the positions of intermediate account clerk and senior account clerk present a plain instance of positions in a regular line of promotional progression, and that before an open examination may be given to create an eligible list for the superior position, under section 77 of the charter, supra, those in the next lower rank are first entitled to take a promotional examination.

[6] In support of its determination that a promotional examination was not "practicable", and in an attempt to meet the prima facie case of appellant, the board offered the testimony of T. G. Stahlberg, secretary and chief examiner of the board, and of Harold C. Holmes, Jr., president of the board. They both frankly admitted that two of the factors that motivated the board in its determination, were that, in the opinion of the board, a better man would be secured by an open examination than would be secured by a promotional examination because a larger group would take the examination; and that, if the position of intermediate account clerk were established as the position next lower in rank to that of senior account clerk, there were still higher positions above senior account clerk for which such intermediate clerks would not be eligible. In the opinion of the board, therefore, intermediate account clerks should not be permitted to take a promotional examination for senior account clerk because that would be as high as they could go. This second factor was frequently referred to by both witnesses and obviously was one of the major factors that led the board to determine to give an open examination. At the time of the oral argument counsel for respondents conceded that neither, or both, of these factors "standing alone" constitute a lawful justification for the action of the board.

This concession is in accordance with the law. The question as to whether better employees will be secured by open or promotional examinations is one of policy. The people of the City of Oakland have settled that question of policy and have taken its determination from the board by section 77 of the charter, supra. They have determined, as a matter of policy, that, in the long run, better employees will be secured, and higher efficiency promoted, by a system of promotional examinations. That is a question of legislative and not administrative or judicial policy. Neither the board nor this court, whatever its opinion as to the merits of that policy may be, is empowered to substitute its opinion for that of the people as set forth in the charter.

[7, 8] The second reason—that intermediate account clerks could not take promotional examinations for positions higher than that of senior account clerk—obviously, should not have been considered by the board. If a civil service board may deny an employee the right to advance one rank by means of a promotional examination because he will not be able to be promoted to a still higher rank, it can deny the right to all promotional examinations. Obviously, only a very few are qualified for the highest positions, but that is no reason for denying the employee the opportunity to rise as far as his ability and training will permit him. It is obvious that these two factors, therefore, cannot be relied upon as a lawful justification for the action of the board.

[9-11] Stahlberg and Holmes also testified that in their opinion the duties of the two positions were such that one was not promotional from the other. In fact, in their answer in the trial court the respondents pleaded that there is no position in the classified service which affords sufficient training to make the position of senior account clerk promotional from a lower rank. This contention, if sustained, would mean that the names given to the positions of intermediate and senior account clerks were misnomers. It would also mean that the board would be justified in substituting its present opinion in place of the description of the duties of the two positions as officially set forth by the board itself without any action by the board in changing the description of those duties. We think the evidence demonstrates that the duties are such that the superior position is promotional from the inferior one, and that the "opinion" of the secretary and president finds no support in the record. It must be remembered that for one position to be promotional from the other it is not required that the duties of the two be identical.

The real question is whether the duties of the inferior position are such that they reasonably prepare the employee for the superior position. On that question the evidence is clear and uncontradicted. The duties of intermediate account clerk are so related to those of senior account clerk, as those duties are officially described by the board, that the former is clearly preparatory for the latter.

[12, 13] The only other reason given by respondents to support the judgment, is that the board considered the fact that, if the examination were limited to intermediate account clerks, there was a possibility of not obtaining an eligible list large enough to fill all possible vacancies which might occur in the position of senior account clerk during the two years that such eligible list would remain in effect. There were eight intermediate account clerks, and eight senior account clerks in the service during the times here involved. At the time the board determined to give an open examination there was one vacancy in the position of senior account clerk. The exact number of vacancies that would occur could not be fixed by the witnesses, but one of them stated that perhaps there would be three or four during the two-year period. It is conceivable, of course, that if all eight intermediate account clerks took a promotional examination, all eight would pass. If so, for all practicable purposes, the number on the list would be far in excess of the anticipated number of vacancies. It may be that if a promotional examination is held, none of the intermediate account clerks will pass it. If so, that would conclusively demonstrate that a promotional examination is not "practicable", and that an open one is required. But, until the promotional examination is given, it rests in mere guess or conjecture as to the number that will pass it.

The appellant having presented a prima facie case that a promotional examination is practicable, and the board having failed to offer a lawful reason why such an examination should not be held, it must be held that, as a matter of law, an abuse of discretion has been shown.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

SCHWEITZER v. BANK OF AMERICA N. T. & S. A.

Civ. 12783.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

1. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

Where a check is delivered to an impostor as payee, and drawer believes that impostor is the person on whose indorsement it will be paid, the indorsement by impostor in the name which he is using to impersonate another is not a "forgery."

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Forgery".

2. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

Where a check is delivered to an impostor as payee and drawer believes that impostor is person on whose indorsement it will be paid, drawee bank which pays check on indorsement of impostor is not liable.

3. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

Where a check is delivered to an impostor as payee, and drawer believes that impostor is the person on whose indorsement it will be paid, the fact that another person might bear the same name as that assumed by impostor and might have some contractual relationships with impostor does not subject to a loss the drawee bank when it has paid the check to impostor.

4. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

The general rule is that the true owner and payee of a check has an action against drawee bank for conversion of a check paid on a forged or unauthorized indorsement.

5. Principal and agent ⇐163(1)

A "ratification" can occur only by approving the act of the agent after the agent performs openly on behalf of his principal and not for himself. Civ.Code, § 2312.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ratification".

6. Principal and agent ⇐163(1)

"Ratification" is the subsequent adoption by one claiming the benefits of an act which, without authority, another has voluntarily done while ostensibly acting as agent of him who affirms the act and who had the power to confer authority. Civ.Code, § 2312.

7. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

The "payee" of a check is the individual who is intended by the drawer to be the recipient of the money.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Payee".

8. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

A person though bearing name of payee of check, if not the person intended by drawer as payee, has no title to the check and cannot indorse it or transfer title thereto.

9. Bills and notes ⇐6, 32

Any negotiable instrument not payable to bearer must be payable to a determinate person or persons.

10. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

When maker intends a particular person to be the payee of negotiable instrument, such person, though designated by a fictitious name and even though maker was induced by deceit of such person to designate him as payee is, nevertheless, the actual "payee" and has authority to indorse the instrument.

11. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

Where E owned scrap iron stored in yard of plaintiff who had general authority from E to sell the iron, and plaintiff directed G to sell the iron and collect proceeds, and thereafter G presented himself with loads of scrap iron at foundry to which he made sales, representing himself to be E and owner of iron, relying on which representations foundry drew several checks on defendant bank payable to E and delivered them to G, who indorsed them in the name of E without her knowledge, E was neither "payee" nor "owner" of the checks and never had title which could be assigned to plaintiff, and G's indorsement was not a "forgery", since he was payee intended by drawer.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Owner".

12. Principal and agent ⇐164(1)

Where buyer of scrap iron was induced by seller's fraud to draw checks to name of actual owner, whose name and identity were fraudulently assumed by seller whom buyer believed to be the owner and who was payee intended by buyer, the real owner or her assignee by filing of assignee's suit against drawee bank for conversion of the checks, did not "ratify" the delivery of checks to the seller, since seller did not pretend to act on behalf of real owner or of any other person, but solely on his own behalf. Civ.Code, § 2312.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ratify".

13. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

The rule that where a check is delivered to an impostor as payee, and drawer believes that impostor is person on whose indorsement check will be paid, impostor's indorsement in the name which he is using to impersonate another is not a forgery does not apply only as between drawer and drawee, but applies as to persons impersonated as well.

14. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

Where check is delivered to impostor as payee, and drawer believes that impostor is person on whose indorsement it will be paid, drawer is bound by transaction between drawee bank and payee, because when bank cashes check for impostor it is merely carrying out drawer's intention that proceeds be received by impostor.

15. Trover and conversion ⇐16

In action of conversion, the gist of right of recovery is derived from ownership with right of possession, or from actual possession at time of alleged conversion.

16. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

Where E owned scrap iron stored in yard of plaintiff who had general authority to sell the iron and receive proceeds, pursuant to which plaintiff directed G to sell the iron and collect proceeds, and thereafter G, fraudulently assuming to be E and owner of the iron, sold it to foundry and received checks payable to E which he indorsed without knowledge of E, E's ownership of the iron did not authorize plaintiff, as E's assignee, to recover in action against drawee bank as for conversion of the checks, since plaintiff could not prove ownership or right of possession of checks as against bank.

17. Judgment ⇐249

Where an action in assumpsit would not lie, judgment for plaintiff could not be supported by count for moneys had and received.

18. Banks and banking ⇐148(2)

Where agent, having general authority from owner to sell scrap iron, directed G to sell iron and collect proceeds, and G thereafter sold iron to foundry, fraudulently representing himself to be the owner, and received checks drawn in name of owner which he indorsed and thereby obtained proceeds without owner's knowledge after drawee bank had telephoned foundry and was assured, from description given by bank, that payee named in check was identical person intended, fact that over a month previously owner's agent had informed bank's manager that owner of iron was a woman for whom he was acting as agent did not "estop" bank from pleading defense of impersonation against action for conversion of checks brought by agent as assignee.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estop".

19. Banks and banking ⇐154(5)

In action by assignee of owner of scrap iron against drawee bank for conversion of checks given by buyer of iron to seller who fraudulently represented himself to be owner, in which complaint alleged plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of checks, but answer denied such allegations, issue of fact was created, and it was not necessary that answer allege affirmatively the defense of impersonation.

20. Banks and banking ⇐154(5)

In action by assignee of owner of scrap iron against drawee bank for conversion of checks received by impostor who fraudulently sold iron and received checks from buyer payable to true owner, in which all facts comprising basis of alleged estoppel were received in evidence in support of plaintiff's claim of ownership of checks and on contention that impostor had no authority to indorse checks, defendant was not required by its pleadings to anticipate such other contentions, not disclosed by complaint, as plaintiff might seek to rely on.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Roy V. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Ray Schweitzer against the Bank of America N. T. & S. A. and another to recover damages for alleged conversion of checks. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals.

Reversed, with directions to enter judgment for named defendant.

Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, and Edmund Nelson and G. L. Berrey, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. H. Sims and M. H. Wallbert, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff as assignee of one E. Anderson sued to recover damages from appellant bank for the alleged conversion of sixteen checks. The complaint contains thirty-three counts, sixteen of which allege conversion as a result of unauthorized endorsements, count 17 is for money had and received, while the remaining sixteen counts allege conversion by means of forgeries of one Myer Glazer, a codefendant. Defendant bank has appealed from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff for the face value of all of the checks.

It appears that a woman whose name is E. Anderson was the owner of a supply of scrap iron stored in the yard of plaintiff, who was a scrap iron dealer. Plaintiff had general authority from Mrs. Anderson to sell the iron and to receive the proceeds. Pursuant to such instructions plaintiff directed Glazer to remove the iron, sell it and to collect the proceeds of such sales. Glazer thereafter presented himself on a series of occasions with loads of scrap iron at the offices of the Ace Foundry Company, to which he made sales. At no time did he disclose that he was acting as the agent of Mrs. Anderson, but assumed the role of owner in making each sale and at all times represented himself as "E. Anderson". Relying upon Glazer's representations that he was the owner of the iron, the foundry company drew its several checks upon appellant payable to "E. Anderson" and delivered them to Glazer. At the time of no one of the sixteen purchases made by the foundry company from Glazer did the company gain any knowledge that Glazer was sailing under false colors in calling himself "Anderson". All of the checks were endorsed "E. Anderson" by the hand of Glazer without any knowledge of Mrs. Anderson, whose claim is represented by the plaintiff.

When Glazer presented the first check to the bank to be cashed, for information as to his identity the bank telephoned the office of the foundry company and was then assured from the description reported by the bank that the payee named in the check was the identical person at that time in the office of the bank demanding payment, and that the check had been regularly issued by the foundry company. Subsequently the remainder of the checks were cashed by the bank's paying the money directly to Glazer or by payment through the clearing house to the bank at which he had made deposits. Having ascertained that her scrap iron had

The primary contention made by appellant is that Glazer was an impostor using the name of "E. Anderson" to effectuate his transactions; that he was actually the payee intended by the foundry company in each of the checks issued in that name and that therefore Mrs. Anderson was never intended to be the payee and consequently had no interest in the checks as against the bank or as against the foundry.

[1-3] The impostor rule as applied to negotiable instruments is understood throughout the states of the Union. The weight of decision in the United States and the doctrine which is followed in California is that where a check is delivered to an impostor as payee and the drawer believes that the impostor is the person upon whose endorsement it will be paid, the endorsement by such impostor in the name which he is using to impersonate another is not a forgery. The reason for the rule is that the drawer intended the check to be endorsed by the identical person to whom it was delivered. Under such circumstances the drawee bank is to be protected when it has paid the check upon such endorsement. Ryan v. Bank of Italy, 106 Cal.App. 690, 289 P. 863; Security-First National Bank v. United States, 9 Cir., 103 F.2d 188; United States v. National Exchange Bank, C.C., 45 F. 163; Sherman v. Corn Exchange Bank, 91 App.Div. 84, 86 N.Y.S. 341; Cohen v. Lincoln Savings Bank of Brooklyn, 275 N.Y. 399, 10 N.E.2d 457, 112 A.L.R. 1424. Also, see, 22 A.L.R. 1228; 52 A.L.R. 1326 and 112 A.L.R. 1435. The soundness of the rule obtains in the fact that the money has actually been paid to the person for whom it was really intended. Because another person might bear the very name assumed by the impostor and might have some contractual relationships with the impostor does not subject to a loss the drawee bank when it has paid the check to the person intended as the payee. Merely because a person may be designated by his name for ordinary practical purposes, his name does not become a more certain or accurate means of identification than his own visible presence with its distinct features. If a buyer is deceived as to the true name of the individual with whom he deals, but at the same time he intends to purchase from the man who commits the deception, he there identifies the seller by sight and hearing. If he thinks the seller's name is X and draws a check in his favor intending to designate him as the person to whom he desires to pay his money, and delivers the check to X, the drawee bank, in paying the proceeds of the check to X carries out the purpose of the drawer. Cohen v. Lincoln Savings Bank of Brooklyn, supra. This is exactly what occurred when the foundry company delivered its check to Glazer believing him to be E. Anderson. Moreover, there is no evidence that the foundry company had any knowledge that "E. Anderson" was the name of a woman who owned iron which had been taken from plaintiff's yard to be sold. Glazer might have assumed the name of Marco Polo with the same results to the bank.

While conceding the virtue of the impostor rule, plaintiff insists that its application should be limited solely to controversies between the drawer and the drawee of a check. Ubowich v. Northern Trust Co., 281 Ill.App. 109. But in that case plaintiff sued both the collecting and drawee banks for the conversion of a check payable to plaintiff. That check had been drawn by the county clerk to the order of plaintiff in payment of his distributive share of an estate. In some mysterious manner the check found its way into the hands of a stranger to the estate, was deposited with the collecting bank and was paid by the drawee bank upon a forged endorsement. Judgment was entered against the collecting bank only. The comments of the court in that case with respect to the impostor doctrine, which are here relied upon by plaintiff, are clearly dictum, for at page 119 of the decision, 281 Ill.App., the court states that "there is absolutely no evidence that the county treasurer delivered the check to an impostor with the intention that the impostor should receive the proceeds of the check, or even that the person who received it indorsed it or banked it".

[4] The general rule is that the true owner and payee of a check has an action against the drawee bank for the conversion of a check which was paid upon a forged or unauthorized endorsement. But this rule is to be limited by the very authorities which support it. Spaulding v. First Nat'l Bank, 210 App.Div. 216, 205 N.Y.S. 492; Graves v. American Exchange Bank, 17 N.Y. 205; Szwento v. Manhattan Sav. Institution, 178 App.Div. 57, 164 N.Y.S. 498; Byrne v. Dennis, 303 Pa. 72, 154 A.

123; Kentucky, etc., Bank v. Dunavan, 205 Ky. 801, 266 S.W. 667; Bentley, etc., Co. v. La Salle Street Bank, 197 Ill.App. 322; State v. First Nat'l Bank, 38 N.M. 225, 30 P.2d 728, and others. In none of the cited cases did the drawer of the check deliver it to an impostor representing himself to be the true payee with the intention that the impostor receive the proceeds of the check, as was the case when the foundry delivered the check to Glazer. In each of those cases the situation involved a check payable to plaintiff, who was either known to or identified by the drawer, with the intention that the payee named in the check should receive its proceeds. In each instance the drawee bank paid the check upon the forged endorsement of a stranger or upon the unauthorized endorsement of an agent of the payee. In some cases the wrongdoer who cashed the check was the payee's agent but without authority to cash the check; in other cases the wrongdoer represented himself as the agent of the payee although wholly unauthorized so to do. Moreover the facts which constitute the bases of the last-mentioned authorities are distinguished from the facts in the case at bar in that in each of those cases the drawer had plaintiff and not some other person in mind when the check was drawn. In other words it was intended by the drawer that the plaintiff should receive the proceeds of the check.

[5, 6] In those cases where the agent or pretending agent obtained the check before it was actually delivered to the plaintiff, delivery to the plaintiff was established on the theory that, in filing suit, plaintiff ratified delivery to such agent as having been done on behalf of plaintiff. But a ratification can occur only by approving the act of the agent after the agent performs openly on behalf of his principal and not for himself. It is the subsequent adoption by one claiming benefits of an act which, without authority, another has voluntarily done while ostensibly acting as agent of him who affirms the act and who had the power to confer authority. Civ.Code, sec. 2312; Watkins v. Clemmer, 129 Cal.App. 567, 19 P.2d 303; Restatement of the Law of Agency, secs. 82, 83, 84 and 85. The record definitely establishes that it was not the intention of the foundry company, in issuing any check, that Mrs. Anderson should receive its proceeds.

[7-10] The payee of a check is the individual who is intended by the drawer to be the recipient of the money. Even though another person bear the same name, if he be not the one intended by the drawer to receive the money, he has no right or title to the check and he cannot endorse it or transfer the title of it. Cohen v. Lincoln Sav. Bank of Brooklyn, supra; Hartford Accident, etc., Co. v. Middletown Nat. Bank, 126 Conn. 179, 10 A.2d 604. Any negotiable instrument not payable to bearer must be payable to a determinate person or persons. When the maker intends a particular person to be the payee, then such person, although designated by a fictitious name, and even though the maker was induced by the deceit of such person to designate him as payee, still such deceiver is the actual payee and has the authority to endorse the instrument. Halsey v. Bank of New York & Trust Co., 270 N.Y. 134, 200 N.E. 671.

[11] It follows that Mrs. E. Anderson was neither the payee nor the owner of the check, and never had a title which could be transferred to plaintiff. Glazer's endorsement was not a forgery, for he was the payee intended by the drawer. Ryan v. Bank of Italy, supra; Cohen v. Lincoln Savings Bank of Brooklyn, supra.

[12] It cannot be said that by filing suit either plaintiff or his assignor ratified the delivery of the checks to Glazer. That gentleman did not pretend to act on behalf of Mrs. Anderson or of any other person, but in each instance he dealt with the foundry company solely on his own behalf. There was, therefore, nothing for Mrs. Anderson or the plaintiff to ratify, and under such circumstances there can be no ratification. Watkins v. Clemmer, supra. While it is true that the court made a finding that Glazer was the agent of Anderson, yet in no sense does this improve her status with respect to the bank. No finding was made that Glazer received the checks as the agent of Anderson and if there had been such a finding it would be without support in the evidence.

[13, 14] Contrary to plaintiff's contention it cannot be said that the impersonation doctrine applies only as between the drawer and drawee. Whatever rights Mrs. Anderson might have acquired in the checks must necessarily have been derived from the drawer's intention to pay the money to her. Consequently, if the foundry was bound by its delivery of the checks to Glazer, the impostor who cashed them, there is no logical basis upon which Mrs. Anderson, a total stranger to both the foundry and the bank, can recover against the latter. The foundry company is bound by the transaction between the bank and Glazer, because when the bank cashed the check for the impostor it was merely carrying out the intention of the foundry that the proceeds were to be received by Glazer. Because Mrs. Anderson has the same name as that used by Glazer in effecting his sales and collections does not improve her situation as against the bank. The check was intended for the party who called at the foundry and made his sale. While a name may serve to identify an individual, yet if the check was received by the identical person to whom the drawer intended to deliver it, and was by that person endorsed with the name to which it was made payable, the bank owed no further obligation with reference to it. Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co. v. Middletown Nat. Bank, supra, 10 A.2d at page 608.

[15-17] From the foregoing it is clear that plaintiff is in no position to recover in an action for conversion. In such actions the gist of the right of recovery is derived from ownership with the right of possession, or from actual possession at the time of the alleged conversion. McCoy v. Northwestern C. & S. Co., 3 Cal.App.2d 534, 39 P.2d 864; General Motors A. Corp. v. Dallas, 198 Cal. 365, 245 P. 184. While plaintiff proved ownership of the scrap iron in Mrs. Anderson, yet he failed to prove ownership or possession or the right of possession of the checks as against the bank. Merely because Glazer appropriated the iron and delivered it to an unsuspecting person representing himself to be its owner, and assuming a fictitious name withal, does not give rise to a cause of action in favor of Mrs. Anderson against the bank which paid the money, as directed by its depositor, to an impostor. Since under the circumstances an action in assumpsit will not lie (First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U.S. 343, 24 L.Ed. 229) the judgment rendered cannot be supported by the count for moneys had and received.

[18] Plaintiff contends further that defendant is estopped to plead the defense of impersonation. This contention is based upon the fact that more than a month prior to the first call of Glazer plaintiff visited the bank and undertook to cash a check drawn by the Ace Foundry Company in favor of E. Anderson. On that occasion the teller declined to cash the check and referred plaintiff to the manager. At that time plaintiff informed the manager that "E. Anderson" was a woman for whom plaintiff was agent. But there is no evidence that the branch manager's attention was directed to the fact that the Ace Foundry Company was the drawer of the check. The conversation related solely to the identity of the payee of that particular check. There is nothing in the name "Anderson" or in the letter "E" to make them severally or jointly a warning against impostors. Both are quite commonly found on books of account and in directories. There was therefore nothing in the conversation between plaintiff and the bank manager to put appellant upon notice that subsequent checks drawn against the account of the Ace Foundry Company payable to E. Anderson would be payable only to a woman. Moreover, the bank was actually informed by the foundry company, at the time of Mr. Glazer's first call, that "E. Anderson" was a man of Glazer's description. In view of the knowledge imparted to the bank when Glazer presented his first check, and while he was in the bank's office, it must be held that any prior information imparted to the bank that a woman by the name of E. Anderson dwelled among mortals would not create an estoppel.

[19, 20] Plaintiff's contention that the answer was so defective that it failed to raise any issue, in that it failed to allege impersonation affirmatively, is untenable. The complaint alleged plaintiff's ownership of, and the right of possession to, the checks. The answer denied these allegations. This created an issue of fact, and it was not necessary to allege affirmatively the defense of impersonation. Also since all the facts comprising the basis of the estoppel were received in evidence, in support of plaintiff's claim of ownership, and upon his contention that Glazer had no authority to endorse the checks, defendant was not required in its pleadings to "anticipate such other contentions as the plaintiff may seek to rely upon" when plaintiff's main reliance has failed her. This is especially true where such other contentions do not appear upon the face of the complaint. Kenny v. Christianson, 200 Cal. 419, 424, 253 P. 715, 717, 50 A.L.R. 1297.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of appellant.

CAMDEN FIRE INS. ASS'N v. JOHNSON, State Treasurer.

Civ. 6452.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

1. Constitutional law ⇐70(1)

Where the object and intent of statute is plain, courts cannot by interpretation add to or detract therefrom.

2. Taxation ⇐840, 844

Under statutory and constitutional provisions for 15 per cent. penalty tax on an insurance company which fails to pay gross premium tax within time and manner specified, where insurance company six days before date on which penalty for delinquency was to be assessed, mailed check for the amount of tax to State Treasurer, who did not receive the check until after date on which tax became delinquent, penalty became part of tax and court could not relieve insurance company from penalty imposed for delay in payment of tax. Pol.Code, § 3668b; Const. art. 13, § 14.

3. Taxation ⇐844

In absence of statutory authorization, courts have no power to relieve delinquent taxpayers from penalties incurred by violations of statutes providing for penalties.

4. Statutes ⇐245

Tax laws are to be construed most strictly against the government and most favorably to the taxpayer.

5. Taxation ⇐844

A person claiming relief from tax penalties clearly imposed by law must point to clear warrant of law to support his claim and he is entitled to no special privilege over other taxpayers which is not definitely established by law.

6. Taxation ⇐840, 844

The penalty assessed for the delinquency in the payment of a gross premium tax imposed upon an insurance company becomes a part of the tax and commands all the support given to a tax regularly levied for the support of the government and cannot be forgiven for mistake whether excusable or not. Pol.Code, § 3668b.

7. Taxation ⇐140, 387

The gross premium tax imposed upon insurance companies is an "indirect tax" levied as ordinary property taxes are levied with a view to determine the value of the thing taxed and to make it pay its proportion of taxes for the support of the government and the method of assessment was not provided to differentiate the tax from other forms of taxation utilized, but was adopted because of the different nature of the thing assessed and of the difficulty of arriving at a correct estimate of its value by any other means. Pol.Code, § 3668b; Const. art. 13, § 14.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Indirect Tax".

8. Taxation ⇐140

The gross premium tax imposed upon insurance companies is not a "property tax" but an "excise tax" levied upon the privilege of doing business in the state for purpose of raising revenue and penalties for nonpayment become part of the tax. Pol.Code § 3668b; Const. art. 13, § 14.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Excise Tax" and "Property Tax".

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Camden Fire Insurance Association against Charles G. Johnson, State Treasurer, to recover a penalty imposed for tax delinquency and paid under protest. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend and from a judgment for the defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Fontaine Johnson and Lloyd G. Buchler, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Neil Cunningham, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the State Treasurer, after a demurrer to the complaint had been sustained without leave to amend. From the complaint it appears that plaintiff was a corporation engaged in the insurance business in this state. On August 16, 1937, certain taxes became delinquent as provided by section 3668b of the Political Code, which section also provided that unless such taxes were paid prior to that day fifteen per cent would be added to the amount due as a penalty.

It is also alleged that on August 10, 1937, plaintiff placed its check for the amount of the tax in the mail but the letter was inadvertently misdirected and the check did not reach the office of the State Treasurer until after the 16th day of August. For this delay the penalty was imposed. The tax with the penalty was thereupon paid under protest, and this action brought for recovery of the penalty. After judgment in favor of defendant, this appeal is presented to us.

[1] It is the contention of appellant that the issue here is one of statutory construction. However, if the object and intent of the law is plain, courts cannot, by interpretation, add to or detract therefrom.

[2, 3] Section 3668b of the Political Code clearly imposes a fifteen per cent penalty on a taxpayer who fails to pay the tax at the time and in the manner specified. Taxes upon insurance companies assessed and levied as provided in section 14 of article XIII of the Constitution of this state "* * * shall be due and payable on the first Monday in July * * * and one-half thereof shall be delinquent on the sixth Monday * * *, and unless paid prior thereto, fifteen per cent shall be added to the amount thereof * * *". This section reveals no language that would justify a court in relieving a taxpayer from a situation as here exists. The general rule as given in 61 Corpus Juris at page 1494, which is supported by a number of cases there cited, states: "In the absence of statutory authorization, the courts have no power to relieve delinquent taxpayers from penalties incurred by violations of the statutes providing therefor. * * *"

[4, 5] As pointed out in In re Premises, etc., 117 Pa.Super. 132, 177 A. 700, 702, that while tax laws are to be construed most strictly against the government and most favorable to the taxpayer, "* * * it is equally well settled that where taxes, including interest and penalties, are clearly imposed by law, he who would claim an exemption or relief from them, when so legally imposed, must point to clear and unmistakable warrant of law to support his claim; he is entitled to no special privilege over other taxpayers which is not clearly and definitely established by law."

Judge Shields, who originally passed upon the issues here presented, well expressed the solution of the problem in an opinion by him when he sustained the demurrer. He there said in part:

[6] "This is an action to recover a sum assessed for delinquency in the payment of a tax imposed upon an insurance company under the provisions of section 3668b, Political Code. It is admitted that the tax was not paid upon the date required by law, but the pleadings show that the short delay in its payment was the result of a mistake innocently made and which in purely personal relations an honest man would be prompt to relieve against and forgive. But the statute fixes the date of payment and states the exact amount and nature of the penalty and I am convinced that in such a case the law is the measure of the rights of all the parties involved, the state and the taxpayer. I am satisfied that in the circumstances of this case the penalty provided by the statute, upon its becoming operative, became a part of the tax and thereupon commanded all of the support given to a tax regularly levied for the support of government. Carpenter v. Peoples, etc., 10 Cal.2d 299, 74 P.2d 508; State of California v. Hisey [9 Cir.], 84 F.2d 802 [805], where it is said sententiously: 'The penalty is a part of the tax.' If we accept this view the law governing this case is well stated in State v. Chicago, etc. [128 Wis. 449], 108 N.W. [594], at page 607. 'If the legislative idea was a penalty for failure to pay a tax strictly so-called * * * it could no more be forgiven for mistake, whether excusable or not, than that to which it is incidental.

"'As soon as the default occurred the penalty would be regarded in legal effect as part of the tax * * *. We venture to say that in all tax laws where it is provided that upon default in payment being made a certain amount in addition to the tax shall be forfeited, upon the forfeiture occurring, the penal sum is regarded to be as fixed and certain in its obligatory feature as the tax itself. It is said, in effect, in Cooley on Taxation, 900, that a penalty for neglect to pay a tax constitutes an addition to the tax. Judicial authorities so hold.' Continuing, on page 607 [of 108 N.W.] the court say: 'We venture the assertion that no authority can be found nor principle referred to sustaining the proposition that a statutory penalty for failure to pay an ordinary tax can be avoided on the ground of mistake or discharged otherwise than by full payment.'

[7] "Interesting illustrations could be given of cases which do not come within this rule. Some of them are cited by plaintiff in his brief herein. They are not exceptions to the rule stated, of which there are none, but rather represent cases where the penalty was not one imposed upon the nonpayment of a tax, strictly so called, but where, as in the case of the authority last above cited, the tax possessed some contractual characteristics, or where, as discussed in 1 Cooley on Taxation, section 35, the penalty possessed some regulatory or other quality which distinguished it from a normal tax for purely revenue purposes. But the tax involved here upon which the penalty was imposed was levied solely for the support of the State in its governmental capacity. It was an indirect tax but was levied as ordinary property taxes are levied with a view to determine the value of the thing taxed and to make it pay its proper proportion of taxes for the support of the government. The indirect method of assessment was not provided to differentiate the tax from other forms of taxation utilized in the State, but was adopted because of the different nature of the thing assessed and of the difficulty of arriving at a correct estimate of its value by any other means. See Pullman Co. v. Richardson, 185 Cal. 484, 197 P. 346.

[8] "True, the tax upon insurance companies levied under the provisions of section 14, subd.(b), of article XIII of the Constitution is not a property tax, but an excise tax levied upon the privilege of doing business in the State. Carpenter v. Peoples Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 299, 74 P.2d 508. But it is a revenue tax rather than a regulatory tax and is levied for the purpose of raising funds for the support of the State. As has been said penalties imposed for the nonpayment of such taxes become part of the tax to which it is appurtenant. It might be that such penalty or excess might be forgiven or otherwise disposed of by the legislature (Tukey v. Douglas County [133 Neb. 732], 277 N.W. 57), but in the absence of such disposition, and in the face of the direct provisions of section 3668b of the Political Code, the courts are wholly without power to relieve against such a penalty as is herein pleaded."

The judgment is affirmed.

In re CHAMBERLAIN'S ESTATE.*

CHAMBERLAIN et al. v. PERRY.

Civ. 6546.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 22, 1941.

Rehearing Granted March 11, 1941.

1. Contracts ⇐99(1)

A relationship of trust and confidence existed between son and aged, infirm mother who had suffered a paralytic stroke and was living with son, who managed her affairs, as respects burden of proof in relation to liability of son to account for property received from mother.

2. Contracts ⇐99(1)

Where a fiduciary relation or a relation of trust and confidence exists between a parent and child, a presumption of undue influence arises, and the burden of proving that transaction was the result of free volition and was not superinduced by fraud or undue influence rests upon the child obtaining property from parent.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

If there is any substantial evidence which will justify finding that the acts of mother in turning over property to son were free from undue influence, order based on finding that no undue influence existed must be sustained upon appeal, notwithstanding presumption of undue influence.

4. Contracts ⇐99(3)

Son's evidence that $1,500 paid to him by aged, infirm mother living with son was for care and support and that the crops were turned over to son under the same circumstances was evidence which would serve to rebut the presumption of undue influence.

5. Appeal and error ⇐931(1)

On appeal from order finding that no undue influence existed on part of son to whom mother had transferred money and property, appellate court was bound to assume that mother's mental condition was normal, in absence of proof to the contrary, notwithstanding mother's advanced age and illness.

6. Contracts ⇐99(3)

Where presumption of undue influence existed, as regards liability of son to account for money and property transferred to him by aged, infirm mother living with son, fact that mother was in full possession of her mental faculties and capable of understanding the consequences of the transaction was to be considered as tending to rebut the presumption of undue influence.

*For subsequent opinion see 112 P.2d 53.

7. Contracts ⇐99(3)

Evidence that money and property had been turned over by aged, infirm mother to son as compensation for her care and support, and that mother was in full possession of her mental faculties and capable of understanding the consequences of the transaction, held sufficient to overcome the presumption of undue influence.

8. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

Where evidence was sufficient to overcome the presumption of undue influence on part of son to whom aged and infirm mother had transferred money and property, finding of trial court that no undue influence existed was binding on appellate court.

9. Bills and notes ⇐120
Executors and administrators ⇐202(1)

Where mother and son executed new note in lieu of note signed by son and deceased father, mother and son were severally liable upon the note, and, where mother died, the obligation could be enforced against her estate.

10. Bills and notes ⇐119
Principal and surety ⇐45

If a note is signed by two or more makers, it will be presumed that they are comakers and liable as such and not as principal and surety.

11. Principal and surety ⇐9

Where one signs a note as principal, he will be held as principal, notwithstanding the creditor knew that, as between the one thus signing and the principal debtor, former was in fact only a surety.

12. Executors and administrators ⇐221(1)

Where mother and son executed new note in lieu of note signed by son and deceased father, and mother subsequently died, burden of proving that deceased mother signed the note as an accommodation maker rested upon mother's executor.

13. Bills and notes ⇐96

One who has received value for signing a note cannot set up the defense of "accommodation maker". Civ.Code, § 3110.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Accommodation Maker".

14. Bills and notes ⇐96

Where mother executed new note with son in lieu of note signed by her deceased husband and son, and son agreed to and did pay funeral and other expenses for which husband's estate was liable and waived his right in separate property of deceased husband, mother was not an "accommodation maker" but was primarily liable on note with son, notwithstanding that months later all the real property of husband's estate was awarded to mother as a homestead. Civ. Code, § 3110.

15. Executors and administrators ⇐294

Where deceased mother was primarily liable with son on note executed by them and note was paid out of proceeds of mother's estate, son's distributive share of the estate could not be charged with amount paid on note.

Appeals from Superior Court, Yolo County; J. S. Bruton, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of Annie E. Chamberlain, deceased, by C. L. Perry, executor, for the settlement of his accounts, wherein Elmer V. Chamberlain and Margaret M. Chapman filed objections. From an order settling the accounts, the objectants separately appeal.

Order affirmed in part and reversed in part.

C. C. McDonald, R. H. Schwab, Jr., and O'Donnell & Bagby, all of Woodland, for appellants.

A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice.

There are two separate appeals here involved, based upon the same record. Each appellant appeals from an order settling accounts in the Estate of Annie E. Chamberlain, deceased. Objections were filed by appellants to said accounts, and after a trial of the issues thus raised, the court overruled said objections.

Annie E. Chamberlain died on October 8, 1931, at the age of 87 years. She was twice married. Both of her former husbands were deceased when the incidents which are the subject of this action arose. By her first husband she had two children: Margaret M. Chapman, one of the appellants, and C. L. Perry, respondent. Appellant Chamberlain is the child of the second marriage. She inherited the ranch, upon which she lived, from her second husband, and continued to live thereon with her son, Elmer Chamberlain, for some seventeen years. On the 17th day of May, 1930, she suffered a stroke of paralysis, and upon the same day was removed to the home of respondent, where she resided until her death. Her illness left her in a very weak and helpless condition. She could not get out of bed without assistance, and required the attention of the family of respondent both day and night. She required assistance in dressing and in eating. At this time she had some $3,700 on deposit in a local bank, and was the owner of a small ranch which she inherited from her second husband. During the time she was at respondent's home, he handled all her business affairs. He took her to his own attorney for the purpose of having her will drawn; looked after her almond orchard, harvesting and selling the crops; prepared some of her checks for signature, and attended to all her banking for her. On or about July 14, 1931—some three months before she died—Mrs. Chamberlain signed and delivered a check for $1,500 in favor of respondent, and it was cashed by him, and the money applied to his own use. Just how this occurred is detailed by him, in answer to questions propounded by his counsel. We quote from the record:

"Q. Mr. Perry, that $1500.00—was there any discussion between you and your mother when she gave you that check as to what it was given for? A. Well, she told me; she said that she wanted to stay there and I wanted my sister to take her to Sacramento because it would be handy to doctors and she knew how to take care of her better than I and my wife did. My wife was not hardly able to take care of her, but she did not want to go over there, and my brother he couldn't take her; his wife was away part of the time, and they did not have no use for her, and nobody would take her, and she wanted to stay with me. She told me to take the crop, what was left there, for them two years. There wasn't hardly any, not so much, but she said I had earned it, and then Elmer got this money from the Bank of Esparto.

"Q. Bank of Yolo? A. Or, the Bank of Yolo, and they were all getting a dig at it, and I thought, well, there is no one taking care of her but me and my wife, and I had to get up from five to nine times at night to take her back and forth to the bathroom, and it took both of us most of the time, so I thought—I just mentioned it to her, and I thought she ought to give me something for taking care of her, and she said she would and I told her we would take care of her and, if she gave us $1500.00, we would take care of her the rest of her lifetime and she was very glad to do it and, if she wanted to go back to the ranch she could, but she said she would never go back to the ranch, and she wouldn't go over to my sister's, and she didn't want her to have anything."

We turn now to another incident which occurred during the time mentioned above. Perry had been, for several years, managing the almond orchard belonging to his mother. During the two years before her death, he appropriated to his own use, the gross proceeds from the sale of almonds. The amount thus received was $1,453.18. Perry gave the following explanation of the matter:

"Q. Was there anything said by her, in your presence, in regard to the almond crop for 1930 and 1931? A. No, only one day I made the remark—we had prunes on our place at that time and I said, 'The prunes are not going to amount to anything', and I said, 'There are no almonds to amount to a great deal and we won't make much', and she said, 'Well, what there is, you will make that'."

Perry testified that prior to the above conversation with his mother they had agreed upon the terms of a written contract covering this matter, under which she agreed to let him have the proceeds from the almond orchard, with the understanding that he was to care and provide for her the remainder of her life. This contract was never executed.

Upon the death of Mrs. Chamberlain, respondent Perry and appellant Chamberlain were appointed executors of her estate. During the course of probate, one of the latter's bondsmen died. Upon his failure to give another bond, Chamberlain was discharged by the court as executor, and ordered to file an account. This he did on July 7, 1938. Prior to that date executor Perry filed his second account, wherein he failed to account for the said sum of $1,500 paid to him by the decedent, and also for the proceeds received by him from the sale of said almond crop. Both appellants filed objections to said account. They set up that the transfer of $1,500 was void, as being procured through undue influence exerted over the deceased by Perry. They also made the same contention with reference to the proceeds from the sale of the almond crop. They prayed that Perry be ordered by the court to account for and charge himself with said sums. After a hearing which lasted several days, the trial court found in favor of Perry and against appellants on the issues thus raised. Appellants now separately appeal from the order made in accordance with such finding.

[1, 2] It must be admitted that the facts clearly show a relationship of trust and confidence existed between respondent and his mother. The latter was of the age of 86 years, and suffering not only from the infirmities of old age, but also from the result of a paralytic stroke. Her physical condition is described above. She was living in the home of respondent, under his direction and care. He managed her affairs, as detailed above. Where a fiduciary relation or a relation of trust and confidence exists between a parent and child, a presumption of undue influence arises, and the burden of proving that the transaction was the result of free volition, and was not superinduced by fraud or undue influence will rest upon respondent. 24 Am.Jur. p. 791, sec. 116; Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal.App. 14, 93 P. 289; Campbell v. Genshlea, 180 Cal. 213, 180 P. 336. Respondent contends that the evidence upon the issue of undue influence was conflicting; and that we are therefore bound, under the familiar rule on appeal, to accept the finding of the trial court.

[3, 4] While it must be conceded that there is a rather strong showing made by appellants, still, in the final analysis and in spite of the presumption, if there is any substantial evidence which will justify a finding that the acts of the mother were free from undue influence, the order must be sustained upon appeal. "A mere doubt as to whether a finding is justified by the evidence will not authorize the appellate court to set aside the findings. * * * When the evidence is conflicting, the court will presume that the evidence in support of the verdict or findings is true, and construe it and resolve every substantial conflict as favorable as possible in support thereof." 2 Cal.Jur. pp. 880-881, sec. 515. If the trial court believed the testimony of respondent (as it must have), that the $1,500 was paid to respondent as compensation for her care and support, and that the crops were turned over to respondent by her under the same circumstances, such evidence would serve to aid in rebutting the presumption of undue influence. In 13 C.J., page 405, section 329, 17 C.J.S., Contracts, § 180, it is said: "Solicitation, importunity, argument, and persuasion are not undue influence, and a contract is not to be set aside merely because the one party has used these means to obtain the consent of the other. Influence obtained by persuasion and argument or by appeals to the affections is not prohibited either in law or morals, is not obnoxious even in courts of equity, and may be termed 'due influence'. Nor is the case changed because the parties stand in confidential relations to each other."

In 20 Cal.Jur., page 448, section 44, it is stated: "In disproof of any inference of imposition or undue influence, it is especially significant that the parent owed to the beneficiary a debt of gratitude for filial devotion and service, and care during the parent's declining years."

[5-8] In addition, there is the fact that there is not a word of evidence in the record that the mental condition of the mother was anything but normal. We must therefore assume that her mind was sound, and that she knew precisely what she was doing at all times. "* * * it is to be considered, as tending to rebut the presumption of undue influence, that the donor or grantor was in full possession of his mental faculties, and capable of understanding the consequences of the transaction." 20 Cal. Jur., p. 447, sec. 43. In view of the foregoing, we are of the opinion that there is sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption of undue influence, and the court having found against the presumption, its order settling the account of respondent in respect to both transactions must be affirmed.

In the account of Elmer Chamberlain, as executor, a question arose in respect to what is known as the "Schwab" note. It appears that in 1911, Elmer borrowed $900 from Sam Schwab, and a promissory note was executed by him and his father in that amount. The father died intestate on January 15, 1932. The note had not been paid. Elmer and his mother were administrators of his estate, and they employed attorney Anderson to represent them. Shortly after their appointment as administrators a meeting was held in the office of their attorney, where the affairs of the estate were talked over between attorney Anderson, Elmer and his mother. It was there agreed that there was not sufficient money in the estate to pay either the costs of administration, expenses of last sickness, funeral expenses, or the Schwab note, without the sale of some portion of the real property. So, Mr. Anderson talked to Mr. Schwab about it, and Schwab agreed to take a new note signed by Elmer and his mother, Annie E. Chamberlain, in lieu of his claim against the estate of V. J. Chamberlain. It was also agreed at this meeting that if Annie E. Chamberlain would go on the Schwab note so as to keep it from being filed as a claim against V. J. Chamberlain's estate, Elmer would pay out of his own funds the attorney's fees, expenses of last sickness, funeral expenses, etc., which the estate could not pay. In addition to the payment of these items, Elmer was asked to waive his half interest in the separate property of his father so that his mother might have a probate homestead upon all of the real property. In the fulfilling and carrying out of this agreement, Elmer paid for the cemetery lot, funeral expenses, the doctor's bill, the attorney's fees amounting to some $486. He also complied with attorney Anderson's request and waived his rights in his father's separate property. The mother, on the other hand, joined with Elmer in the making of a new note to Schwab.

[9-12] When Mrs. Chamberlain died, the note was still unpaid. The sum of $5,040.50 was due thereon. Elmer, as executor, filed a petition for an order permitting the estate of his mother to borrow sufficient money to pay said note. The court granted the petition, and the note was paid in full from the funds of the estate so borrowed. The court, however, further ordered that the distributive share of Elmer Chamberlain be charged with the amount which the estate paid to discharge said note. It is from the last mentioned portion of said order that Elmer Chamberlain prosecutes this appeal. He contends that his mother was primarily liable upon the note, and that her estate must pay it. Respondent contends that there was no consideration for said note so far as Mrs. Chamberlain was concerned, and that her estate was not obliged to pay it, because she was merely an "accommodation party", and not a maker. The parties were severally liable upon the note, and under such conditions "each is bound to performance * * * and if one dies, the obligation may be enforced against his estate". 8 C.J., p. 66, sec. 96, 10 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, § 37. "If a note is signed by two or more makers, it will be presumed that they are comakers, and liable as such, and not as principal and surety." 8 C.J., p. 1002, sec. 1308, 11 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, § 658. "* * * we understand the rule to be that where one signs as principal he will be held as such, notwithstanding the creditor knew that, as between the one thus signing and the principal debtor, the former was in fact only a surety." California National Bank v. Ginty, 108 Cal. 148-150, 41 P. 38, 39. It therefore appears, in determining the capacity in which Mrs. Chamberlain signed the note, the burden rested upon respondent of proving that she was not what the instrument showed on its face—a joint and several maker—but an accommodation maker.

The undisputed evidence to which we have referred above, shows that Mrs. Chamberlain did derive some benefit when she signed the note. She was entitled to succeed to a portion of the estate of her husband. When her son Elmer paid the expenses for which the estate would otherwise be liable and forced to meet, her distributive share was correspondingly increased. Thus, she received value for signing the note. Section 3110, Civil Code, reads as follows: "An accommodation party is one who has signed the instrument as maker, drawer, acceptor, or indorser, without receiving value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person. Such a person is liable on the instrument to a holder for value, notwithstanding such holder at the time of taking the instrument knew him to be only an accommodation party."

[13] Under said section, one who has received value cannot set up the defense of accommodation maker. In 8 C.J., page 255, section 403, it is stated: "No consideration moving to the accommodating party is necessary to uphold accommodation paper. As already defined, accommodation paper is paper to which the accommodation party has put his name without consideration. It follows that the paper is not accommodation paper if there is a consideration accruing to the accommodating party for the signing."

In 11 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, page 297, § 742, it is said: "On the other hand, the consideration may in reality be for value, although the purpose was to accommodate another party, and where a person lending his credit seeks to accomplish thereby legitimate objects of his own and not simply to aid the maker, the act is not for accommodation."

To the same effect: Gardiner v. Holcomb, 82 Cal.App. 342, 255 P. 523; Seth et al. v. Lew Hing et al., 125 Cal.App. 729, 14 P.2d 537, 15 P.2d 190. The case of Warren Nat. Bank v. Suerken, 45 Cal.App. 736, 188 P. 613, is directly in point. There the court stated that the notes imported consideration, and that the burden was upon the defendant to establish the fact of want of consideration. Disposing of the contention and holding that the defendant was an accommodation maker, the court said, at page 740 of 45 Cal.App., at page 614 of 188 P.: "An accommodation maker is defined in Parsons on Notes & Bills, § 131, as 'one who puts his name there without any consideration, with the intention of lending his credit to the accommodated party.' As stated in Randolph on Commercial Paper (2d Ed.) § 472, the term 'without consideration' must be considered as meaning simply 'without consideration to the accommodating party directly.' Accepting this definition, can it be doubted that when the defendant here became a party to these notes it was for the direct advantage to be gained by herself and her coheirs and associates in protecting their interest in decedent's estate from the immediate enforcement of this liability against it? It was not a liability enforceable against the defendant, but it was enforceable against the property to which she was about to succeed. Any suspension or forbearance of a legal right constitutes a sufficient consideration for a note or bill. Civ.Code, § 1605; Naglee v. Lyman, 14 Cal. 450. And where heirs or assignees of an estate of a deceased person, in order to protect that estate from claims against the decedent which are enforceable against the property of the estate, obtain a renewal or extension of time on the original claim by agreeing to pay it, such renewal or extension is sufficient consideration for their promise. Rohrbacher v. Aitken, 145 Cal. 485, 78 P. 1054; Whelan v. Swain, 132 Cal. 389, 64 P. 560; Humboldt Sav., etc., Soc. v. Dowd, 137 Cal. 408, 70 P. 274."

[14, 15] The undisputed evidence shows that the mother signed not simply to aid her son, but also to benefit herself. We therefore conclude that there was no evidence upon which to base a finding to the effect that the mother was an accommodation maker, and that the undisputed evidence shows that she was a maker, and therefore, primarily liable with her son upon the instrument. The court therefore erred in deducting from the distributive share of Elmer Chamberlain the amount paid by the estate upon said note. The contention made by respondent that if the consideration did not come from the payee, but from the accommodation party, (Elmer), the accommodation status of Mrs. Chamberlain was not affected. The cases cited by him—Gardiner v. Holcomb, supra, and Harris v. Holland, 107 Cal.App. 646, 290 P. 903—do not support his contention. Neither does 11 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, § 742, 296, nor 8 C.J. 253, paragraph 398, lay down such a rule. Some months after the note was executed, the court, on application of Mrs. Chamberlain, set aside all the real property of her husband's estate as a homestead. This left practically nothing in the estate. Respondent contends that as the widow had the right to her homestead, irrespective of the claims against the estate, it was no benefit to her to have the claims paid by her son. We do not see how the fact that she might, in the future, take such action, would affect the benefit which would accrue to her in the ordinary course of administration, and which was in contemplation of the parties when they executed the note.

That portion of the order appealed from which relates to the payment of the sum of $1,500, and the further payment of the proceeds from the almond orchard, is affirmed, while the portion which deducts from the distributive share of appellant, Elmer V. Chamberlain, the amount paid by the estate on the promissory note, is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter an order in conformity with this opinion.

Appellant Elmer V. Chamberlain will recover his costs on appeal. Appellant Chapman and respondent will each pay his own costs.

WILLIAMS v. WELLS FARGO BANK & UNION TRUST CO.

Sac. 5404.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 27, 1941.

1. Appeal and error ⇐80(1)

In partition suit, decree determining parties' ownership of realty involved and directing sale thereof and division of proceeds because partition could not be made in kind without great prejudice to owners was "interlocutory judgment" within statute authorizing appeals from such judgments in actions for partition, though it reserved allowance of attorney's fees and costs and other details until final decree. Code Civ.Proc. § 963.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Interlocutory Judgment".

2. Partition ⇐77(3)

Where land owned by cotenants cannot be divided without prejudice to them and one of them is entitled to partition thereof, court may order sale of land and division of proceeds in lieu of partition in kind.

3. Appeal and error ⇐460(2)

The perfection of appeal from interlocutory decree, ordering partition of land by sale thereof and division of proceeds, stays proceedings thereon in lower court, without writ of supersedeas, in absence of specific provision concerning interlocutory judgment of partition under statute allowing court to require undertaking for performance of judgment appealed from. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 949, 963.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; James D. Garibaldi, Judge.

Action by Flora J. Williams against the Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Company for partition of land. From a decree ordering sale of land and division of proceeds between the parties, plaintiff appeals. On appellant's petition for a writ of supersedeas to stay proceedings until decision on appeal.

Petition denied.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George H. Johnston, of San Francisco, for respondent.

EDMONDS, Justice.

In a partition action brought by Flora J. Williams, the court rendered a decree ordering the property sold and the proceeds divided in proportion to the interest of each party. She then appealed from that decree upon the ground that the property should be partitioned in kind, and now seeks a writ of supersedeas to stay all proceedings authorized by it until the decision upon her appeal.

The controversy concerns 310 acres of land, one quarter of which, the superior court decided, is owned by the petitioner. The remaining three-fourths was decreed to be owned by the respondent Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Company, as trustee. The court further determined that the petitioner is entitled to partition, but that as it cannot be made in kind without great prejudice to the owners, a sale of the property is necessary. By other provisions of the decree the court appointed referees and directed them to sell the land, subject to confirmation, reserving the right to allow and apportion attorneys' fees, the expenses of sale, and costs in a final decree.

[1, 2] The petitioner contends that an appeal may be taken from an interlocutory decree which determines the rights of the parties and directs that a partition be made, and that the perfecting of the appeal stays all proceedings upon the decree appealed from. The respondent's position is that no appeal lies from a decree which orders a partition of property by sale and not in kind. It is insisting upon a sale notwithstanding the pendency of the appeal, and the referees are proceeding to act under the provisions of the decree.

The decree appealed from is within the express terms of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "An appeal may be taken * * * from such interlocutory judgment in actions for partition as determines the rights and interests of the respective parties and directs partition to be made * * *." It determines the ownership of the real property involved and describes it as that "herein ordered and adjudged to be partitioned and for the purpose of such partitionment * * * ordered and directed to be sold".

Such a decree, this court has held, is one from which an appeal may be taken because the provisions concerning sale and confirmation merely state the action required to be taken in execution of its terms, and the order of confirmation to be later made will be one following final judgment. Hammond v. Cailleaud, 111 Cal. 206, 43 P. 607, 52 Am.St.Rep. 167. This is the logical and reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the applicable Code provisions. Where property owned by cotenants cannot be divided without prejudice to the owners and one of them is entitled to a partition, the court may order it to be sold and then divide the proceeds in lieu of a partition in kind. But a sale of the property and division of the proceeds is a partition, and it would be a curious result to hold that a party may appeal from an interlocutory decree ordering a partition in kind but not from one ordering a sale.

The present case aptly illustrates the injustice which would result from the construction of the statute urged by the respondent. The petitioner's principal objection to the interlocutory decree relates to the method used by the court in dividing the property. She is insisting upon a partition in kind, asserting that the only present use of the land is for dry farming; for this reason she says, it is now of very little value, but if the ditch of a proposed irrigation project is located on the land its value will be materially increased, whereas a sale now would necessarily result in a low and inadequate price. Under such circumstances, the right to an appeal before the sale and confirmation are had is particularly appropriate. And although the decree appealed from reserved the allowance of attorney's fees and costs of suit and other details until the final decree, it is clearly an interlocutory one within the meaning of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] In the absence of specific provision concerning an interlocutory judgment of partition under section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the perfecting of an appeal stays proceedings in the lower court upon such a decree. And although that section allows the court in its discretion to require an undertaking in an amount to be fixed by it "conditioned for performance of the judgment or order appealed from", this language has been expressly interpreted to mean "that a bond may be ordered in such of those cases where the appellant was adjudged to have money or other property in his possession belonging to the respondent, or was required to perform some act for the benefit of the respondent or in pursuance of the directions of the judgment or order appealed from, and that in all other cases the provisions of the section should operate as a stay of proceedings without bond." Jensen v. Hugh Evans & Co., 13 Cal.2d 401, 406, 90 P.2d 72, 74. For these reasons the appeal has stayed all proceedings upon the interlocutory decree and the petitioner does not require the writ of this court to that effect.

The petition is therefore denied.

L. A. 16070.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)

A finding of the trial court upon conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal if there is evidence of a substantial character which reasonably supports the judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)

Where the evidence in support of a finding of trial court's finding is so slight that it does not create a real and substantial conflict, finding may be set aside on appeal.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

Where written contract provided for division of insurance commissions solely between two named persons, and party asserting that corporation was party to agreement testified that other party refused to do business with the corporation, and there was no unequivocal statement by him that other party agreed to contract with corporation or with such party on behalf of corporation, testimony of such party that other party had said that he did not want to do business with the corporation but would do

CARTER, CURTIS, and SHENK, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. A. Smith and Ruben S. Schmidt, Judges.

Action by Fewel & Dawes, Incorporated, against Franklin L. Pratt, to recover insurance commissions. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment reversed.

For prior opinions, see 101 P.2d 94, and 103 P.2d 209.

Hugh Ward Lutz, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hulen C. Callaway and Joe Crail, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

The appellant, Franklin L. Pratt, a licensed life insurance broker, had written several policies of life insurance for John G. Bullock of Los Angeles. In 1928, Bullock decided to take out additional life insurance amounting to $150,000 under an arrangement that would enable his son-in-law, Richard W. Fewel, to receive half of the commissions. Fewel was in debt to Bullock, and the latter wanted him to earn a share of the commissions so that he could meet his obligations. On July 10, 1928, Pratt and Fewel met in Bullock's office to make arrangements for working together.

Pratt refused to work with Fewel's associates and insisted that the agreement be with Fewel alone. Fewel maintained that he could not work without his associates. When they finally agreed to work together and to divide the commissions so earned, they went to the office of Pratt, who executed the following writing:

"July 10, 1928

"Mr. Richard W. Fewel,
"716 South Spring St.,
"Los Angeles.

"Dear Mr. Fewel:

"This is to confirm our verbal understanding of this date that we will work together in the purchase of insurance for Mr. John G. Bullock, on the basis of an equal division of the commissions.

"Very truly yours,

Fewel accepted this writing as embodying the terms of the agreement, and there is no question as to its authenticity.

Neither at that time nor since has Fewel been licensed as an insurance broker or agent. At the time of the agreement, however, he was planning to organize a corporation to carry on an insurance business. His plans materialized with the incorporation of Moore, Fewel & Company on July 30, 1928, which was duly licensed as an insurance broker on August 10, 1928. On September 1, 1928, Fewel, an officer and director of this company, assigned to it his interest in the agreement with Pratt. The company subsequently assigned its rights under the contract to its successor, Moore, Fewel & Devlin, Inc., which in turn assigned them to Moore, Fewel & Dawes. The latter subsequently changed its name to Fewel & Dawes, respondents herein. Richard W. Fewel has been at all times an officer of these corporations.

None of the life insurance policies contemplated by this agreement was secured until 1930. In 1930, 1931 and 1932, Pratt wrote various life insurance policies for Bullock with the cooperation of Fewel. On July 31, 1930, Pratt and Fewel made their first division of commissions. Pratt objected that the payment of commissions to Fewel would be illegal because the latter had no license. It was therefore agreed that Fewel should issue a receipt signed "Moore, Fewel & Devlin by Richard W. Fewel" to enable Pratt to show a legal transaction on his books. Pratt made out his check for the commissions to Fewel personally. Fewel deposited the check in his private account, which he alone used. Other commissions were subsequently divided in the same manner, the last division being made on February 19, 1931. On September 15, 1933, John G. Bullock died. On December 15, 1935, Fewel & Dawes, the last assignee of Fewel's right to commissions under the agreement with Pratt, brought suit against Pratt for unpaid commissions. The trial court gave judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Pratt has appealed.

The trial court found that Fewel was acting on behalf of the corporation Moore, Fewel & Company in making the agreement with Pratt. There is no substantial evidence that Pratt agreed to contract with an actual or contemplated corporation rather than with Fewel. Plaintiff has failed to sustain the burden of proving that Pratt gave the assent necessary to the completion of such a contract. On the contrary, it is undisputed that Pratt repeatedly insisted he would not work with Fewel's associates and would enter into a contract only with Fewel individually. Fewel's statement that he could not work without his associates in no way establishes that Pratt contracted with Fewel and his associates as a corporation. The question is not how Fewel intended to carry on his business, but who were the parties to the contract. Fewel's statement could not make the corporation a party to the contract without Pratt's agreement. The terms of the contract set forth in the memorandum written by Pratt, and accepted by Fewel, make no mention of a corporation as party to the contract. They clearly indicate the contract to be between Pratt and Fewel as individuals.

[1, 2] A finding of the trial court upon conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal if there is evidence of a substantial character which reasonably supports the judgment. Herbert v. Lankershim, 9 Cal.2d 409, 71 P.2d 220; Reese v. Smith, 9 Cal.2d 324, 70 P.2d 933; Tobias v. Adams, 201 Cal. 689, 258 P. 588; Lefrooth v. Prentice, 202 Cal. 215, 259 P. 947; Thoreau v. Industrial Accident Commission, 120 Cal. App. 67, 7 P.2d 767; Gamberg v. Industrial Accident Commission, 138 Cal.App. 424, 32 P.2d 413; Gardiner v. Holcomb, 82 Cal. App. 342, 255 P. 523; Houghton v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co., 152 Cal. 574, 93 P. 377; Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 661, 34 P. 504; Felsenthal v. Warring, 40 Cal.App. 119, 180

P. 67; White v. Greenwood, 52 Cal.App. 737, 199 P. 1095; Elliott v. Market Street R. Co., 4 Cal.App.2d 292, 40 P.2d 547. If, however, the evidence is so slight and tenuous that it does not create a real and substantial conflict the finding may be set aside. Ibid. "There must be more than a conflict of mere words to constitute a conflict of evidence. The contrary evidence must be of a substantial character, such as reasonably supports the judgment * *." Herbert v. Lankershim, supra [9 Cal.2d 409, 71 P.2d 251].

[3] In the present case the only evidence in the entire record which tends to indicate that Pratt agreed to contract with Fewel on behalf of the corporation is the following statement by Fewel: "He said 'I don't want to do business with the corporation, but I will do business through your corporation with you.'" This statement, in itself contradictory and ambiguous, appears in the course of testimony by Fewel that Pratt insisted he would not do business with the corporation but only with Fewel personally. Nowhere in Fewel's testimony is there an unequivocal statement that Pratt agreed to contract with the corporation or with Fewel on behalf of the corporation. Against his ambiguous statement there stands not merely his other statements that Pratt would not do business with the corporation, and Pratt's testimony that he contracted with Fewel personally and not with the corporation; there stands also the written memorandum embodying the terms of the agreement, which makes no reference to the corporation but clearly states the contract to be between Pratt and Fewel as individuals, as well as the written assignment to the corporation in which Fewel openly refers to the contract as being between Pratt and himself. In this context Fewel's statement does not constitute evidence substantial enough to support the finding of the trial court.

[4-6] It is well established in California that a contract which requires the performance of unlawful acts is unenforceable. Civ.Code, §§ 1608, 1667; Levinson v. Boas, 150 Cal. 185, 88 P. 825, 12 L.R.A., N.S., 575, 11 Ann.Cas. 661; La Rosa v. Glaze, 18 Cal.App.2d 354, 63 P.2d 1181. Former section 633aa of the California Political Code (now Insurance Code sec. 1714, St.1935, p. 584) provided: "Any person who shall act or offer to act or assume to act as a life insurance broker or agent, unless licensed by the insurance commissioner as provided in this section * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." On the facts presented, the contract under consideration was between Pratt and Fewel as an individual. Since Fewel was at no time licensed as an insurance broker or agent, he could not legally solicit insurance or receive commissions; therefore, neither he nor his assignees can enforce the contract. It is true that an unlicensed person is not precluded from recovering a commission if he secures such license by the time the contract is performed, although it was executed prior to the time he was licensed. Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal.App. 267, 200 P. 55; Radich v. Cernokus, 65 Cal.App. 452, 224 P. 124; Brenneman v. Lane, 87 Cal. App. 414, 262 P. 400. In the present situation, however, Fewel not only had no license at the time he entered into the contract, but never acquired one thereafter. All the acts which he performed under the contract were illegal and can therefore give rise to no enforceable obligation.

The subsequent assignment by Fewel to the corporation of his right to receive payments under the contract in no way purported to substitute the corporation in Fewel's stead as a party to the original agreement, nor did the assignee-corporation undertake to perform any of the duties under the agreement. The assignment read: "Know all men by these presents: That I, Richard W. Fewel, of Los Angeles, California, for a valuable consideration, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby sell, assign, transfer and set over unto Moore, Fewel & Company its successors and assigns, all my right, title and interest in and to any and all commissions and renewal commissions for life insurance policies written on the life of John G. Bullock and accruing to me under and by virtue of an agreement between Franklin L. Pratt and myself, providing for the payment of one-half of said commissions to me. September 1, 1928. (Signed) Richard W. Fewel."

[7] The wording of the assignment clearly indicates that Fewel was merely transferring to the corporation the right to receive payments of money in return for a valuable consideration. There is no assumption of obligations by the corporation. There is no novation effected whereby the corporation steps into Fewel's shoes as obligor under the contract. The obligations of the agreement remained with Fewel; he performed them, and it was his performance of them without a license which rendered the contract illegal.

The assignment clearly states that the contract was between Fewel as an individual and Pratt. No assignment of rights would have been necessary had Fewell made the contract on behalf of the corporation, for the latter could then simply have adopted the contract as its own. Ballantine, Private Corporations, § 47.

[8, 9] Pratt is not estopped from denying the validity of his contract with Fewel because he accepted receipts from Fewel in the name of the corporation to conceal the illegality of the transaction. An illegal contract cannot be ratified, and no person can be estopped from denying its validity. Colby v. Title Insurance Co., 160 Cal. 632, 117 P. 913, 35 L.R.A., N.S., 813, Ann.Cas.1913A, 515; Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., 72 Cal.App. 409, 237 P. 784; Wood v. Imperial Irr. Dist., 216 Cal. 748, 17 P.2d 128; Regan v. Albin, 219 Cal. 357, 26 P.2d 475; A. L. I. Restatement, Contracts, §§ 590, 598.

[10, 11] Defendant in his answer denied any liability under the contract. He introduced evidence at the trial showing that Fewel was at no time a licensed agent or broker. He moved in the trial court to vacate the judgment and to have judgment entered in his favor on the ground that the contract was illegal and hence unenforceable. In his brief on appeal he urged the illegality of the contract as grounds for reversal. There is therefore no basis for precluding him from raising the question of illegality on appeal. If the contract is illegal as a matter of law, this court may refuse to enforce it regardless of the pleadings of the parties. Morey v. Paladini, 187 Cal. 727, 740, 203 P. 760; Pacific Wharf, etc., Co. v. Standard American Dredging Co., 184 Cal. 21, 192 P. 847; Endicott v. Rosenthal, 216 Cal. 721, 16 P. 2d 673; Kreamer v. The judgment of the trial court is reversed.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

I cannot agree with the conclusion reached in the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Traynor for the reason that it is predicated upon an incorrect statement of the facts of this case as they appear in the record and as found by the trial court, and the rules of law relied upon in said opinion are not applicable to the factual situation as disclosed by the record and determined by the findings of the trial court.

In my opinion the judgment should be affirmed with the modifications hereinafter mentioned.

As a correct understanding of the facts is essential to the solution of every legal problem, I will state the facts of this case as they appear in the record and as found by the trial court. They are as follows:

During the early part of the year 1928, Richard W. Fewel was a partner in an insurance brokerage firm known as "Universal Underwriters". Fewel was married to John G. Bullock's daughter. Pratt approached Fewel around the 10th day of July, 1928, and suggested that between the two of them they could sell Bullock some additional life insurance. Whereupon, Pratt gave Fewel a letter of that date agreeing to an equal division of commissions on such insurance as was purchased by Bullock. Fewel at the time was planning the organization of a new corporation to take over his insurance business. The organization of the corporation was completed July 25, 1928, under the corporate name of Moore, Fewel & Company. On September 1, 1928, Richard W. Fewel assigned the contract with Pratt covering the Bullock life insurance commissions to Moore, Fewel & Company, of which he was then an officer and stockholder. Moore, Fewel & Company were duly licensed as insurance brokers on August 10, 1928. The first policy of life insurance written for John G. Bullock was several months after August 10, 1928. Thereafter, Moore, Fewel & Company assigned the Pratt agreement to Moore, Fewel & Devlin, Inc., Ltd. (when a new corporation was formed to take in another partner), and Moore, Fewel & Devlin in turn assigned it to Moore, Fewel & Dawes. Moore, Fewel & Dawes changed its corporate name to Fewel & Dawes, Inc., the respondent herein. At all times prior to their respective assignments Richard W. Fewel was an officer of the aforesaid corporations.

Fewel informed Pratt at the time the contract was made of his intention to organize a new corporation to take over his insurance business and that the Bullock life insurance would be handled through the new company, although it would have his personal attention.

During the years 1930, 1931 and 1932 considerable insurance was written on the life of John G. Bullock, resulting in the collection by the defendant Pratt of commissions amounting to $23,074.29. It was part of the arrangement between the parties that Pratt would keep the records, collect the premiums, and account to the plaintiff and its assignors for the commissions.

John G. Bullock died September 15, 1933. Prior to his death Bullock was unable to pay all the premiums on a large amount of life insurance purchased through Pratt and the respondent's assignors after the agreement was entered into. An arrangement was made between Pratt and the respondent's assignors whereby certain portions of the commissions earned would be advanced to Bullock and used in keeping the insurance in force.

At the time of Bullock's death there was $4,150.83 due Pratt and the respondent on account of the advances so made, for which Pratt filed a claim against the Bullock estate. This claim was approved and ordered paid by the Probate Court on December 12, 1935, the same date this action was instituted.

Prior thereto Pratt made a division of commissions, and the sum of $2,687.75 was paid to respondent's assignors and receipted therefor by Moore, Fewel & Devlin, Inc., Ltd., to Pratt. No other amount was ever paid to the respondent, or its assignors. Pratt was not required to account for the commissions prior to Bullock's death for the reason that Fewel knew a large portion thereof was being advanced back to Bullock in order to enable him to pay premiums. After Bullock's death, and up to the time of institution of the action, Pratt refused to account, for the reason, among others, that all of the commissions had not been collected.

At the conclusion of the trial, the trial court found "that the contract was made by Richard W. Fewel as an officer and agent of Moore, Fewel & Company, and was subsequently performed by him as an officer and agent of the other corporations owning it under the respective assignments."

The trial court further found "that at all times during the performance of the contract the respondent and its corporate predecessors in title thereto were duly licensed insurance brokers and entitled to one-half of the commissions derived from insurance written on the life of John G. Bullock after the date of the contract; that an accounting was had in open court, wherein it was determined that the gross amount of commissions was $23,074.29; and that after crediting the amounts theretofore paid by Pratt to respondent's assignor, there was due the plaintiff herein from Pratt the sum of $8,849.39 as its share of said commissions." The court found against the appellant Pratt on all of his defenses.

The trial court further found "that the appellant Pratt ratified the assignment of the agreement by accepting receipts from a subsequent assignee, Moore, Fewel & Devlin, Inc., Ltd."

Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $8,849.39, with interest in addition thereto amounting to $1,993.30.

The first attempt by the defendant to assert the illegality of the agreement of July 10, 1928, was on a motion to vacate the judgment and to have a judgment entered in his favor. In support of such motion, the defendant contended that the agreement of July 10, 1928, was contrary to express statute and void for the reason that Fewel was not at that time a duly licensed and authorized insurance broker. This motion was denied by the trial court, and defendant appealed.

It is not true, as stated in the majority opinion, that: "There is no substantial evidence that Pratt agreed to contract with an actual or contemplated corporation rather than with Fewel. Plaintiff has failed to sustain the burden of proving that Pratt gave the assent necessary to the completion of such a contract. On the contrary, it is undisputed that Pratt repeatedly insisted he would not work with Fewel's associates and would enter into a contract only with Fewel individually. Fewel's statement that he could not work without his associates in no way establishes that Pratt contracted with Fewel and his associates as a corporation."

In making the foregoing statement, the author of the majority opinion has disregarded the findings of the trial court which found the facts directly in conflict with said statement. These findings are supported by substantial evidence in the form of testimony of witnesses and inferences which the trial court was justified in drawing from the testimony and conduct of the parties.

So that there will be no question as to the testimony upon which the foregoing statement is based, I will quote the testimony of the witnesses verbatim. Fewel testified as follows:

"A. I will say this—that I was authorized at all times to negotiate with Mr. Bullock and Mr. Pratt, from the very inception they knew I was handling it; that Mr. Pratt didn't want anything to do with Mr. Moore, and I told him so; he told me he did not care to do business with Mr. Moore, he wanted to do business with me; that I was Mr. Bullock's son-in-law; he said, 'I don't want to do business with the corporation, but I will do business through your corporation with you.' I said, 'All right.'

"A. No, he said he didn't want to do business with Mr. Moore and my associates; that he didn't care if the corporation or my company or my associates participated, but he wanted the contract with me; that I was Mr. Bullock's son-in-law and he did not see any reason whatever for them to come into the picture. I explained to him on the first matter, as I told you before, I told him that I was associated with these people, and whatever I did I did it with them."

Defendant Pratt testified:

"I told Mr. Bullock, in Mr. Fewel's presence, that I couldn't legally do what we had agreed to do, but that I didn't want to be the beneficiary of that inability to do a thing I had contracted to do in good faith and that I would give any broker or anyone qualified legally to receive the commissions the amount involved.

"Q. So therefore you paid it to Moore, Fewel & Devlin? A. Mr. Fewel said that if I would give the commissions to Moore, Fewel & Devlin he would arrange to see that he got the credit over there.

"Q. Well, was that agreeable to you? A. Yes, so far as giving away commissions is agreeable."

As I read the foregoing testimony I am forced to the conclusion that the trial court was justified in concluding as it did conclude that Fewel advised Pratt that the agreement between them was to be performed by Fewel and his associates who were later organized into a corporation which immediately became licensed as an insurance broker; that Pratt dealt with said corporation by paying to it one-half of the premiums which he collected on insurance policies written for Bullock; that Pratt thereby ratified the assignment of said agreement from Fewel to the corporation and by Moore, Fewel & Company, a corporation, to its successors in interest. The majority opinion also states that "It was therefore agreed that Fewel should issue a receipt signed 'Moore, Fewel & Devlin by Richard W. Fewel' to enable Pratt to show a legal transaction on his books. Pratt made out his check for the commissions to Fewel personally. Fewel deposited the check in his private account which he alone used. Other commissions were subsequently divided in the same manner, the last division being made on February 19, 1931."

The foregoing statement is only half true as the record shows without contradiction that Fewel had an understanding with the Board of Directors of the corporations, of which he was a director and officer, that while the portion of the premiums on Bullock's life insurance policies to which these corporations were entitled were to be paid to him and by him to Bullock on an indebtedness which Fewel owed to Bullock, Fewel would be charged on the books of the corporation with such premiums, and his account with the corporation would be adjusted when the subsequent premiums were paid. In this regard Fewel testified:

"I was vice-president, I believe; and I spoke to them—under my obligation to Mr. Bullock that I owed him so much money, and that I had an understanding with him that I would take these profits, the first year's profits and give them to him against my indebtedness, but that I would give the renewals to them, and they could charge me back for whatever I withdrew against my account, which was the current account.

"Q. You mean by that whenever you gave any of these commissions to Mr. Bullock, that the brokerage firm charged you with that money? A. They agreed to such an arrangement and we would work it out sooner or later. I explained it was going to be a big amount of insurance and renewals; and I was the only one in the corporation that was not drawing a sizable salary, and I thought I was entitled to something, and it had to be along this line to work it out.

"Q. Did they agree with that? A. They agreed with that—Mr. Bullock understood it thoroughly.

"A. I testified that I later had an agreement with Mr. Moore, who was attending to the life insurance end of our corporation—I informed him that I was heavily indebted to Mr. Bullock; that I was to take no compensation out of the company; that he and Mr. Devlin were drawing good salaries; that Mr. Bullock felt that I should get something out of it and pay him on account of what I owed him; and I thought we should have some kind of understanding with them whereby I could return those first year's premiums to Mr. Bullock, to credit my account; they would get the renewals, and eventually they could charge the amount I gave Mr. Bullock and eventually we would wipe it out on other commissions we wrote.

"Q. When did you have the understanding with Moore, Fewel & Company? A. The first time I talked it over, I think, was with Mr. Moore and Mr. Dawes; and they said they could not agree on it until we had a board of directors' meeting; and I talked to the boys in the board of directors' meeting one day and they agreed that that was fair enough."

The only conclusion which one can draw from the foregoing testimony is that whatever service Fewel rendered in connection with the performance of the agreement between himself and Pratt of July 10, 1928, was rendered and performed by him as an officer and director of the corporations to which said contract had been assigned. These corporations were licensed as insurance brokers at the time all of the insurance policies were issued to Bullock and at the time the premiums became due thereon with the exception of two of said policies hereinafter mentioned. In view of the findings of the trial court, which are amply supported by substantial evidence in the record, the facts of this case do not warrant the application of the rule enunciated in the cases of Levinson v. Boas, 150 Cal. 185, 88 P. 825, 12 L.R.A.,N.S., 575, 11 Ann. Cas. 661; and La Rosa v. Glaze, 18 Cal. App.2d 354, 63 P.2d 1181, relied upon in the majority opinion.

The leading case of Levinson v. Boas, supra [150 Cal. 185, 88 P. 826, 12 L.R.A., N.S., 575, 11 Ann.Cas. 661], involved a pawnbroker who was operating a pawnshop in violation of the law. The court stated in its opinion: "The respondent, neither at the time of the making of the loans, or at any time, had a license to carry on or conduct the business of pawnbroker."

Likewise, in the case of La Rosa v. Glaze, supra. The plaintiff in that action never at any time had a license as agent, commission merchant, or dealer in farm products, as required by section 1263 of the Agricultural Code, St.1933, p. 276.

It has been uniformly held that an unlicensed person is not precluded from recovering a commission, if he had such license at the time the contract was performed and the cause of action arose, although the contract under which he seeks to recover commissions may have been executed prior to the time he was licensed. Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal.App. 267, 200 P. 55; Radich v. Cernokus, 65 Cal.App. 452, 224 P. 124; Brenneman v. Lane, 87 Cal.App. 414, 262 P. 400.

In each of the above-mentioned cases, a real estate broker's contract was involved. A contract authorizing a real estate agent to sell real property on a commission basis had been entered into before the agent had obtained a license pursuant to the law of this state, but a license had been obtained by him before the sale was consummated and his right to the commission had accrued. It is true that the court in the Houston case predicated its opinion upon the wording of section 20 of the act, St.1919, p. 1259, which provides that no person engaged in the business or acting in the capacity of a real estate broker shall bring or maintain any action in the courts of this state for collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section 20 of the said act without alleging and proving that said person was a duly licensed real estate broker at the time the alleged cause of action arose.

In the case of Davis v. Chipman, 210 Cal. 609, at page 622, 293 P. 40, at page 46, this court, in referring to the case of Houston v. Williams, supra, said: "In Houston v. Williams, supra, it was held that a limitation upon this rule was made by section 20 of the act, and that the rule in all its rigor should not apply to a person holding a broker's license at the time he consummated a sale of real property, even though he had no such license at the time he entered into a contract with the owner to pay him a commission. The court there held that a reasonable construction of the act would permit such a holding. While agreeing with the appellate court in this ruling, we are further of the opinion that it would be a most unreasonable construction of the statute to hold that it permitted an action to be maintained as in the present proceeding where the plaintiff had no license at the date the sale of the property was effected, or during any of the time during which he rendered the services for which he seeks to recover, and only secured such a license practically a year after the sale was effected. 'As plaintiff held no broker's license at the time the sale involved herein was consummated, he is not entitled to recover compensation for his services, all of which were rendered prior to his securing any license."

The inevitable conclusion at which one must arrive from a reading of the above-mentioned cases is that it was the intention of the legislature to denounce the performance of certain acts by a person whom the law required to procure a license before such acts can be performed. In the case of a real estate broker, it was the sale of real estate on a commission basis; in the case of an insurance broker, it was the solicitation or sale of insurance. In other words, it was the doing of something in connection with the conduct of the business of such agent or broker which constitutes a violation of the statute, instead of merely agreeing to perform such acts at some future date, when the person performing the same has complied with the requirements of the law with respect to obtaining the license.

The record conclusively shows that the respective assignee corporations to which the agreement was transferred were licensed insurance brokers throughout the entire time of performance under the agreement, except as hereinafter stated. Moore, Fewel & Company was licensed from August 10, 1928, to June 30, 1930; Moore, Fewel & Devlin, Inc., Ltd. from July 1, 1930, to June 30, 1932; Moore, Fewel & Dawes from July 1, 1932, to October 6, 1933. On October 11, 1933, Moore, Fewel & Dawes, Inc., Ltd. changed its corporate name to Fewel & Dawes, Inc. There was a lapse in its license from October 6, 1933, to November 10, 1933. Performance under the agreement having come to an end with the death of John G. Bullock, and respondent being a duly licensed life insurance broker at the time of performance and at the commencement of this action, it is not material that there was a lapse in the corporation's license from October 6, 1933, to November 10, 1933. Moore, Fewel & Dawes was, however, not licensed when two policies were issued February 17, 1932. Those premiums should be eliminated from the judgment.

The agreement of July 10, 1928, was a continuing agreement or contract and there is nothing to show that such contract was not to exist as long as Pratt procured insurance under said agreement. The evidence shows that Bullock contemplated taking out $150,000 additional insurance at the time the written agreement was executed. Pratt had no option to terminate the contract at will. There is no evidence that the contract was terminated on February 19, 1931, as contended by appellant. The contract could only be terminated by the mutual consent of all parties. Findings number 27 and number 28 to the effect that the contract was not terminated are supported by the evidence.

There is no merit in the contention that a proper accounting was not had between the parties. An accounting was held and the record fails to show any prejudice to appellant with the exception of the item of interest, which was allowed. Respondent introduced in evidence a record containing a list of the companies, the policies and premiums and the commissions which were earned. Appellant reserved the right to check the correctness of this record, and to offer evidence of any error which it might contain. The court found that appellant was paid $23,074.29, as commissions under the agreement, and that respondent's share of 50 per cent thereof amounted to $11,537.14. The court also found that respondent's assignors had been paid by appellant on account of its share of said commissions only the sum of $2,687.75, leaving a balance due to respondent under the agreement of $8,849.39. That finding is supported by the evidence, except as hereafter stated.

It is true that the corporate name of Moore, Fewel & Devlin was changed in 1932 to Moore, Fewel & Dawes. The contract involved in this case was assigned to the last-mentioned corporation January 12, 1932, which was not licensed as a broker until July 1, 1932. During the interval between the date of assignment of the contract to the last-mentioned corporation, and the issuance of its broker's license, Pratt procured two policies on the life of Bullock of $25,000 each and two renewals of premiums, on or about February 17, 1932, from which commissions aggregating the sum of $2,146.81 were received by Pratt.

While the assignor's license was in full force during that interval, I assume that since title to the contract was then in the name of Moore, Fewel & Dawes, which was not then licensed as a broker, it would not be entitled to share in such commissions. The judgment of $8,849.39 should therefore be modified by subtracting therefrom said sum of $2,146.81.

Findings numbers 24 and 25, with respect to the interest allowed, are not supported by the evidence. The record fails to disclose the dates of payments of commissions to appellant. At least it is impossible to determine which dates refer to the specific times when the commissions were received by the appellant. The record therefore fails to show that respondent is entitled to interest on unpaid commissions which were received by the appellant. The judgment should also be modified by disallowing the items of interest in the sum of $1,993.30.

There is no merit whatever in appellant's contention that the contract of July 10, 1928, was not assignable, or that he could not be compelled to recognize the assignee thereof, as the evidence is undisputed that appellant dealt with the corporate assignees of Fewel, and accepted receipts signed by said assignees for commissions paid Fewel, pursuant to said contract. The conclusion is therefore inescapable that even though appellant did not contemplate contracting with the corporate assignees of Fewel at the time he entered into said agreement, he is, nevertheless, estopped by his conduct from contending that the assignment of the agreement by Fewel terminated the contract and that the assignee acquired no rights thereunder by virtue of the various assignments thereof.

As I view this case, however, in view of the findings of the trial court, I am of the opinion that the contract of July 10, 1928, was made by Fewel on behalf of the corporation which he contemplated organizing, and the assignment thereof by Fewel to the corporation was a mere formality and was not essential to secure to said corporation the rights to which it was entitled under said contract.

The evidence is sufficient to support the findings of the trial court that said contract was made by Fewel as an officer and agent of Moore, Fewel & Company, and was subsequently performed by him as an officer and agent of the other corporations to which it was assigned.

Appellant has attempted to raise the proposition of res adjudicata against the judgment recovered by respondent in this case. This proposition is presented by way of a motion to take additional evidence in this court, pursuant to section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment which appellant contends is res adjudicata of the judgment herein appealed from was entered September 8, 1937, approximately fifteen months after the entry of the judgment in the case at bar; said judgment of September 8, 1937, arose out of the following factual situation:

About December 12, 1933, respondent levied an attachment upon certain funds held by the executors of the estate of John G. Bullock. After entry of judgment on June 24, 1936, no stay having been obtained by appellant, execution was levied by the respondent against these same funds. The executors thereupon filed an action of interpleader, and paid the moneys into court, alleging that numerous claims had been made thereto by various creditors of said Franklin L. Pratt. Respondent filed an answer and cross-complaint in this action, setting forth its claim to the interpleaded fund. The cross-complaint sets forth and alleges a prior right to the interpleaded fund for the reasons that, (1) The rights of other claimants were based on certain assignments from Pratt which constituted fraudulent conveyances, and (2) The fund was impressed with a constructive trust and therefore no assignments could be validly made by Pratt.

The court in this interpleader action found that Fewel & Dawes, Inc., was entitled to recover said moneys subject to the right of two other claimants, who held valid assignments from Pratt. The court also found that the interest of Fewel & Dawes, Inc., existed, however, only by virtue of the levy of the writ of attachment and the subsequent levy of a writ of execution. As to the second cause of action, which was predicated on the theory of a constructive trust in the fund for the benefit of respondent corporation, the court found that no such trust existed. The findings of fact determined that the contract of July 10, 1928, was not made with or on behalf of Moore, Fewel & Company; that, on the contrary, the agreement was made with Richard W. Fewel and that it was void, as he was not a licensed life insurance agent or broker at the time of said agreement, nor at any time thereafter; that the claim for the funds in question from the estate of John G. Bullock, deceased, was properly made in behalf of Franklin L. Pratt. The judgment in this interpleader action was entered on November 8, 1937, and became final after time for appeal had elapsed. Appellant sought to introduce that final judgment as evidence in this case to establish it as res adjudicata and to create an estoppel.

I am of the opinion it was not the court's province in the suit of interpleader to challenge the judgment upon which execution had issued. The sole issue which was presented to the court in that cause of action was neither involved in nor determinative of the issues in the present suit. The issue before the court in that action raised the question as to whether the appellant, Pratt, was a trustee of the interpleaded fund, and as such, whether he violated his duty as trustee by assigning that fund to various claimants. A finding that he was not a trustee of said fund for the benefit of the respondent herein did not determine the issues presented in this suit for an accounting. That final judgment, therefore, is not res adjudicata of the issues presented in this case.

An examination of the cases cited by appellant fails to disclose any precedent for the application of res adjudicata or estoppel under the circumstances of this case.

I am forced to the conclusion, after a very careful examination of the record and briefs in this case that every consideration of equity and justice is on the side of the plaintiff and respondent in this case, and that the defendant and appellant is attempting to evade an obligation which he contracted in good faith to perform and which he did perform until the death of Bullock, but when he saw no further opportunity to advance his own interests by continuing to secure the cooperation of Fewel and his corporation, he repudiated his obligation and is now attempting to resort to technical defenses to defeat a just obligation which he contracted in good faith, with full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances surrounding the arrangement which he himself made with Fewel and which the trial court found had been faithfully executed by Fewel and his successors in interest. To now permit the defendant to prevail under such circumstances, will, in my opinion, result in a miscarriage of justice which should not be countenanced by any court.

The judgment should be modified by striking therefrom the commissions on the policies and renewals of February 17, 1932, aggregating the sum of $2,146.81, and the items of interest allowed in the sum of $1,993.30, and as so modified, the judgment should be affirmed.

L. A. 17553.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 29, 1941.

Rehearing Granted Feb. 27, 1941.

1. Limitation of actions ⇐51(2)

A mandamus action commenced by deceased police officer's widow over three years after his death, to compel city board of pension commissioners to issue order for payment of pension to petitioner, was not barred by statute of limitations as to pension payments accruing within three years before bringing of action and in future, as right to pension payments is a continuing one, and right to each installment accrues when it becomes payable. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 312, 338, 1109.

2. Limitation of actions ⇐51(2)

A mandamus action by deceased police officer's widow to compel Los Angeles city board of pension commissioners to issue order for payment of pension to petitioner was not barred by statute of limitations as to pension payments accruing within three years before bringing of action and in future, though not brought within three years after board's denial of petitioner's claim for pension, as running of such statute is determined by time when right to each pension payment accrues and claimant need not present claim to board anew after three years from date of denial thereof. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 312, 338, 1109; Charter of City of Los Angeles, §§ 183, 376.

* Subsequent opinion 116 P.2d 37.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Proceeding by Virginia M. Dillon for a writ of mandamus to compel the Board of Pension Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles to issue an order for payment of a pension to petitioner as the widow of a deceased city police officer. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Prior opinion, 100 P.2d 803.

Pollock & Pollock, Edward I. Pollock, David Pollock, Theodore A. Horn, and Louis Miller, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., Frederick von Schrader, Asst. City Atty., and Robert J. Stahl, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

Plaintiff's husband, a police officer for the city of Los Angeles, committed suicide in April, 1934. Within six months, plaintiff presented an application to the Board of Pension Commissioners of the city of Los Angeles for the allowance of a widow's pension under article 17, section 183 of the charter of the city of Los Angeles. The application was denied by the board in February, 1935. In December, 1938, she filed the present proceeding in mandamus to compel the board to issue an order for the payment to her of a pension in future and a cash sum equal to the amount of pension funds accrued in the three years preceding the date of the filing of the petition plus the amount of pension which will have accrued from that date to and including the date of such order with interest. The petition alleged that in the course of his duties as police officer plaintiff's husband suffered two accidents entailing severe injuries to his body and nervous system which gave rise to a condition of mental unbalance during which he took his life. Defendants demurred to the petition on the grounds that the petition did not state sufficient facts as to the nature and extent of the deceased's injuries and his mental condition before death and that any cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend holding that the cause was barred by the statute of limitations. Upon being refused leave to file a second amended petition, plaintiff appealed from the judgment of dismissal.

[1] Sections 338 and 312 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which are applicable to actions in mandamus, Code Civ.Proc. sec. 1109, provide that an action upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture, must be commenced within three years after the cause of action has accrued. Defendants contend that under these provisions the action is barred because it was commenced more than three years after the death of plaintiff's husband. In the language of this court, however, "The right to pension payments is a continuing right." Dryden v. Board of Pension Commissioners, 6 Cal.2d 575, 580, 59 P.2d 104, 107. The right to each installment accrues at the time it becomes payable, not at the time of the decedent's death. In the Dryden case the court was concerned with section 376 of the Charter of the City of Los Angeles which requires that any claim against the city other than for damages be presented within six months after the last item of the claim has accrued. A deceased police officer's widow had presented her claim more than six months after her husband's death. The court in upholding her claim declared: "Petitioner by her conduct may have barred herself from collecting payments which have accrued, but this does not mean that she is without means to enforce the right to present and future pension payments, as distinguished from past and accrued pension payments. * * * It is our opinion that the petitioner is entitled to all those periodic pension payments which fell due within a period of six months prior to her application to the Board of Pension Commissioners, and to all those periodic pension payments which have accrued since that date and which will continue to accrue in the future * * *." Dryden v. Board of Pension Commissioners, 6 Cal.2d 575, 580, 59 P.2d 104, 107. In Talbot v. City of Pasadena, 28 Cal.App. 2d 271, 82 P.2d 483, defendants claimed that a widow's action for a pension six years after the death of her husband was barred by section 338(1) of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court stated: "The period of limitation prescribed by subdivision 1 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure will run against a claim for accrued pension payments. * * * From the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint all claims for pension payments accrued before April 15, 1933, would be subject to the bar of the statute of limitations. The fact that some of the payments may be barred does not justify an order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend." 28 Cal.App.2d at page 273, 82 P.2d at page 484. "The right, if any, to a pension is a continuing one." 28 Cal. App.2d at page 274, 82 P.2d at page 484.

These cases are controlling herein. Defendants rely upon Hermanson v. Board of Pension Commissioners, 219 Cal. 622, 28 P.2d 21, for the proposition that a pension claim is completely barred if action thereon is not brought within three years of the death of the decedent. The court there held, however, that the plaintiff was not entitled to a pension on the merits. It then added without discussion a statement not essential to the decision to the effect that the action was also barred by the statute of limitations. Whatever implications lay therein have been dispelled by this court's statement in the Dryden case, supra, that "Defendants contend that the conclusion reached above is inconsistent with our decision in Hermanson v. Board of Pension Commissioners, [supra]. In that case we held that on the merits the petitioner was not entitled to a pension, and added that the statute of limitations was a bar to his claim. The point raised in the instant case, that the right to a pension is a continuing one, was not made in the Hermanson Case, and, in view of the adverse determination against the applicant on the merits, would have been unavailing."

[2] Defendants' contention that in any event the action is barred because the plaintiff did not bring it within three years after the board's denial of her claim for a pension is also without merit. Sections 183 and 376 of the City Charter require that a pension claim must be presented first to the Board of Pension Commissioners, and denial of the claim by the board must precede any court action to enforce the claim. The running of the statute of limitations, however, is determined not by the time of the board's denial, but by the time when the right to each payment accrues. Talbot v. City of Pasadena, supra. Nor is it necessary for the plaintiff to present her claim to the board anew because more than three years have elapsed from the date of the last denial. One proper claim, even though denied by the board, serves to satisfy the requirements of the City Charter with regard to any claim for future payments. Talbot v. City of Pasadena, supra.

We therefore hold that the statute of limitations has not run upon any right which plaintiff may have to payments which have accrued within three years prior to the bringing of this action and to payments which may accrue in the future.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed.

ROMERO et al. v. DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS, et al.

L. A. 16483.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 30, 1941.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1941.

1. Railroads ⇐82(3)

Where grantee, when applying to probate court for order directing execution of deed by administratrix in accordance with agreement between grantee and deceased, represented that grantee had performed its part of agreement which called for construction of railroad on land, it could be assumed that court, by its order, and administratrix, by execution and delivery of deed, intended to provide for a reversion in event of a cessation of use of land for railroad purposes by language in deed providing that, if grantee and its successors failed to use conveyed land for railroad purposes, land should revert to deceased's heirs.

2. Eminent domain ⇐152(1)

Generally, the owner of a possibility of reverter prior to a breach of the condition is not entitled to compensation when property is taken under law of eminent domain, but the owner of fee or reversionary interest should have a separate valuation of his interest where land taken has some special value to him, and otherwise the law will not take notice of separate value of fee and of user where there is no substantial difference in their values, and, if, in such case, at time fixed for valuation the reversion has not occurred, the reversionary interest has no compensable value in a condemnation proceeding.

3. Eminent domain ⇐158

In action for declaration of plaintiffs' title to land which had been condemned by the state for highway purposes, and for a mandate directing defendants to proceed with condemnation proceedings to an adjudication of amount due plaintiffs as compensation for the taking of plaintiffs' alleged reversionary interest in land, question concerning value of reversionary interest was for trier of fact, after proof of such value had been introduced in evidence.

4. Eminent domain ⇐158

In action for declaration of plaintiffs' title to land which had been condemned by state for highway purposes and for other relief, a complaint, alleging that land was conveyed by administratrix for plaintiffs' predecessor under deed containing condition that, if grantee and its successors failed to use land for railroad purposes, it should revert to predecessor's heirs and that land was abandoned for railroad purposes after it was condemned for highway purposes in proceedings wherein no summons was served upon heirs who did not appear in such proceedings prior to entry of judgment, was sufficient to tender issue of damages to an interest in property taken for public use.

5. Eminent domain ⇐269

In action for declaration of plaintiffs' title to land which had been condemned by state for highway purposes, Supreme Court was unable to compel defendants to revive an old condemnation proceeding or institute new condemnation proceedings for purposes of an adjudication of amount due plaintiffs as compensation for the taking of land and plaintiffs' interest therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Robert W. Kenny, Judge.

Action by Hortensia M. Romero and others against the Department of Public Works of the State of California and others, wherein plaintiffs sought a declaration of their title to certain land and other relief. From a judgment of dismissal entered on an order sustaining defendants' demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal.

SHENK, Justice.

The plaintiffs appealed from a judgment of dismissal entered on an order sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the complaint.

The complaint shows the following:

In July, 1891, Bonifacio Marquez was the owner of land bounded on the west by the Pacific Ocean and on the south by the city of Santa Monica. In that month he agreed to sell and convey to Pacific Improvement Company a strip of his land 200 feet in length and 100 feet wide, bordering on the ocean. The consideration for the grant was the sum of one dollar and the benefits to be derived by him from the construction and operation of a railroad between the city of Los Angeles and the Southern Pacific wharf at Santa Monica. The agreement provided: "In case said railroad shall not be located on said land, this agreement shall be null and void." The Pacific Improvement Company located and constructed the railroad in accordance with the agreement. On September 8, 1891, while the railroad was in the course of construction, Bonifacio Marquez died intestate and Maria Antonia Oliverez de Marquez was appointed administratrix of his estate. The Pacific Improvement Company filed a petition in the probate proceedings, alleging performance of the agreement and asking for a conveyance of the 100-foot strip. Pursuant to an order of court, a deed was executed and delivered by the administratrix on October 27, 1892, conveying a strip 100 feet wide a distance of approximately 200 feet, containing about 46/100 acres of land. The deed provided: "This deed is made upon the express condition that the land hereby conveyed shall be used by the party of the second part, its successors or assigns, for railroad purposes, and in the event that said party of the second part, its successors or assigns, shall fail so to use said land for railroad purposes then and thereupon said land shall revert to and become vested in the heirs of Bonifacio Marquez, deceased."

The Pacific Improvement Company and its successors, Southern Pacific Company and Pacific Electric Railway Company, commenced and continued the operation of a railroad on said strip or a portion of it for about forty years.

On August 16, 1922, California Highway Commission, acting on behalf of the Department of Public Works of the state of California, adopted a resolution providing for the "acquisition of a right of way for highway purposes over and upon" the strip of land described in the above mentioned deed. The Department of Public Works filed an action "for the purpose of condemning a right-of-way for a highway across said lands". No summons was ever issued in said action or served upon the administratrix of the estate of Bonifacio Marquez named therein as a defendant, nor upon any of the heirs, some of whom are the plaintiffs herein. In that action, however, the corporate defendants voluntarily appeared, and a stipulated judgment was entered providing for a decree of condemnation of the property of those defendants, namely, Southern Pacific Company, Pacific Electric Company, and others. An interlocutory judgment of condemnation was entered in said action on August 28, 1922, and a final judgment in July, 1925. Pursuant to the stipulated judgment the westerly 60 feet of the 100-foot strip were condemned for highway purposes and the Southern Pacific Company and the other appearing defendants received as damages the cost of the re-location and re-construction of the right-of-way and railroad bed on the remaining 40 feet of the 100-foot strip, and continued the operation of the railroad on said 40-foot strip until on or about January 25, 1934, when the operation of the railroad on said land ceased, all materials were removed, and the strip was wholly abandoned for railroad purposes. It was alleged that after such abandonment the Department of Public Works entered upon the westerly ten feet of the remaining 40-foot strip and improved said ten-foot strip as part of the highway. Possession was so taken and improvement pursued without any adjudication in the pending condemnation action or in any other proceeding.

On April 24, 1934, the heirs of Bonifacio Marquez or their representatives filed an action in the superior court in Los Angeles county to quiet their title to the 100-foot strip of land. In August, 1934, the same parties appeared and filed an answer in the condemnation action in which judgment had been entered in July, 1925. The plaintiff in the condemnation action moved to dismiss the action as to said appearing defendants. The motion was denied and judgment for the defendants, heirs of Marquez, followed. A stipulation was thereupon entered into between the parties in both the condemnation action and the quiet title action, in which it was agreed that if the plaintiff in the condemnation action should prevail on its appeal to the District Court of Appeal from the judgment in favor of the defendants, heirs of Marquez, their claimed title to the ten-foot strip would be deemed to be adjudged thereby; that if the judgment should be affirmed, the several heirs would accept a designated proportion of the award for said ten-foot strip; but that if the judgment on appeal did not go to the merits the stipulation was to be ineffective. On the appeal (People ex rel. v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 17 Cal.App.2d 257, 61 P.2d 1184), the court held that the motion of the plaintiff to dismiss the action as to said defendants, heirs of Marquez, pursuant to section 581a, Code of Civil Procedure, should have been granted. That decision made ineffective the stipulation between the parties, and expressly relegated the defendants affected thereby to a prosecution of the pending action to quiet title for an adjudication of their title or their rights to compensation for the taking of said 60-foot strip. People v. Southern Pacific R. Co., supra, 17 Cal.App.2d at page 262, 61 P.2d 1184.

By the present action subsequently filed, the plaintiffs sought a declaration of their title to said 100-foot strip, and the mandate of the court directing the defendants to proceed with the prior condemnation proceeding, or in a new condemnation proceeding, or in the action herein, to an adjudication of the amount due to the plaintiffs as compensation for the taking of said 60-foot strip and said ten-foot strip or of any right, title or interest of the plaintiffs therein. It was also alleged that prior to the filing of the action herein the plaintiffs duly served a written claim and demand for the payment to them of compensation, which was rejected.

The defendants filed a general demurrer to the complaint which was sustained and the judgment of dismissal followed.

On this appeal the plaintiffs contend that the condition contained in the administratrix's deed hereinabove quoted and the alleged abandonment of the strip of land for railroad purposes are determinative of their right to compensation for said 70-foot strip. They rely on Johnston v. City of Los Angeles, 176 Cal. 479, 168 P. 1047; Papst v. Hamilton, 133 Cal. 631, 66 P. 10; Parsons v. Smilie, 97 Cal. 647, 32 P. 702; Liebrand v. Otto, 56 Cal. 242; Moakley v. Blog, 90 Cal.App. 96, 265 P. 548, and similar cases.

The defendants contend that the condition should not be construed to effect a reversion or a right of re-entry, because such title or right is not predicated on a cessation of the use of said land for railroad purposes, but on a failure to put said land to such use; that the word "fail", as employed in said covenant, does not mean "cease"; therefore, a use for railroad purposes having been alleged, the judgment is conclusively supported by the cases of Hasman v. Elk Grove Union High School, 76 Cal.App. 629, 245 P. 464; Booth v. County of Los Angeles, 124 Cal.App. 259, 12 P.2d 72, and O. T. Johnson Corporation v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 19 Cal.App.2d 306, 65 P.2d 368.

[1] There is merit in the contention of the plaintiffs that the word "fail" as used in said deed should be read with the meaning contended for by them. Webster's New International Dictionary, second edition, applies both meanings to the word "fail", namely, "to keep or cease from an appointed, proper, expected, or required action. * * *" When the Pacific Improvement Company applied to the court for an order directing the deed to be executed, it represented that it had fully performed the agreement on its part. Considered in the light of that fact it may be assumed that the court by its order and the administratrix by the execution and delivery of the deed intended the language to provide for a reversion in the event of a cessation of the use of said strip for railroad purposes.

[2] When the state in the condemnation proceeding acquired the title to the sixty-foot strip for highway purposes it thereby prevented its use for railroad purposes. As to so much of said property, the condition that it should be used for railroad purposes became impossible of further performance by operation of law. In other words, the public necessity for highway purposes as to that portion which was conclusively established in the condemnation proceeding, prevented further performance of the condition. The authorities generally are to the effect that the owner of the possibility of a reverter prior to a breach of the condition is not entitled to compensation when the property is taken under the law of eminent domain. Such cases hold that the possibility of voluntary abandonment by non-user is so remote and improbable that it has no substantial value to be estimated in a condemnation proceeding. They recognize, however, that the owner of the fee or the reversionary interest should have a separate valuation of his interest where the land taken has some special value to him, as where the underlying lands are shown to be mineral bearing or otherwise of value separately from the use of the surface of the land; but that otherwise the law will not take notice of the separate value of the fee and of the user where there is no substantial difference in their values, and if, in such case, at the time fixed for the valuation the reversion has not occurred, the reversionary interest is said not to have any compensable value in a condemnation proceeding. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 146 Cal. 290, 79 P. 961, 70 L.R.A. 221, 106 Am.St.Rep. 36, 2 Ann.Cas. 962; City of San Gabriel v. Pacific El. Ry. Co., 129 Cal. App. 460, 18 P.2d 996; Lutes v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., 158 Ky. 259, 164 S.W. 792; Nichols, Eminent Domain, 2d Ed., vol. 1, p. 243; see also Lyford v. City of Laconia, 75 N.H. 220, 72 A. 1085, 22 L. R.A.,N.S., 1062, 139 Am.St.Rep. 680.

No difficulty presents itself as to the alleged right of the plaintiffs in and to the easterly thirty feet of said 100-foot strip or to their alleged right to compensation for their interest in said ten-foot strip. It appears from the complaint that the reversionary interest in the easterly forty feet had vested the entire title or interest in the plaintiffs after the abandonment by the railroad company, and, as appears by the judgment in the condemnation action, by the state itself. The revesting of the plaintiffs' ownership in the easterly 40 feet must be deemed to be shown by the facts alleged in the complaint. If the facts so alleged be supported by proof and it be shown that there had been an abandonment of said 40-foot strip by the railroad company, and subsequently a taking of 10 feet of said strip by the state, the plaintiffs, rather than the railroad, would be entitled to compensation for that portion of the land formerly deeded by the administratrix of the estate of their ancestor.

[3] The plaintiffs contend that the facts alleged respecting the sixty-foot strip show that they are also entitled to some compensation for the taking thereof. The contention is based on the argument that by the alleged agreement Bonifacio Marquez retained a particular interest in the hundred-foot strip, namely, the right to the benefits to be derived from the operation of the railroad to be constructed and which was constructed thereon; that that was, in fact, the only consideration received for the grant of the strip; that therefore when the state deprived the plaintiffs of their reversionary interest in said 60-foot strip, it took from them not merely a naked reversionary title, but what may be considered a substantial benefit retained by the grantor of said strip, which benefit was the consideration for the grant, and that such benefit had a substantial and ascertainable value for which the plaintiffs would be entitled to be compensated under the decision in Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. San Francisco Savings Union, supra. In that case it was held that generally in a condemnation proceeding the value of the easement condemned is the value of the fee for the purpose of assessing the value of the right or interest taken under the power of eminent domain; but that where the fee has a definite substantial value to the owner, the easement taken must be valued separately. In that case the sub-surface of the land taken for surface easement purposes contained oil deposits. It was concluded that the fee retained by the owner was property with an ascertainable value which must be estimated separately. It is contended that the declaration in that case leads to the conclusion herein that the plaintiff's reversionary interest in said 60-foot strip has a separate value from the value of the easement condemned by the state, and that the plaintiffs have a right to have that value estimated. It is apparent that these considerations bear solely upon the question of the value of the reversionary right or interest which it has been concluded herein the plaintiffs have alleged in their complaint. The question is one of fact to be determined by the fact finding authority after proof of value has been introduced in evidence, and is therefore not a question which can be settled by a consideration of the issues raised by the demurrer. No satisfactory reason appears why the heirs or their representative joined as defendants in the condemnation proceeding were not served in that proceeding and the value of their reversionary interest determined as alleged therein. Unless the defendants now have some valid defense to the recovery of damages for the taking of the alleged condemned reversionary interest, the plaintiffs would be entitled to the payment of any value which it may be found to have.

[4, 5] The foregoing observations dispose of all the contentions urged in respect to the issues raised by the demurrer. We conclude that the complaint states a cause of action and that the defendants should be put to such defenses as may be available to them. The plaintiffs have been precluded from seeking any relief in the condemnation proceeding because of the application of the provisions of section 581a of the Code of Civil Procedure by the District Court of Appeal in People v. Southern Pacific R. Co., supra. However, we know of no way by which this court may now compel the defendants to revive the old or institute a new condemnation proceeding. The present complaint is undoubtedly sufficient in form to tender the issue of damages to an interest in property taken for a public use. See Tyler v. Tehama County, 109 Cal. 618, 625, 42 P. 240.

The judgment is reversed.

STALEY v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA et al.

L. A. 17588.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 29, 1941.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1941.

1. Attorney and client ⇐6

Where any dissatisfied applicant can show that he was denied passage of state bar examinations through fraud, imposition, or coercion, or that he was prevented from fair opportunity to take examinations, the Supreme Court will listen to his complaints, but inability to pass examinations which are successfully passed by other applicants will not be inquired into.

2. Attorney and client ⇐4

General qualifications of an applicant should not be substituted for requisite knowledge of law which one must possess in order to be admitted into the legal profession.

3. Mandamus ⇐168(2)

An applicant for a writ of mandate charging that though he passed the state bar examination held in 1939 with a higher grade than 70 per cent., the Committee of Bar Examiners arbitrarily and capriciously reduced the grade to below a passing mark, and refused to certify his name for admission to the bar, had the burden of showing wherein the determination of the committee was incorrect or unfair.

4. Mandamus ⇐168(2)

Where petitioner for a writ of mandate charged that though he passed the state bar examination in 1939 with a higher grade than 70 per cent., the Committee of Bar Examiners arbitrarily and capriciously reduced his grade to below a passing mark, and refused to certify his name for admission to the bar, the Supreme Court would not assume from his statement of general qualifications concerning education and ability that it was impossible for petitioner to receive the grade given by the Committee.

Claude Minard, of San Francisco, for State Bar of California.

EDMONDS, Justice.

Upon the application of the petitioner, who failed to pass the bar examination held in 1939, this court issued an alternative writ of mandate requiring the Committee of Bar Examiners and The State Bar to show cause why he should not be admitted to practice law in this state. He charges that although he passed the examination with a higher grade than 70 per cent, the board "arbitrarily and capriciously" reduced this to below a passing mark and refused to certify his name for admission to the bar.

In support of his charge against the committee, the petitioner alleges that he "successfully completed the law course" of the University of Michigan in 1914, and also "successfully completed" a post graduate course in legal instruction at Southwestern University, Los Angeles. He also states, generally, that he has the legal learning and ability of the average candidate who successfully passes the bar examination of the State of California. More specifically, he alleges that he has been a commissioned officer in the armed forces of the United States and studied and passed the subject of military law, and that he has practiced before the Industrial Accident Commission with great success.

In a supplemental petition, the petitioner has set out in full the questions asked of him, the answers given, and the grade assigned to each. These grades amount, in the aggregate, to 940 points as against the 1,820 required to pass. In criticism of such marking, he presents a certificate of Charles E. McGinniss that he has read the petitioner's papers and has assigned to his answers a total of 2,121 grade points, which is above the passing grade. Mr. McGinniss states that he is a member of the California bar, that he has been a law editor and professor of law, and that in his opinion the petitioner "is educationally qualified to practice law in the State of California and elsewhere."

By their return, the respondents deny that the petitioner's answers were arbitrarily or capriciously graded. It specifically alleges that his answers to the questions asked of him were carefully, fully and completely read and graded by highly skilled readers who were chosen for their ability to do this work, and it sets forth in detail the methods under which the examination taken by the petitioner was carried on. It also alleges that the records of the committee show that the petitioner has taken eight examinations since the year 1926, and has passed none of them although each examination was determined on its own merits. It also denies that the petitioner successfully completed the regular academic course of law at the University of Michigan, asserting that although the petitioner was at one time a student there, he did not pass a sufficient number of subjects to entitle him to a degree.

The allegations of the petitioner amount to nothing more than a general statement that his answers entitle him to a passing grade notwithstanding the grade given his papers by the Committee of Bar Examiners. He makes no charge of fraud, imposition or coercion, and does not assert that he was denied a fair opportunity to take the examination.

[1, 2] Such a petition falls far short of the requirements laid down by this court in a proceeding to review the examinations given by the committee in 1933. At that time it restated the rule which had been adopted in a previous consideration of the question as follows: "The attitude of this court is that if any dissatisfied applicant can show that he was denied passage of the state bar examinations through fraud, imposition, or coercion, or that in any other manner he was prevented from a fair opportunity to take the examinations, this court will be willing to listen to his complaint. Inability to pass the examinations, which are successfully passed by other applicants, will, of course, not be inquired into by the court. Also, as you have no doubt found out, one's general qualifications are not to be substituted for the requisite knowledge of law which one must possess in order to be admitted into the legal profession." In re Admission to Practice Law, 1 Cal.2d 61, 64, 33 P.2d 829, 830. See, also, Salot v. State Bar, 3 Cal.2d 615, 45 P.2d 203; Spears v. State Bar, 211 Cal. 183, 191, 294 P. 697, 72 A.L.R. 923.

[3, 4] The burden is on the petitioner to show wherein the determination of the board was incorrect or unfair, and this court will not assume from the statement concerning his general qualifications that it was impossible for him to receive the grades given by the Committee of Bar Examiners.

The alternative writ of mandate is discharged and a peremptory writ denied.

HOUSER, Justice.

I dissent.

Section 6060 of the Business and Professions Code, St.1939, p. 353, contains various provisions which relate to the qualifications necessary to be possessed by applicants for admission to practice law in this state, which provisions, among others, include the following requirements: that such applicants shall "Before beginning the study of law, have completed at least two years of college work or have reached the age of twenty-five years"; shall have either "Graduated from a law school accredited by the examining committee requiring substantially the full time of its students for three years. * * * Graduated from a law school accredited by the examining committee requiring a part only of its students' time for four years. * * * Studied law diligently and in good faith for at least four years * * * [and] Have passed a final bar examination given by the examining committee".

The sub-title to section 6066 of the same Code is "Appeal to Supreme Court". The language of that section is as follows: "Any person refused certification to the Supreme Court for admission to practice may have the action of the board, or of any committee authorized by the board to make a determination on its behalf, pursuant to the provisions of this chapter, reviewed by the Supreme Court, in accordance with the procedure prescribed by the court." (Emphasis added.)

From the title of section 6066 and the language employed in said section, it is clearly apparent that in enacting such provision it was the intention of the legislature to give to a rejected applicant for admission the right to "Appeal to [the] Supreme Court" from a "determination" or "action of the board, or of any committee authorized by the board to make a determination on its behalf",—and thereupon to have such "determination" or "action * * * reviewed by the Supreme Court". And, in that connection, it would seem extremely unlikely that by such enactment the legislature ever contemplated anything other than that on the taking of such an appeal the Supreme Court, by and through the members thereof, would actually personally review the "determination" or "action" by the board of governors, or its examining committee, by a genuine and painstaking re-examination of the several questions which theretofore had been propounded to the applicant, as well as the respective answers which had been made by the applicant to such questions,—and thereupon, as an independent action by the court, reach a conclusion on the question whether in truth and in fact the applicant was entitled to be admitted to practice law in this state. In my opinion, the fact that by the terms of the statute the Supreme Court is authorized to prescribe the "procedure" to be followed in such a matter cannot affect the substantive right that is conferred upon the applicant to have his examination papers "reviewed" by this court. In other words, other than by prescribing "procedure" this court has no authority to legislate and thereby attach conditions under which the right of the applicant may be affected. Nor can the fact that literally hundreds of rejected applicants simultaneously may seek relief from a situation identical in all respects with that here presented alter or in any wise affect the substantive right accorded to each of such individual applicants. The time of the Supreme Court may be, and without doubt is, fully occupied with the ordinary business of the court; but that fact should not of itself present a good or a sufficient reason for it either to neglect or to refuse to perform the additional and burdensome duty thrust upon it by reason of such legislative enactment. Clearly, any "procedure" which this court may adopt in the premises must relate not to any diminution of the primary right of a petitioner, but, rather,—as is indicated within the terms of the act,—must be concerned solely with the manner in which he must act or proceed in bringing to the official attention of the court the essential fact that he is or has been an "unsuccessful applicant for admission to practice, after he has taken any examination" (section 6065, Bus. and Prof. Code), and that the board of bar governors has "refused certification to the Supreme Court for [applicant's] admission to practice" (section 6066, Bus. and Prof. Code).

In his petition for "review", neither by express language contained in the statute, nor by any meaning to be implied therefrom, is the rejected applicant required to ascribe any reason, whether real or fanciful, why the board refused to certify the fact that he be entitled to be admitted to the practice of law in this state. However, as is stated in the prevailing opinion herein, the instant proceeding is a hearing by this court which has occurred by reason of the fact that heretofore, at the instance of petitioner, an alternative writ of mandate was issued by which "the Committee of Bar Examiners and The State Bar" were required "to show cause why he [petitioner] should not be admitted to practice law in this state". By its judgment, as is expressed in its majority opinion herein, this court has decided that "The burden is on the petitioner to show wherein the determination of the board was incorrect or unfair, * * *." (Emphasis added.) It here may be noted that the bar of this state formerly—although possibly erroneously—has entertained that which now may be termed a ridiculous notion, to wit: that when, as a consequence of the issuance of an alternative writ of mandate, the respondent therein has been specially directed or ordered to show cause why the said respondent had not pursued a designated course, as expressly indicated in such order,—in response thereto,—the final duty was cast upon such respondent (and not upon the petitioner for the writ) to actually show cause as directed. Section 71, "Mandamus", 16 Cal.Jur. p. 875.

Within the prevailing opinion herein the rule is quoted that, in a proceeding of this kind, unless the petitioner therein make a showing of "fraud, imposition or coercion", or that he had been denied "a fair opportunity to take the examinations", this court would not "be willing to listen to his complaint". Citing In re Admission to Practice Law, 1 Cal.2d 61, 64, 33 P.2d 829; Salot v. State Bar, 3 Cal.2d 615, 45 P.2d 203; Spears v. State Bar, 211 Cal. 183, 191, 294 P. 697, 72 A.L.R. 923. However, on examination of the cited authorities, particularly with respect to the facts of those respective cases, it becomes apparent that none of them is clearly applicable to the factual situation here involved. Moreover, the rule set forth in the prevailing opinion, as was announced in Re Admission to Practice Law, 1 Cal.2d 61, 64, 33 P.2d 829, was amplified in the later case of Salot v. State Bar, 3 Cal.2d 615, 617, 45 P.2d 203. In that case, following the statement that the remedy (if any) of a rejected applicant for admission to practice law in this state in effect must be based upon "fraud, imposition or coercion", the important, if not controlling, and necessarily essential and conclusive language of the court is: "or that he has been treated unfairly or unjustly". (Emphasis added.) It therefore would seem to follow that even though a petitioner be unable, or should fail, to show either "fraud, imposition or coercion", nevertheless (assuming that the burden is upon him), if he can show that he has been treated either "unfairly or unjustly", he still may be entitled to the relief which he seeks.

Considering the complete language of the announced rule (Salot v. State Bar, 3 Cal.2d 615, 617, 45 P.2d 203) and both the circumstances prior to and ordinarily following the process of examining applicants for admission to practice law in this state, it is difficult, if indeed possible, to comprehend the reason (if any) for the use in the announced rule of the words "fraud" and "coercion". Manifestly, the facts relating to any alleged fraud (except with respect to constructive or implied fraud) which was or might have been practiced upon an applicant would not be available to him; and how or in what manner any applicant could or might be "coerced" with reference to his examination must be and forever remain a dark and deep secret! But as to the significance of the word "imposition", it is clear that the existence of circumstances might have been surmised which would or did justify its use. As presently employed, it probably imports something akin to the words "unfairly or unjustly", which so closely follow the former word. But, again considering the nature of the proceeding at bar, it is beyond ordinary comprehension how petitioner properly could complain of an assumed fact "that in any * * * manner he was prevented from a fair opportunity to take the examinations". (Emphasis added.) Certain it is that such a situation did not obtain herein. In the main, petitioner's complaint consists not in the fact that he was prevented from taking the examination but is to the effect that in the grading which was given his answers to the questions that were propounded to him he was either imposed upon, or he was treated "unfairly or unjustly"; and in order to illustrate such asserted fact to the ordinary mind, or to induce such a conclusion by this court, he has submitted with his petition a verbatim copy of the several questions and his respective answers thereto. They are as follows, to-wit:

Peters owned two cows, Nellie and Bossy, which he grazed upon his ranch, Blackacre. Nellie was stolen in August, 1935, by a neighbor, Daniels, who regularly used her in his dairy until September, 1937, at which time he sold her by bill of sale to one Smith, who was unaware of her previous theft by Daniels. Smith has since kept her together with a calf to which she gave birth in October, 1937.

Bossy was wrongfully converted by Daniels in August, 1938. Peters secured a judgment for her value against Daniels in July, 1939, but has been unable to collect anything thereunder.

In August, 1939, one Jones removed some grain worth $100 from Blackacre in the honest belief that the particular area from which the grain was taken was part of an adjoining tract which he had leased. Jones has made liquor worth $210 from the grain.

All of the above facts occurred in the state of Magenta, which has a statute providing that an action for the recovery of personal property must be commenced within three years. In October, 1939, Peters asks you whether he is entitled to recover either by suit or peaceable self help:

(1) Nellie and her calf from Smith.

(2) Bossy from Daniels.

(3) The liquor or the value thereof from Jones.

"Answer No. 1

(1) It is elementary law that a thief can never give title to the stolen property so it is apparent that Daniels could not confer title in his transfer to Smith.

As the possession of Smith commenced on September, 1937, the three-year statute of limitations is not applicable. Smith being unable to convey any title; Daniels is regarded as having only the right of temporary possession until such time as the owner, Peters, chooses to take appropriate steps to recover 'Nellie.'

As Daniels did not acquire any title to 'Nellie' from this it follows that he could not convey any and the calf of 'Nellie' is the property of the owner of the animal but as title remained at all times in Peters, the natural increase of the cow 'Nellie', being her calf, is the property of Peters.

The good faith of Smith in buying the cow from Daniels does not enter into the question as a thief cannot pass title.

The right of self help exists on the part of Peters and he may peaceably take Nellie and her calf from Smith and he has the additional legal remedy of what is known in common law states as Replevin and in the code states as Claim and delivery, in instances where a particular chattel or personal property is demanded by the owner.

(2) As Peters has a judgment in the instance of 'Bossy', all of his remedies have been merged in the action in which he secured his judgment. One has an election of remedies and in commencing an action he may take his choice but when action is taken there is a merger of such remedies in the final judgment. Where remedies are inconsistent; the choice of one and its culmination in judgment bars the use of another.

As the right of self help is inconsistent with the action taken by Peters in the case of 'Bossy'; he cannot exercise 'self help.'

(3) As the mistake of Jones was not in any way induced by Peters no element of estoppel exists as to the parties. Something more than an 'honest belief' on the part of Jones must exist. There must have been some act or omission on the part of Peters. The leading case on this subject is the California case of Biddle Boggs v. Mining Co., reported in 14 Cal. 279. This case lays down the law regarding boundaries and estoppel. There must have been a misrepresentation on the part of Peters or a statement as to boundaries made with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of the truth, coupled with an intention for the other party to act but none of these elements exist.

Peters would have been entitled to the grain and the question arises as to whether the change of the grain into liquor by the process of distillation defeats Peters in his right to recover.

Jones in taking the grain was a mere trespasser and his honest belief does not alter the legal situation for the reasons stated.

The change in character from grain to liquor does not defeat the right of Peters to recover his property and if the law were otherwise the rightful claim of an owner to property could be defeated by a change of form.

This being so Peters has the right of peaceable self help as Jones was a mere trespasser in the acquisition of the grain. The change of form from grain to liquor does not defeat this right and while Peters by taking the liquor acquires the right to seize his property in the altered form as the law regards the liquor as the property of Peters.

Peters has the additional right of legal action. He may sue Jones for conversion of property or bring an action for a money judgment for the value of the grain. He could not recover for the value of the liquor as the law of damages limits him [to] the value of the grain and any injury to his freehold.

As the value of the liquor exceeds that of the grain by $110, it is obvious that the right of self help is the more advantageous of the remedies.

While it might seem harsh that Jones should lose the additional value enhanced in the process of distillation yet the law regards him as a wrongdoer in the first instance even though he acted in good faith.

"Question No. 2

Knapp owned in the state of Magenta two tracts of land, Blackacre and Whiteacre. Blackacre he was induced to sell and convey to Brown through the fraud of the latter. Brown in turn sold and conveyed the land to Black, who had no notice of Brown's fraud and paid value for the land.

Later Knapp discovered the fraud which had been committed against him and went into possession of Blackacre, claiming that the sale to Brown was void. He stayed in possession for one year, planting and harvesting a crop of wheat. While the grain was still lying in sacks on the ground, Black, who, not having occupied the land himself after his purchase, had just learned of Knapp's action, peaceably retook possession of Blackacre and claimed the grain as his own.

Meanwhile Knapp had leadsed Whiteacre to White for five years beginning January 1, 1937, at a yearly rental of $1000, payable on the first of each year. In December, 1937, White abandoned the premises. In February, 1938, he mailed the keys to the farmhouse and other buildings on the premises to Knapp, saying he repudiated the lease. Knapp kept the keys but at no time after White's abandonment attempted to communicate in any way with him, and on February 2, 1939, he relet the premises to another for the remainder of the original term at a yearly rental of $500 the most he could reasonably secure.

Knapp now asks you:

(1) Whether he is entitled to the grain on Blackacre;

(2) What his rights are against White, only the first year's rent ever having been paid under the lease of Whiteacre.

Advise Knapp.

"Answer No. 2

(1) Black was an innocent purchaser for value of Blackacre and he received a good title from Brown as Black acted without any notice, actual or constructive of the fraud of Brown.

Knapp in going onto Blackacre and planting the crop was a mere trespasser and as Black did not know of Knapp's act until after the grain had ripened, there is no element of estoppel present. (Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 279.) Black having not only the title but the right to possession at all times was entitled to the grain.

Knapp is not entitled to the grain.

(2) The legal question involved is whether Knapp in renting Whiteacre after the default of White, has waived his right to recover for the entire term of White's lease. White in mailing back the keys and repudiating the lease clearly demonstrated his intention of noncompliance with the terms of the lease.

Under these circumstances the owner, Knapp, had the right to rent the property to another and treat the lease to White as breached by White. Knapp would not be required to keep the property vacant and subject to the occupancy by White as White has clearly shown he would not reoccupy. Knapp had the right to diminish damages by renting his property to another and Knapp may sue White for the period of January, 1938, to February 2, 1939; at the rate of $1,000 a year, and from February 2, 1939, to date of filing suit at the rate of $500 being the difference in the lease price and the actual second rental and Knapp may sue for such period of rent on the basis of yearly loss of $500; or Knapp may elect to wait until just before the period of four years from December, 1937, the date of default, and sue White for the accumulated damages based upon the yearly rental of $1,000, while the property was vacant and the loss of $500, at a yearly rate under the second letting.

As we have a four year period of limitations for bringing actions under an instrument in writing; Knapp if he elects to wait instead of suing White, each year for the loss; may later sue at the end of the fifth year for the difference in rent; as the breach would have been for the last year of the lease.

Question No. 3. Grade 35

Question No. 4. Grade 30

"Question No. 3

Adams, who had for ten years owned Greenacre, having an opportunity to purchase Blackacre at an exceptionally low price, decided to buy the tract and to organize a corporation to which he could sell the two pieces of land. Greenacre had originally cost Adams only $100,000 but its present market value is $200,000. Adams paid $50,000 for Blackacre, although its present market value is $100,000.

In pursuance of his plan, Adams organized the Enterprize Corporation, installed his wife and two sons as the first directors, and caused stock to be issued to the public. The corporation then purchased Greenacre and Blackacre from Adams for $200,000 and $100,000 respectively. Shortly thereafter, a new board of directors was elected and now desires to bring suit against Adams.

(1) What damages, if any, can the corporation recover from Adams as a result of its purchase of Blackacre? Greenacre?

(2) Is the corporation liable to Adams for the reasonable amount of the expenses he incurred in organizing the corporation?

(3) Discuss the liability of the corporation and of Adams on a contract made by Adams prior to incorporation in the name of 'Enterprise Corporation' with one

Thomas, who agreed to furnish certain goods to the corporation for six months after incorporation at a stipulated price.

The corporation received the goods knowing of the contract made by Adams, but now refuses to pay Thomas on the basis that neither its board of directors nor officers had taken any action to affirm the contract.

"Answer No. 3

(1) It is assumed that the time of organization of the Enterprize Corporation is contemporaneous with the 'present market value' of the parcels of land involved. Under this assumption there would have been no fraud or unfairness on the part of Adams.

A corporate officer has a fiduciary relation regarding the corporation. He may not make secret profits and in all his dealings with the corporate property he is required to show good faith.

While there had been an increase in the increment of the parcels of land involved it seems that Adams could have marketed the land at the time he sold it to the corporation for the same price. This being true, there was no advantage gained by Adams. The circumstances that his relatives were also officers does not affect the situation as there is not any breach of fiduciary relation on the part of Adams.

The corporation cannot recover on either parcel as they did not sustain any loss and there was no irregularity as a corporate officer in the conduct of Adams.

(2) A corporation is liable for the reasonable amount of money in the form of expense incurred and paid by one of its officers but where the expense is incurred only the money may never be paid. Adams has only a contingent liability for them but until his liability becomes absolute by payment by him the corporation would not be liable.

(3) While there was no corporate entity at the time that Adams contracted with Thomas, yet when the Enterprize Corporation received the goods, knowing that Adams had contracted with Thomas anticipating the formation of the corporation; the Enterprise Corporation ratified the act of Adams.

Under the law of Agency the acts of an agent, who was not at the time authorized to act, may be ratified and this may be done by assuming the benefit of the acts of the agent.

The corporation cannot both hold the goods and refuse to pay. Formal ratification is not required as the corporation has retained the goods. The retention of the goods purchased by Adams is an act of ratification and the corporation must pay the stipulated price.

"Question No. 4

On a trial for the murder of P, D's defense is that P was the aggressor and that D reasonably believed it necessary to shoot P in self-defense. D offers to prove that P and D had been rivals for the same girl, that P had approached D with a gun in his hand, and that P, as D learned after the killing, had told others shortly before that he would kill D on sight.

D offers testimony of W, a service station attendant, that W saw P shortly before the shooting heading toward D's house, that P 'appeared to be angry' and that he was then carrying a weapon (previously introduced in evidence) which, though in fact incapable of shooting, 'would reasonably be mistaken for a real gun'.

On cross-examination of W the prosecution asks him if he is related to D and the witness answers 'No'. The prosecution then asks W his age. He replies '25.' The prosecution now offers the testimony of C, cousin of W's, that W is a relative of D's and that W had a day before, at W's house, told C of the relationship. The prosecution also offers a certified copy of W's birth certificate showing him to be 30 years old.

(1) For what purposes, if any, may the statements made by P be introduced?

(2) Is W's testimony admissible?

(3) Is C's testimony admissible?

(4) Is the certified copy of the birth certificate admissible?

"Answer No. 4

(1) The statements of 'P' are not admissible for any purpose as it appears that such statements were not communicated to 'D' until after the killing; and as the pretended weapon would not in fact shoot; the declarations of 'P' could not be introduced even for the purpose of proving a plan of action. While statements of an assailant to homicide cases are admissible for the purpose of proving a plan of action or for the purpose of showing that the Defendant had known of the statements and on that basis had reasonable cause to fear for his life; the circumstances of this case do not warrant the introduction of 'P's' statements.

In Self Defense it is required to show that the threats were communicated, that they were believed by the Defendant and that the Defendant also believed that the assailant also had the power to execute the threats at the time of the act.

(2) Under section 2052 of our Code of Civil Procedure, a witness may be impeached by asking him regarding inconsistent statements made at variance with his testimony. The procedure is to ask the witness if he made such statements; if he wishes to explain them, and then to introduce the impeaching testimony. The first step is 'laying the foundation' and the second is the impeachment. The inconsistent statements may have been made out of court and if they are material or relevant and not incompetent, they may be introduced.

W may be impeached by showing that he stated falsely regarding his age as the court or jury may be entitled to this information in forming an opinion as to the maturity of the witness.

His relationship, according to his statements may also be shown as it would prove bias and favor. The principle of 'Falsus in uno falsus in omnibus' enters.

(3) The statement of 'W' may be proven by 'C' as the latter is an impeaching witness. The law regards one who makes inconsistent statements as subject to impeachment.

(4) Yes. The court or jury estimate the witness by his age, among other attributes; and the copy of the birth certificate being certified it tends to show that 'W' testified falsely. It is conventional procedure, in examining a witness to ask him about his age, among other qualification. The cross examining attorney may impeach the witness by introducing the certificate.

Question No. 5 Grade 20

Question No. 6 Grade 15

"Question No. 5

A owned a bull known by him to be extraordinarily vicious. One day the bull escaped from A's pasture without negligence on the part of A, and entered B's land. B saw the bull rush at him, but carelessly waited too long before running for cover and was gored. C, the wife of B, was standing with B when the bull appeared; she ran at once, but in her excitement tripped and fell, thereby suffering a minor injury. She then managed to proceed to safety. However, she sustained fright and mental shock resulting from realization of her own danger and her husband's injuries, and she ultimately suffered a miscarriage therefrom.

For what, if anything, may B and C, or either of them, recover? Discuss fully.

"Answer No. 5

The degree of care which the law requires 'A' to manifest in the custody of a domesticated animal seems to have been satisfied in this case. While an owner of a domestic animal might, under some circumstances, be held liable when the owner had notice or knowledge of the vicious propensities of the animal; in this case it appears that the escape of the bull from the pasture was 'without negligence on the part' of 'A'.

The law does not impose upon the owner of a domesticated animal the same extraordinary degree of care that it imposes upon one who harbors a wild animal. The owner of domesticated animal is not absolutely liable for any damage caused by the animal even tho' he knew it vicious propensities.

Applying the rule above stated in reference to the facts of the case it seems that 'B' in carelessly waiting too long was guilty of contributory negligence and that bars his recovery.

The law consistently refuses to give damages for mere mental shock or nervous fright. The cases hold that there must be some actual, physical injury, before one may recover. The statement of facts concerning 'C' states a minor injury but she managed to proceed to safety. The miscarriage suffered by 'C' was not directly resultant from any actual injury inflicted by 'A's' bull and she cannot recover for that.

The recovery of 'C' would be limited to the minor injury mentioned in her escape; if there had been negligence on the part of 'A' but as there was none there can be no recovery.

"Question No. 6

A agreed in writing with B to sell B a specified pleasure car which he promised to deliver to B 'as soon as it could possibly be secured from the factory'. In consideration thereof, B promised to pay $1500 'if A delivered the car with reasonable promptness after the same could be obtained from the factory'. A delivered the car to B's premises, during the latter's absence, two days later than it would have been possible for him to do so. B refuses to keep or pay for the car.

B has also written C, his nephew, that in the event C took a trip to Alaska, B would give him a new Packard Six coupe. C did take the trip, but B refuses to give him the car.

A and C now threaten suits against B, who asks you whether:

(1) A has a cause of action for breach of contract;

(2) C has a right to damages for non-delivery of the car.

Advise B.

"Answer No. 6

(1) The provision in the agreement regarding delivery 'as soon as it could possibly be secured from the factory' is modified by the other clauses to the effect that delivery would be made 'with reasonable promptness.' A period of two days, in itself, is not an unreasonable lapse of time for the delivery to the residence of 'B'. While the car could have been possibly delivered sooner; it was delivered with reasonable promptness.

In the absence of any stipulation regarding the place of delivery it was proper for 'A' to deliver the car to 'B's' premises.

'A' has a cause of action against 'B' for breach of contract.

(2) 'C' has no cause of action against either. There was no privity of contract between 'A' and 'C'. 'B' is not liable to 'C' for the reason that the law does not regard a promise of the character of the one that "B" gave to 'C' as actionable. The question is not justiciable.

The advice to 'B' is to accept the car or to suffer suit at the hands of 'A' for the amount of the profit that 'A' would have made from the sale.

Question No. 7 Grade 35
Question No. 8 Grade 10

"Question No. 7

Ben Actor has retired and lives comfortably upon the income and proceeds from large investments made during earlier years when he was world renowned as a playwright and actor. His only activity is the occasional uncompensated coaching of members of the 'Actor Repertory Players, Inc.' a professional dramatic company which regularly sends a troupe of players on tour in the United States. The playbills usually refer to the fact that Actor has personally coached most of the players.

Alex Lear, an unprincipled rival of Actor's in the old days, and presently owner of a competing dramatic company, is writing his memoirs to be published soon in a national magazine of wide circulation. In one of his chapters he describes a certain illicit affair Actor is said to have carried on clandestinely with his leading lady, and states that Actor today is secretly supporting an illegitimate child which resulted from said affair. This story is untrue, as Lear knows.

The articles constituting these memoirs also are to contain the following: 'Now he is patriarchal godfather to the anaemic "Actor Repertory Players, Inc."—which contributes its chapter to the history of the illegitimate stage by subsisting upon the fruits of stolen copyrights and by bribing critics for the few favorable reviews its performers so consistently never deserve.' These charges are false, as Lear knows.

Lear also has hired a number of thugs who are to kidnap Ima Beauty, the leading lady of 'Actor Repertory Players, Inc.' upon the nights of important engagements.

As attorney for Actor, 'Actor Repertory Players, Inc.' and Beauty, give your opinion, with reasons, as to what injunctive relief, if any, will be extended your clients against the threatened wrongs.

"Answer No. 7

Injunctive relief lies, in other proper cases, where there is no plain, speedy nor adequate remedy at law.

While an injunction will not issue merely to restrain the commission of a crime; yet where the threatened act is also a violative of a property right and damages at law would not suffice; injunctive relief may be given.

Ben Actor has no property right to be protected as his services are contributed and voluntary and while his professional reputation might and probably would be damaged, it appears that he is retired from the acting profession.

Ben Actor cannot make out a case for injunctive relief.

The 'Actor Repertory Players' have a property right which can and should be protected by injunctive relief. While there is also a legal remedy, the threatened publication should be restrained for the reasons that the libel laws would not secure to the 'Actor Repertory Players, Inc.' the full measure of relief which could be obtained by injunction.

The actors themselves are distinct entities from their corporation. While the corporate entity is damaged yet the actors who function under it are likewise injured; even tho' they are not named as individuals. If the corporation, as an artificial person has a property right, and it has; that right may only be fully protected by injunctive relief. A multiplicity of suits is apparent.

Ima Beauty is also entitled to injunctive relief for the reason that the sufficiency of her legal remedy does not meet the test laid down above. A multiplicity of suits would be involved in litigation in behalf of Ima Beauty. Even if such suits were instituted and the Defendants were able to, and did respond in damages, injuries suffered by her might terminate her professional career. The right of 'Ima Beauty' to star in the various performances is a property right which should be protected by injunction. Equity will protect such a right even tho' a crime is also involved.

Daniels walked into a drug store operated by Peters, went to the cigar counter, and selected three cigars, handing Peters a twenty-dollar bill. Peters handed Daniels his change, which included a ten-dollar bill.

Daniels then reached in his pocket and said: 'Pardon me, I don't have to take all your change. I just discovered I have a one-dollar bill.' 'Fine,' replied Peters. Daniels then purported to hand Peters the change he had been given, but 'palmed' the ten-dollar bill and did not return it. Peters thanked Daniels and returned the twenty-dollar bill.

Immediately after Daniels left the store Peters discovered his loss. Daniels did the same thing in another drug store a few hours later, but was apprehended as he left the store.

With reference to his activities in Peters' store, of what crime or crimes is Daniels guilty?

"Answer No. 8

Daniels is guilty of Theft as his acts, under common law would amount to embezzlement and under our Penal Code the distinction between larceny and that crime are abolished and both are made Theft. The value being ten-dollars, the crime is petty theft.

Daniels is also guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses as he is using a trick and device within the meaning of our Penal Code. The intent to work a scheme by trick and device is shown by the operations of Daniels in the other store following his commission of the act in the store of peters.

Mitchell was a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The act under which he had been appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the senate provided that a commissioner could be removed by the President for 'inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office'. The President, however, removed Mitchell because of differences in political philosophy, although disclaiming the imputation of any wrong-doing by Mitchell.

The city of Fairview, state of Magenta, passed an ordinance making it a misdemeanor to maintain a brick kiln, whether established prior or subsequent to the effective date of the ordinance, within a described residential district of the city. Mitchell maintains and had maintained for several years prior to the ordinance, a brick kiln within the prohibited area. Enforcement of the ordinance would decrease the value of his property 50 per cent.

The state of Magenta also enacted a statute setting up a board of censors and prohibiting under penalty of fine and imprisonment the exhibition of motion pictures other than those found by the board to be 'moral, educational, or amusing and harmless in character'. Mitchell owns a motion picture house in Magenta.

Discuss the constitutionality, as applied to Mitchell, of:

(1) His removal by the President from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(2) The ordinance prohibiting the brick kiln;

(3) The statute providing for censorship of motion picture shows.

"Answer No. 9

(1) This seems to be 'on all fours' with the Humphrey's Case. Humphrey was a Commissioner, appointed under a previous administration and President Roosevelt sought to remove him from office under substantially the same theory mentioned in the question.

The Supreme Court of the United States in reviewing the Humphrey case held that as the advice and consent of the Senate was necessary to the appointment, that a difference in political philosophy, or social or economic views between the Commissioner and the President was not a ground for the removal of Mr. Humphrey.

The only authority for removal is found in the act and in the course followed the President acted without authority of law. On the basis of the Humphrey case; the removal was contrary to organic law because the mode of removal, provided for in the Statute was not followed. When an office is created by an act under the authority of the Constitution the method of removal under the Act must be followed. It follows that Mitchell is entitled to the office.

(2) It has been generally held that if an occupation or calling is followed, that is not in itself a nuisance per se, that ordinances of the nature of the one under consideration are violative of constitutional rights.

While the Police Power extends to the making of laws for the General Welfare, Sanitation, Health, Safety, Morals and like purposes; it has been held that this power cannot be used to prohibit the operation of a business that does not, in itself, conflict with any of these purposes and that where one had established a business or calling prior to the enactment of such an ordinance, that the ordinance conflicts with the right of the proprietor to conduct such business as it would be a taking of property without due process of law.

(3) The valid exercise of the Police Power includes legislation enacted for the protection of the morals of the people. It would be difficult to conceive a more potent and widespread means of propagation of public thought than is to be found in motion pictures.

Motion Picture theatres are to be found in every city and almost every town in the United States.

If films could be made and exhibited without censorship by a State; the State would lose effective control over the most powerful means of influencing public morals than any other agency, with the exception of the press; and probably many of our people are influenced by motion pictures who are not influenced at all by newspapers.

This is because the influence of the paper is usually found in its editorial section while the influence of the movie comes, unconsciously, to the audience in the form of entertainment.

While the language of the statute is very broad and general, it seems to contain sufficient terms to be a valid exercise of the Police Power of the State. The word 'amusing' is liberally defined to mean 'entertaining.'

Each state has the right to enact suitable legislation for the protection of the morals of their people and in this case, it is properly exercised, altho' the language of the Statute could be greatly improved.

Question No. 10 Grade 40

Question No. 11 Grade 75

"Question No. 10

Adams, Blake and Clay constituted the board of directors of the Drumm Corporation. At a meeting of the shareholders a committee was elected to advise the directors on matters of corporate management. The directors having indicated that they were considering executing a certain contract within the scope of the corporate business, the committee counselled against the advisability and the shareholders at a special meeting unanimously passed a resolution in opposition to making the contract. Nevertheless, the directors entered into the contract, which it is conceded was reasonably appropriate for corporate purposes.

Adams was a man of nationwide reputation who had been induced to serve gratuitously as a director in order to lend prestige to the corporation. Inasmuch as he resided at a great distance from the corporation and was extremely busy, Adams was told by the president of the corporation, at the time he became a director, that he would not be expected to attend meetings or engage actively in the management of the corporation.

Had Adams taken an ordinarily active part in the corporate affairs he would have discovered that the corporation's treasurer was engaged in the practice of embezzling from the company's funds. The shareholders demanded of the directors that they take action against the treasurer, but the treasurer, being a relative of Clay's, the directors refused.

Blake, knowing that the directors had just completed a transaction which would be highly profitable to the corporation, bought the stock of Smith, a shareholder. Blake was not asked about nor did he reveal anything concerning the corporation's affairs. The stock was actually worth twice the amount which Blake paid for it and for which it was selling on the open market.

(1) If loss resulted from the contract which the directors made against the wishes of the shareholders and their advisory committee, would the directors be liable?

(2) Do the shareholders have any way to redress in a civil action the wrong committed by the treasurer? Discuss.

(3) Would Adams be liable for the loss caused the corporation by the treasurer's embezzlement?

(4) Does Smith have a right to avoid the purchase of stock by Blake?

"Answer No. 10

In a corporate structure the directors have specific duties which they, alone, are required to observe and under which they function. Among these duties are the exercise, by the directors of discretionary powers. While stockholders may advise the directors, and as they did in this case elect a commitee; still they cannot displace the discretion of the directors nor the legal authority under which the directors operate.

The directors in their functioning may, and as a matter of pragmatism, often do commit error. Errors of judgment alone, do not render the directors liable. If the directors were solely guided by shareholder's committees they would be liable if they attempted to delegate their discretion as the law places this responsibility on the directors alone.

The proper course for the stockholders who distrust the ability of the directors is to replace the directors.

As the contract was 'reasonably appropriate for corporate purposes' the directors properly exercised their discretion, which is nondelegible; and they cannot be held liable for any loss which might have resulted from the execution of the contract.

(2) The duty of Adams, as a director, required that he give his time and attention to the affairs of the corporation. He could not do this by acting in a perfunctory manner. Had he functioned in the way required by law he must have discovered the defalcations of the treasurer. The Constitution of the State of California for many years embraced a clause requiring that directors of corporations be liable for the embezzling by an employee or officer and similar breaches of trust.

This provision was only affirmatory of the common law in instances where the directors knew, or from the circumstances should have known of the defalcations.

The refusal or failure of the directors to take action in the matter of the treasurer at the demand of the shareholders certainly made the directors, including Adams, liable for the amount lost to the corporation thru the embezzling.

The shareholders may bring an action against the directors.

(3) Yes, explained in '2' above.

(4) The relation of a director concerning the affairs of the corporation and the affairs of a stockholder and the corporation are fiduciary. The law imposes upon the director the duty of acting with the utmost good faith in all such matters. The director may not remain quiescent concerning a secret profit he may have made when the source of knowledge comes to him thru his functioning as a director of the corporation. The director may not tacitly engage in profitable operations for himself when such operations conflict with any duty he owes to the corporation as an artificial entity, or to the stockholders as persons in whose behalf the director functions.

Had the corporation purchased the stock of Smith at the price which Blake paid, it is obvious that the corporation would have enjoyed the same profit, on resale, or would have reduced the outstanding stock. In either event it would have been highly advantageous to the corporation.

Blake, in using knowledge which came to him as a director engaged in an operation which conflicted with his duties in his fiduciary relations.

"Question No. 11

In a personal injury action brought by Phillips against Dodge, Adams, an attorney for the plaintiff, is permitted, over defense objection, to take the stand and testify he saw the defendant shortly before the collision in a drunken condition. The defense, on cross-examination of Adams, is allowed to ask, over the objection of associate counsel for the plaintiff, whether Adams had not taken the case on a contingent fee basis. The court further rules, over plaintiff's objection, that the defense may ask Adams if Phillips had not been drunk when Adams, an hour after the collision, was called to the jail in which Phillips was incarcerated, and also whether Phillips at such consultation had not admitted that he had been intoxicated.

The court also overrules a defense objection to Adams calling one of the jurors, who thereupon testifies to overhearing Dodge say he had been intoxicated at the time of the injury to Phillips.

After judgment for the defendant the plaintiff moves for a new trial on the ground, among others, that one of the jurors had accepted a bribe for the defendant. At the hearing on the motion, the court, over the defendant's objection, admits an affidavit from one of the jurors that the juror in question had received a bribe.

Discuss the correctness of the court's ruling in each instance.

"Answer No. 11

An attorney may be witness for his client. This is frowned upon as a matter of ethics and it should not be done but it may be done.

When an attorney does become a witness his bias or partiality may be shown, as in the instance of any other witness. How better may the bias of a witness be shown than by proving that he has a financial interest in the outcome of the litigation contingent upon its terminating favorably for the party for whom he testified?

Adams should be compelled to testify as to whether he took the case on a contingency.

An attorney, under our code, may not testify to confidential communications received in the scope of his professional duties, without the consent of his client.

The condition of intoxication is not a confidential communication. Anyone may testify as to that matter. An attorney is not exempted from testifying as to all matters coming under his observation while acting within professional scope. Sharon v. Sharon, 77 Cal. 102, 19 P. 230.

The appearance of the client at the time of the interview, his gait and other matters indicating intoxication may be inquired into and the opinion of the attorney as to intoxication elicited.

However, we cannot compel Adams to testify as to the admission of the client. The law presumes that such a discussion was a confidential communication and comes under the rule of privilege. It appears, from the text of the question that only the attorney, Adams, and the client were present on this occasion, so we cannot inquire as to the admission.

A juror, or the judge, may be called as witnesses in any cause in which they may give admissible evidence. The evidence was a statement against interest on the part of a defendant and comes under section 1870, sub. 2; being 'an act, declaration or omission against interest.' Under the historic development of our law the jurors are competent as witnesses. In fact in the early history of litigation in England they were the 'compurgators' who testified freely concerning the issues.

One of the grounds for a new trial, under our Code of Civil Procedure, is the bribery of a juror and the section specifically provides that the affidavit of a juror may be used for proving the misconduct of the jury in an instance of this kind.

Abbott, a famous painter of Biblical characters, advertised publicly that he intended painting a life size picture of Elijah and solicited bids for its purchase. Byers' offer of $750 being the highest of several received, Abbott agreed orally with Byers that he would paint the picture and sell it to Byers for that price. He completed the painting and advised Byers it was ready; whereupon Byers, in a personal letter to his wife, mentioned, among other things, that 'I have bought a picture from Abbott for $750'. The letter was read by Mrs. Byers and some mutual friends of hers and Abbott's and destroyed.

Later, Byers wrote Abbott as follows: 'I will pay $200 for a life-size painting of Moses', and the next day he wrote: 'I will pay $200 for a life-size painting of Joshua.' Abbott, without notifying Byers, commenced work on both pictures. Hearing from a friend that Abbott was working on the painting of Moses, Byers, without the knowledge of Abbott, contracted to sell it to a customer for $300. When both pictures were one-half completed, Abbott notified Byers of this fact and that he had decided not to finish the painting of Moses, but would finish that of Joshua forthwith. Byers immediately advised Abbott that he had had no idea Abbott had commenced on the painting of Joshua, that he no longer wanted it, that Abbott should consider this offer revoked, but that he would hold Abbott for breach of contract unless the painting of Moses was finished. Abbott completed the picture of Joshua but not that of Moses. Byers now refuses to pay for the painting of Elijah and refused Abbott's tender of that of Joshua.

1. Can Abbott recover for Byers' refusal to accept and pay for the painting of Elijah?

2. Does Abbott have a cause of action for Byers' refusal to accept tender of the painting of Joshua?

(3) Does Byers have a cause of action for Abbott's refusal to complete and deliver the painting of Moses?

"Answer No. 12

(1) Our Statute of Frauds does not enter into the matter (sec. 1973, C.C.P.) for the reason that a painting in the process of completion, or to be painted, comes under the excepted classification.

The ad of Abbott was an offer which was accepted by Byers, as the high bidder. The latter was not required to be communicated to Abbott for the reason that this matter is outside the Statute of Frauds, being a class which was to have been created within the meaning of the Statute. As each picture was distinctive and unique.

(2) Byers makes two distinctive offers concerning different subject matters at different times. While an offer should be accepted the parties may by their course of dealing establish what our Supreme Court of California denominates 'contemporaneous construction of a contract by the parties.' The course of dealing shows that Byers made an offer and then assuming the acceptance by Abbott Byers then offered the subject matter for sale. Abbott, relying upon this offer of Byers, commenced the work of artistic production.

Abbott has a cause of action for the failure of Byers to accept the picture of Joshua. The orders for the pictures were separate transactions concerning different subjects and the contracts were individual matters. The offers having been communicated at different times we have two distinct contracts.

(3) Abbott by commencing work on the picture of Moses established the contemporaneous construction and his act was an acceptance of the offer of Byers. Byers offering the picture for sale to a customer confirmed the contemporaneous construction. The artist apparently refused to finish the picture because he had heard of the profit which Byers expected to enjoy from the transaction but as he had commenced the picture, a contract exists.

Byers has a cause of action against Abbot.

"Question No. 13

Intending to make a will, Wilson typed a one-page document entitled 'Last Will'. It contained the usual formal clauses and read in part: 'Such articles as I shall designate in an inventory that will be found pinned to this will, I leave to Jones.' Following various dispositive clauses, one of which named Smith as a legatee, there was a space with three lines for signatures, and, following this, a residuary clause.

Wilson called in Smith and his stenographer. He signed on the first line in their joint presence, stated it was his will, and requested them to sign on the lines as witnesses. Smith signed and left the room, and twenty minutes later the stenographer signed. Wilson remained present throughout.

Two weeks later Wilson listed on a paper entitled 'For Jones' several articles, none of which was otherwise specifically disposed of in the original document, pinned the list to the letter, and placed both in the envelope. A year later Wilson executed a document entitled 'Codicil' which clearly referred to the original instrument as his will and appointed a different executor to act thereunder. This document, witnessed by Allen and Brown, was duly executed by Wilson in compliance with all local statutory requirements. Wilson placed it in the envelope and a month later died.

Was the original document, prior to execution of the codicil, validly executed as a will?

(2) Assuming that the original instrument and the codicil were validly executed as a will, what are the rights of (a) Jones, (b) Smith?

"Answer No. 1

(1) Our code provision requires that the testator sign the will in the presence of the witness and the witnesses must sign in the presence of each other. As Smith left the room before the signature of the stenographer as a witness the will was not properly witnessed.

The residuary clause followed the signature and must have been below them and as to this clause it was not 'subscribed', which our code requires in a will of this class. As 'subscribed' means to be written below the residuary clause does not satisfy the requirements of the code.

Smith was a legatee and also a witness.

(2) Assuming the validity of the will:

A. There was no testamentary disposition as to the articles to be left to Jones at the time of the making of the will because the testator did not at that time have in mind the things that Jones was to have under the will. While a testamentary clause may refer to other documents or to an inventory then in existence, or contemporaneous with the will, the testator cannot at some future time make testamentary disposition by selecting or inventorying the objects. At the later time he may lack testamentary capacity.

(b) Smith was a witness under the will and cannot, for that reason, take under it.

Question No. 15 Grade 20

Question No. 16 Grade 35

"Question No. 15

The city of Fairview was repairing some sidewalks. Doss, a supervisor of streets, was directed to do the work as part of his regular employment for the city. He piled bricks and stones between one of the walks that was to be repaired and the curb of the street. The pile was very high, insecure, and overhung the curb, but probably would not fall unless touched. The city of Fairview had an ordinance forbidding the riding of bicycles on the sidewalks.

Tommy Parker, five and a half years old, had received a bicycle as a birthday present from his father and had been told not to ride in the street. Mr. Parker wanted some cigarettes and told Tommy to get them at a store around the corner on the same block. In going Tommy would have to pass the pile of bricks, as Mr. Parker knew. Tommy's father said: 'Don't ride in the streets. Stay on the sidewalk.'. As Tommy, on his bicycle, was passing the bricks, one Daniel, driving carefully, ran into the bricks because of a blowout resulting from a nail penetrating a tire. He struck the bricks lightly, but hard enough to cause a few of them to fall from the top of the pile. Tommy was struck and injured by them.

What action or actions, if any, lie in favor of Tommy? Discuss all points suggested by the facts.

"Answer No. 15

Ordinarily a Municipal corporation is not liable for the acts of its employees which result in tortious injuries.

There are exceptions to this rule, one of them being the instance where the employee is an actor in a series of events which result in damage while the employee is acting within the scope of his duties in some proprietary act of the municipality.

In the repair of streets an employee acts for the proprietary benefit of the city, his employer.

The ordinance of the City of Fairview which proscribed the riding of bicycles does not, in itself, preclude recovery as our courts have held that the act which is forbidden by ordinance must have been the basis of the Plaintiff's injury to preclude recovery.

If in the violation of an ordinance of this kind, the Plaintiff necessarily places himself in a position of danger or harm from which injury directly flows, the violation then bars recovery.

Neither the minority or tender years of Tommy nor the instructions of his Father are material to a discussion of the matter.

The ordinance as enacted was a proper and lawful exercise of the Police Power of the city as it directly concerned the safety and welfare of the people. Courts have held that a city could validly pass such an ordinance, restricting the use of bicycles to the streets and prohibiting them on walks.

The negligence of Tommy's father in sending the boy for the cigarettes cannot be imputed to the son.

Daniel in the manouvering of his car, following the blowout was the causative factor in the injury.

Under these circumstances the courts endeavor to determine the proximate cause of the injury.

As the injury was caused by the toppling of the bricks, and this in turn was caused by the collision from Daniel's car; the proximate cause of the injury was the collision.

If Daniel were not negligent in the management of his car Tommy cannot recover.

The circumstances of Daniel's car veering from the street into the brick pile was the result of unfortutious acts beyond the control of Daniels.

Daniels could not anticipate that his tire would 'Pick up' a nail and blow out at the very point and at the very time that Tommy would be riding by the brick pile.

The proximate cause of the injury being the defection of Daniel's car and that being beyond his control to rectify or avoid; Tommy cannot recover.

"Question No. 16

Jonas owned in the state of Magenta a number of stores engaged in the retailing of bread. Competition in the field became so ruthless as to threaten to destroy the price structure upon which the grain growers depended for their livelihood and the community for its bread supply. Production of grain and distribution of bread is a paramount industry of the state.

There are employed in the harvesting of grain large numbers of Japanese toward whom considerable hostility developed. Labor conditions became demoralized.

In view of these conditions, the state of Magenta passed three laws, as follows:

(1) A law providing for a bread control board with power, in accordance with a standard laid down in the statute, to fix minimum and maximum retail prices for bread. The court fixed 9¢ per loaf as the price. Jonas, however, continued to sell bread for 8¢ per loaf. Can he be convicted under the statute?

(2) Making it a misdemeanor for an employer to exact as a condition of securing employment a promise from an employee not to join a labor union. Jonas required such promises from his employees. Can he be convicted under the statute?

(3) Providing that Japanese should be required to attend schools established separately from schools for whites and classifying anyone with more than one-fifth Japanese blood as being a Japanese within the meaning of the statute. A student with one-fourth Japanese blood attacks the statute. Is it constitutional?

"Answer No. 16

(1) A decade ago most courts would have held that the statute fixing the price of bread interfered with the freedom of contract and for that reason it would have been held to have been an unconstitutional statute.

Questions of constitutional law are not only vexing to the harried law student attempting to write on these great questions in the hurry of the moment but have proven perplexing to the courts themselves.

A compilation of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States for the past term would have shown that of appeals from the U. S. Circuit Courts, 45 decisions construing the constitution were reversed and 35 were affirmed.

A further study would show that 93 dissenting opinions were given during the term and that in one case 5 different opinions were given by as many different justices concurring but on entirely different grounds.

Additional statistical study would show that the number of dissenting opinions increase from the period, progressively, from 1933 to date.

The exercise of the power to fix bread prices must be justified in the Police Power of the State but if we were to apply the reasoning of the U. S. Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Rock Royal Corp. Inc., recently decided under the commerce power of the U. S., if we were to apply the decisions of the judges and their reasoning to the state of facts embraced in the question; we must arrive at the constitutionality of the statute.

The constitutional doctrine has undergone many changes in the past year. It is in a state of flux, if not radical revolution; considering the law as we thought we knew it.

It might be argued that bread being the very staff of life, to employ a cliche, is bound up with the health and welfare of the people.

It might also be argued, as the U. S. Supreme Court did in the case cited, that bread (like milk) is vital to the very being of the community and that if it were unregulated chaos would result. Prices would tumble at one period and skyrocket at another.

We might say that the gyrations of prices would be uneconomic and that price stabilization is necessary to the furnishing of a reliable supply of the staff of life.

The doctrine of price fixing is novel to the law of the United States of America. It was given impetus in the N. R. A. campaign and had at various times been advocated as the only course to relieve widespread unemployment and uneconomic conditions.

The effort by courts to sustain measures of the kind here under discussion must result in and emanate from some belief in the judges that supply and demand can be and should be regulated. This is not a province of law, if it were possible of fulfillment.

There is nothing in the statute which in any way concerns the health and welfare of the people of 'Magenta' and there is much in the measure that interferes with the freedom of contract.

The Constitution of the United States became the organic law of the land in 1788, on the ratification of the document by the State of New Hampshire; it being the ninth state to ratify, under the terms of the Constitution.

The provisions of that great document are substantially that of our various State Constitutions which embodied or copied the controlling provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

The provisions of our State Constitutions reflect the wisdom of men of affairs, made wise in the hard school of experience.

It is said, in behalf of measures similar to the one under discussion that we are in a new order of things and that we must progress. The advance in industry and science are cited and the efforts of other countries to achieve regulation by statute or bureau are held up as exemplary methods of governmental procedure and control.

Granting that we are living [in] a rapidly changing age there are certain things which are basic in the scheme of things.

Thomas Jefferson said, as nearly as can be recalled, in discussing the sphere of government, 'If we are to be told when to sow and when to reap. * * *' He then related the difficulties attendant to that sort of thing.

The State which attempts to embark on legislative price fixing, or to organize bureaus, delegating to them the authority to do so will inevitably find itself in conflict with the multiplication table!

The fixing of prices is an unconstitutional exercise of power and as the bread control board acted beyond the pale of constitutional functioning; Jones should not be convicted.

(2) Formerly it was held that an employer might require of a prospective employee that he should not be a member of a labor union, nor join a union. Since the N. R. A. campaign there has been a great reversal of opinion on that subject. It will be recalled that the famous section '7A' of the National Recovery Act provided that there be no discrimination. It provided that an employee might join and belong to any labor organization of his own choosing, or none if he so pleased.

If an employer could require an employee to refrain from joining a labor union the employee could in turn require the employer not to join any employers association or group.

Is freedom of contract affected by the Statute? The employer, if he could exact a promise from the employee of the nature mentioned could restrict the employee in his subsequent status.

Most of our courts have held in passing on these questions that industrial advance, the aggregation of great capital and the almost uniform adherence by employers to employers groups and associations make it necessary that the employee be unrestricted in his status as a member or nonmember, of any labor organization. Jones could be convicted.

(3) Conditions may exist where scholars in a neighborhood may be so predominately of a racial group in number that the efficient and proper course of education might require that a certain school should be attended only by a certain racial group but to be reciprocal it would have to be provided that no other classification of scholars, or pupils, could attend such school.

The classification and method of determination of the racial group would have to be reasonable and based on scientific or ethmological factors.

The Statute under consideration provides that a person having more than one-fifth Japanese blood is a Japanese within the meaning of the statute. This is not only an arbitrary but an illogical and paradoxical method of determining racial extraction. The criterion of determination under the Statute is a way of saying that the lesser is as great as the whole. This evaluation violates the dictates of common sense and what is not common sense is rarely good law.

There may be educational merit in the separation of races. Courts could take judicial notice if the lex loci were Los Angeles, instead of Magneta, that in the Japanese district of the City of Los Angeles there are more than 55 thousand Japanese, racially speaking. If the State of Magenta, embraced within its boundaries a similar subdivision, the Courts of Magenta might also judiciously notice; it being a matter of widespread knowledge that the public schools in the Japanese district, at least in the primary grade, were overwhelmingly composed of those Japanese descent.

The court might under the same circumstances also judiciously know that it is common practice among Japanese parents to place their offspring in Japanese Kindergartens where they are taught by native Japanese teachers in the Japanese language. In these private schools the children of tender years are taught only the Japanese language and culture. They learn the 'Kata-Kana', a simplified Japanese alphabet of some 75 characters, as distinguished from the 'Kanjai', the conventional language of Japan; expressed by the calligraphy borrowed from the Chinese.

Thus, the court of Magenta might indicate their realization of the situation that the legislators might have had in mind; in their attempt to establish a racial school.

Probably legislation which did not conflict with the constitutional restrictions regarding race and religion might be drafted but the determination of racial character in the method employed by the legislators of Magenta is racial discrimination and conflicts with the constitutional guarantees against laws which are restrictive under the conventional language invariably utilized in State Constitutions.

Question No. 18 Grade 50

"Question No. 17

John Jones and Mary Smith married in 1935, and have ever since resided in California. From his salary as a store executive during 1936, Jones in 1937 purchased Blackacre, the conveyance thereof being taken in the name of 'John Jones and Mary Jones, grantees.' In 1938, Jones, also from his salary, purchased Greenacre, the deed to which, with the consent of his wife, named the grantees as 'John Jones and Mary Jones, as joint tenants.'

Shortly after his marriage in 1935, Jones took out a policy of insurance on his life, naming his mother as beneficiary, and has paid all premiums thereon from community funds, without the consent of his wife.

Jones now being seriously ill, his wife asks your advice, based on the facts stated, as to:

(1) Their respective interests in Blackacre.

(2) Their respective interests in Greenacre.

(3) Her rights in the proceeds of the insurance policy in the event of Jones' death.

"Answer No. 17

(1) The earnings of the husband during marriage are community property. The subject matter purchased with such earning is also community unless the parties by some act change the nature of the property.

Jones having purchased Blackacre with community funds and the deed having been made to him and his wife in the conventional manner, this parcel is community property.

The husband during the marriage has the right of management of community property.

As Jones is seriously ill we must assume that Mary inquires as to the possible effect of her property interests in the event of her husband's demise.

As no will is mentioned we must assume that none exists and as no children are mentioned the property which is community, being Blackacre, would go to Mary under our code.

(2) Joint Tenancy is a distinct and peculiar estate in the eye of the law. There exists unity of time, title and interest. On the death of a joint tenant, the estate goes to the surviving joint tenant, or tenants. The joint tenants having unity of time, title and interest, they have equal and indivisible rights to management, occupancy and control.

By the terms of the deed under which the parties here held title the estate in joint tenancy is created. While the earning of the husband in the absence of the deed to him and his wife, in joint tenancy, would otherwise have been community property, the parties in this case have, by taking under the deed, created an estate in joint tenancy.

Mary has a co-equal estate with her husband in joint tenancy during her life time and if he should die the entire estate of Greenacre becomes hers by operation of law.

(3) The insurance policy having been maintained and having been executed during the marriage, the payments being made with community funds, is likewise community property, even though the beneficiary is John's mother. As Mary never acquiesced in the payments made under the policy she should avoid the expense of litigation and clarify the matter by asking her husband to change the policy or make some congenial arrangement. In the event of John's death without such policy change litigation would be necessary to establish the nature of the insurance estate.

"Question No. 18

B purchased from S, a retail tobacco merchant, a box of nationally advertised cigars manufactured by M, B having designated that particular brand as his choice. B told S that he was having a party that evening and wanted to be sure the cigars were fresh. That evening when B opened the box by breaking the seal, he discovered that each cigar was carefully wrapped and sealed in cellophane. While B was smoking one of the cigars it exploded and burned a hole in B's coat. Almost simultaneously, P, a guest, had the same thing happen to his cigar which had also come out of the same box. P's eye was so badly injured that it was necessary to remove it by surgical operation. The remaining cigars in the box were excellent in every respect. Neither S nor M had been negligent.

B and P come to you to see whether they have remedies against S or M or both. What you would tell them? Discuss.

"Answer No. 18

It is generally held that a retailer is not liable for a substance sold by him in an instance where the defect is so concealed and he would have no way of knowing of it and where he purchased the goods in the ordinary channels of trade. There are some exceptions to these decisions in the case of foods served by restaurants but ordinarily the law does not give an action against the retailer of so-called package goods for any damage done by a concealed defect or vice.

It is obvious that the explosions were due to some bit of cellophane, which in some way became concealed in the cigars. How this could happen without negligence on the part of 'M' is not disclosed by the question. The wrapping of the cigars in cellophane is a part of the fabrication of the complete box of cigars in the plant of 'M'. While it is difficult to conceive of circumstances wherein a foreign element such as cellophane is concealed with the wrapper of a cigar without negligence in the manufacturing process; yet the question must be discussed as it stands.

It is generally known that cellophane, being a cellulose product, may be highly inflammable and when compressed, explosive.

A manufacturer who utilizes this substance must at his peril see that none of it could be concealed within such an article as a cigar, which in the process of consumption is subjected to heat and fire.

Discussing the question on the basis that the manufacturer, 'M', had utilized the highest degree of care in the manufacture of the cigars, yet the facts of the case clearly demonstrate that some cellophane was concealed within the cigars and the fact that other or all cigars in the box were perfect does not alter the case.

It is not beyond the realm of possibility that the only two cigars in the box that were dangerous were chosen by the guests or that chance determined this happening.

One who utilizes cellophane of the explosive character used in this matter is 'playing with dynamite' considering the effect of heat and fire and 'M' is liable.

Question No. 20	Grade 20
Question No. 21	Grade 40

"Question No. 20

In January, 1938, the Seaside Realty Company, to promote the sale of lots in a subdivision, entered into a written contract with one Wing, a nationally known aviator and stunt flyer, in which Wing, in return for a salary of $500 per month, agreed to make exhibition flights over the property for one year, and to perform exclusively for the Seaside Company during this period.

At the same time Wing also entered into another written contract with the Seaside Company in which he agreed to purchase a lot for $1000 payable in monthly instalments of $100 beginning March 1, 1938, the land to be conveyed upon the payment of the final installment. The contract provided that the instalments were to be paid upon the first day of every month; that time was of the essence and that non-payment of any instalments when due would forfeit all payments previously made.

The instalments were paid promptly until September, 1938, when Wing neglected to tender payment until September 3rd. This was accepted as were the next two instalments, which were both tendered on November 7th. At that time, however, the company notified Wing that future instalments were payable promptly when due. Wing tendered the final instalment December 2nd, which tender was refused as was Wing's demand for conveyance of the lot.

Wing, in the meantime, having secured a better offer from a competing company, is preparing to fly for it. The Seaside Company seeks your advice in regard to:

(1) Securing an injunction to prevent Wing from performing for the rival company.

(2) A suit instituted by Wing to enforce the specific performance of the contract of sale.

(3) The right of Wing to recover the money paid on the purchase price, if he cannot secure specific performance.

"Answer No. 20

(1) The courts have uniformly held that services which were unique in their rendition may be the subject of equitable relief where a contracting party rendering such services attempts to breach the contract. The leading case on this subject, Lumely v. Wagner, involved the services of an opera singer and most of the cases are concerned with the performance of histrionic or artistic talent but the courts, in many instances, have enjoined business executives who possessed unusual and distinctive ability, at the instance of their employers, from becoming the employee of another.

The employee cannot be compelled to continue work but he may be enjoined from entering the service of another or engaging in service.

The services need not be unique, they may only be unusual or distinctive.

The services for which Wing engaged himself were distinctive as he had acquired a national reputation as a stunt flyer. The purpose of the Seaside Realty Company was to exploit their property by an attraction which would lure prospective purchasers to the site.

Were the services rendered and to be rendered by Wing less unusual or distinctive than those of the average movie star? A stunt flyer engages in an occupation in which there is a high degree of mortality. There is not much future in that vocation. Such men must not only practice for years to control their planes in their gyrations but they must be exceptionally endowed physically, mentally and nervously with most unusual qualifications. Vision must be perfect and a high degree of mental and physical coordination is required.

The various 'stunts' consist of complicated maneuvers such as 'wing overs', 'Innelman Turns', 'Whipstalls' and other manipulations which require the highest degree of talent.

The average stunt flyer requires a higher degree of ability and mental and moral stamina, with unusual physical and nervous attributes to perform his work, than does the average movie star.

As the offer from the rival company came to Wing and he is preparing to fly for it during the period of time for which he contracted to fly for the Seaside Realty Company, an injunction could be secured restraining Wing from so doing.

(2) It is a general rule of equity that specific performance lies to compel the transfer of realty under contract because each piece of land is unique. For this reason there is no remedy at law which is plain, speedy or adequate.

Our California Supreme Court, in a case similar to the one presented has held that where the parties to an installment contract accept installments when past due that the parties themselves have established a contemporaneous construction of the contract.

This is the law even tho' the contract contains a clause reciting that time is of the essence, as this one did in the question.

The courts of California, of general jurisdiction, such as the Superior Court have equitable jurisdiction. This is granted under the Constitution of the State of California. They have all the equitable jurisdiction exercised by the Chancery Courts of England. There is an academic question as to whether their jurisdiction, in the subject matter, is determined as of the time of the American Revolution or of the organization of the State as one of the States of the Union.

However, the practical question presented is to be determined by the rule that equity will compel specific performance of contracts for the purchase of land.

While the contracts of service and the contract to purchase were entered into by Wing at the same time they are to be considered as entirely separate and distinct agreements.

Neither has any bearing on the other.

It is an oftquoted maxim of chancery that 'Equity abhors a forfeiture.' Or 'Equity abhors forfeitures.'

Wing having paid all but the last installment would be subjected to a forfeiture and when we consider that the California Courts have observed the doctrine of contemporaneous construction and have given relief to those who substantially fulfilled their contracts; the tardiness of Wing, in a few instances was excused by the acceptance of his money by the Realty Company.

The Seaside Realty Company could not wait until the last payment and refuse to accept it; having condoned the previous instances of dilatory payment by accepting them.

Wing may compel specific performance.

(3) The same doctrine of contemporaneous construction discussed in the previous question applies here, and for the same reasons.

The jurisdiction of our California Courts is somewhat different than most of those of sister states of the union.

Under our Code law and equity are wedded. When the Code was adopted in 1873 it was considered advantageous to give legal and equitable relief in the same action.

While it is unusual to hear a California attorney recite the equitable maxims in court and while too frequently according to Professor Pomeroy in his introduction to his monumental work on the subject of equity, the equitable powers of the courts are overlooked in this jurisdiction, yet our Superior Courts do have, and they are required under our Code to apply equitable and legal rights in an action.

This being true, as a matter of law, Wing could invoke in an action for damages all of the equitable rights, as distinguished from the equitable remedies, that he could invoke in the previous matter.

In other words the substantive law of equity is applied in a legal action but not the adjective law of equity.

Wing can sue in an action for money for breach of contract and his damages are measured by the profit on the lot sale, commission to the salesman, administrative expense on the transaction; and other proper charges which might be deducted from his demand.

"Question No. 21

Adams, through the fraud of Blake, was induced to give the latter a negotiable promissory note for $5,000, dated October 23, 1938, payable one year after date, in consideration of Blake conveying Blackacre to Adams.

Six months later Blake, without fraud, induced Adams, as yet unaware of Blake's prior fraud, to execute to Blake a mortgage on Blackacre securing payment of the note. No new consideration was given for the mortgage, it reciting that it was executed 'as security for that certain obligation in the sum of $5,000 represented by a promissory note bearing date of October 23, 1938'. This mortgage was never recorded.

On October 21, 1939, Clay, who was unaware of the Adams-Blake mortgage, secured against Adams a judgment for $10,000, an abstract of which he immediately recorded in the county where Blackacre was situated, which by statute created a lien.

On October 22, 1939, Blake surrendered the October 23, 1938, note to Adams in exchange for a new negotiable note due October 23, 1940. Adams still being unaware of Blake's prior fraud. No new mortgage was executed.

(1) Assuming Blake retains the new note and at the maturity thereof sues for foreclosure of the mortgage on Blackacre, discuss all points which a careful lawyer would consider as possible defenses for Adams.

(2) If Blake, prior to maturity of the second note, negotiated it to a holder in due course, could such holder at maturity foreclose the mortgage? If so, what would be the priority as between such holder and Clay?

"Answer No. 21

It would be advantageous in the discussion of this question to know the kind and extent of the fraud practiced.

It is difficult to conceive how Blake 'without fraud' secured a mortgage from Adams; as the original transaction was tainted with fraud in its inception and certainly the securing of such an instrument as a mortgage would be, at least, a continuation of the initial fraud.

There being no consideration for the execution of the mortgage that instrument is regarded as having been based upon a past consideration and between the original parties. The recitals of the instrument, altho' specific, do not control. The real consideration of the instrument may always be shown.

Before the execution of the mortgage there was in existence only the note.

'Fraud vitiates everything.' As the original transaction was conceived and executed in fraud, Adams may defend on that ground. The execution of the new note does not alter the situation as Adams was unaware of Blake's prior fraud. Under our Code one may sue for fraud within three years after the discovery of the fraud. (338 C.C.P.).

Certainly one could defend on the ground of fraud and there has been no laches nor estoppel in the making of the new note because the maker, Adams, did not know of the fraud.

A very practical question arises as to the value of the property involved.

In defending Adams may take the position of fraud in the original transaction, not discovered by him at the time of execution of the various documents involved.

No consideration for the making of the mortgage.

No new mortgage was executed at the time of the execution of the new note.

No action lies for foreclosure for the reason that the old note was extinguished by the new one and the mortgage is not a security based upon the new note.

(2) An innocent purchaser for value would be regarded as having acquired the second note under the mortgage security and he would take free of all the equities existing between the parties. It follows that he could foreclose.

Clay having recorded the abstract of judgment and the mortgage not having been recorded, Clay has priority.

Question No. 22	Grade 30
Question No. 23	Grade 55

"Question No. 22

Jones owned and occupied a building adjoining a public highway in the city of Fairview, state of Magenta. He arranged with Green, an odd job man in the neighborhood, for the latter to clean the windows of the building at the rate of fifty cents per hour. As Jones knew, Green had caused two injuries during the past year while engaged in window cleaning through dropping tools on passersby.

An ordinance of the city of Fairview prohibited the use by window cleaners of any brush other than a special type so designed as to strap around the hand. Neither Green nor Jones had such a brush, however, and Jones told Green to use a short mop with which Jones supplied him.

Jones saw that Green was working without a safety belt but made no objection, although a city ordinance required such a belt to be used. He gave no direction or suggesions other than as stated above as to how Green should do the work. While Green was cleaning one of the higher windows, he negligently slipped, and, due to not having a safety belt, was forced to grab the window sash with both hands, as a result of which the unattached mop fell striking and injuring Paulson, who was walking on the sidewalk in front of Jones' building.

Is Jones liable to Paulson? Discuss all possible bases upon which such liability might be predicated.

"Answer No. 22

As the contract of employment is on a time basis for wages, Green is an employee of Jones and not an independent contractor. Green, being an employee, came under the rule of respondeat superior as he is a servant of Jones in this undertaking.

We have a violation of two city ordinances here. Ordinances which are reasonable in their scope are proper objects of municipal legislation.

The violation of these ordinances in the acts in which the servant was engaged on behalf of his master; is the very cause of the injury.

The proximate cause of the injury was the failure of the servant to properly use a brush which could have been strapped to his hand, obviating injury by dropping to those below; and the failure to use a safety belt, which failure resulted in his efforts to observe the first law of nature and save himself.

Both of these proximate causes, or the division of the proximate cause into two parts, as you may prefer; was the causative factor in the injury and both had been proscribed by the city ordinance.

All of the 'possible bases' would include:

a. common law liability under Master [and] Servant Doctrine. Relation and negligence established by statement of facts.

b. coupled with the violation of an ordinance prohibiting the act which was the proximate cause.

c. the violation of an additional ordinance, the act being an additional factor or contributing element in the injury.

"Question No. 23

John Smith, a wealthy real estate broker, by his will devised a small apartment house to Trask in trust for the use of Smith's son, Bob, for life, providing that Trask should retain possession of the premises, manage all business transactions in respect thereto, and collect the rents, paying over the net income to Bob quarterly. The will further provided that Bob should have no right to anticipate such income by sale, assignment, mortgage, or in any other manner, and that such income should not be subject to the claims of Bob's creditors. On Smith's death, Trask qualified and entered upon the performance of the trust, his management producing a net income of some $3,000 annually. Bob, aged 22, and studying medicine, was able on account of his apparent affluence to secure almost unlimited credit, and was soon deeply in debt.

The apartment house being in need of replacement of some plumbing fixtures, the new installations were made by Plummer pursuant to a contract with Trask, the latter signing the contract in his own name, as trustee, of the estate of John Smith.

A janitor employed by Trask for the apartment house negligently left a broom on the stairs and Ransom, one of the tenants, fell over it and was injured.

What are the rights of (a) Bob's creditors; (b) Plummer, who has not been paid for his labor and materials; (c) Ransom, the injured tenant? (Do not discuss mechanic's liens.)

"Answer No. 23

Trask is the Trustee of an active, as distinguished from a passive trust. The courts have held that 'Spendthrift Trusts' are valid where the trust created is not in its inception a device for defrauding creditors. As the period of time between the creation of the trust and it becoming effective thru' the death of Smith is sufficient to rebut any inference of that kind the trust is valid; with the proviso that the cestui que trust is deprived of control of the subject matter.

The decisions say that one can not create a spendthrift trust and endow the beneficiary with any control over the subject matter to the extent that he may enjoy the increment of its earnings secure from his creditors and at any time control for his own benefit the subject matter of the trust.

The provisions of the trust in the question seem to have fully met all the requirements of the law in this regard.

(a) Bob's creditors cannot successfully attack the trust estate nor the income paid to Bob, with the proviso that after the income is paid to Bob that such income then becomes subject to execution, attachment or other appropriate remedy. Most decisions hold that the only instance in which money paid to a beneficiary may not be subject to legal process [is] where the funds are paid under the protection of a statute which specifically exempts such funds from ordinary legal process.

(b) Plummer, having been engaged by the trustee may compel the estate to satisfy his claim by appropriate legal action. The subject matter of the estate is subject to claims for the improvement or preservation of the estate.

The circumstance of the trustee signing his own name, with descriptive words of representative capacity should not render the trustee personally liable for the amount of the plumber's claim.

The law was formerly different on this subject. The older decisions hold that if an agent sign his name instead of that of his principal, the agent is bound, but the modern trend is to exempt one who acts in a representative capacity from personal liability when the qualifying words appear with the signature, even tho' the words indicative of representation appear below the signature. If the text of the contract indicates an estate purpose, Trask is not liable.

(c) Tenants occupy premises subject to the general rule of contributory negligence, in any injury which they may sustain.

While the janitor was negligent in leaving the broom on the stairs the circumstances ordinarily would indicate the presence of the broom. Attendant circumstances may indicate negligence in an act of that kind; depending upon the amount of light available, the location of the broom on the stairs as to whether it was concealed in the juncture of the tread of the stair and the riser; the ability of the person injured and a multitude of other factors.

Ordinarily a broom on the stair is a conspicuous object and a tenant, or any other person, would in the act of ascent or descent observe the broom. If they failed to see it in the circumstances as outlined in the query; the law would impute to them contributory negligence and the negligence of the janitor would not permit the recovery.

Question No. 25	Grade 45
Question No. 26	Grade 50

"Question No. 25

On June 1st, Jones bought Blackacre and Whiteacre in the state of Magenta for $15,000 each, such being the reasonable value of the land. On June 15th he contracted in writing to sell Blackacre to Black for $12,000, payable as follows: $2,000 down and $5,000 on July 1st at which time the deed was to be delivered 'on execution and delivery of a purchase-money note and mortgage on Blackacre in the sum of $5,000 * * *.' Black paid the $2,000 and on June 20th assigned his rights under the contract to Allen. On July 1st, Allen tendered Jones $5,000 in cash and his own note for $5,000 and offered to execute a purchase-money mortgage on Blackacre, but Jones declined to tender, claiming he had made a 'bad bargain' with Black.

Meanwhile, Jones had leased Whiteacre to White for five years. A dyke had been erected on Whiteacre to prevent water on Whiteacre from running over into Greenacre, adjoining farm land owned by Jones. The dyke was in disrepair and leaked, damaging crops on Greenacre, and the lease provided that White was to repair it within two weeks. After White had taken possession, a separate contract was entered into whereby Jones agreed, for adequate consideration, to install on Whiteacre a system of pipes for irrigation. White failed to repair the dyke as agreed, and Jones has failed to install the irrigation system.

(1) Can Allen compel specific performance of Jones' promise to convey Blackacre?

(2) Can Jones compel specific performance of White's agreement to repair the dyke?

(3) Can White compel specific performance of Jones' agreement to install the irrigation system?

"Answer No. 25

(1) Contracts in which personal skill or the credit or probity or personal qualification of a contracting party are involved are not assignable.

Contracts which embody a clause prohibiting assignment are likewise not assignable.

As the contract under question involves none of these features [it] is of an assignable nature.

Allen tendered the money required to be paid and offered to execute the purchase money mortgage so it is apparent that the vendor relied upon the mortgage for security rather than personal credit of the vendee.

The courts grant specific performance of land contracts as each parcel of land is unique and the purchaser has for that reason no 'plain speedy nor adequate remedy at law.'

Allen can compel specific performance.

(2) As specific performance is purely equitable in origin and application one who invokes the remedy and who has failed to carry out his agreements with the Deft. may be challenged with the equitable maxim, 'He who seeks equity must do equity.'

While the subject matter of the dyke and the irrigation are not directly concerned with each other, it is well settled that in equity when jurisdiction is taken concerning one justiciable question between the parties it is assumed for all matters that may be adjudicated, whether they are equitable or legal.

In a previous paper the jurisdiction of our Superior and Appellate Courts in equity was ascribed to the provisions of the State of California constitution and the codes made in pursuance of that jurisdiction and to save time and space, this matter will not be set out at length.

One of the grounds of equitable jurisdiction is the prevention of a multiplicity of legal actions.

If Jones were required to sue on the covenant requiring White to repair the dyke it follows as a logical sequence that such suits would be required to be filed and prosecuted as often as the water, due to natural causes, the terrain and other matters; might accumulate and run over into Jones land.

Pursuing the ratiocination, this would result in a multiplicity of legal actions.

Jones can compel specific performance.

(3) As was intimated in the previous question White could in a proceeding by Jones for specific performance, in the same action, compel performance. (By cross-complaint)

For the purpose of discussion we will assume that Jones did not sue, as contemplated in the previous subdivision of this question.

If White could not compel specific performance he would be relegated to an action of law. Under the strictly legal situation he would be limited to the damage sustained by the failure of Jones to install the irrigation system, the interim being the elapsed time from the date of the contract for the installation of irrigation to the date of the suit. Damages could not be anticipated as they would depend upon climatic and meterological conditions and other vagaries which would be impossible of ascertainment, or even surmise.

From time to time as damages would accrue during the period of the lease White would be compelled to repair to court. In a semi-arid country irrigation is necessary to most forms of husbandry and White to raise his crop, would be compelled to install some sort of irrigation system, machanical or manual, as the case might be.

Under these circumstances equity would compel specific performance at the instance of White for the purpose of preventing a multiplicity of suits and for the reason that White had no plain, speedy nor adequate remedy at law; which is the basis of all equitable jurisdiction.

"Question No. 26

X, a logger, had been supplying logs for Y's sawmills for several years. On December 26, 1938, X received the following letter from Y: 'Dear X. If you will promise to furnish all the No. 1 logs necessary to run my two Portsmouth mills for the coming year at $15 per thousand feet, the contract is yours. Please accept by return mail. (Signed) Y.' Upon receiving the letter X replied immediately by telegram: 'I accept your terms. Am towing the first raft to your booming grounds as we have done in the past and as is the usual custom. I would appreciate your depositing monthly checks to cover payment to my account at the Portsmouth Bank. (Signed) X.' On February 1, 1939, X received the following letter from Y.: 'Dear X. In reply to your telegram of December 26, 1938, I regret to inform you that my lower mill was completely destroyed by the recent unprecedented flood, and that I have just concluded the sale of my upper mill. You may pick up your log raft at the booming grounds. (Signed) Y.'

(1) Was a contract entered into between X and Y? Discuss fully. (Assume that no question arising under the statute of frauds is involved.)

(2) Assuming that X and Y entered into a binding contract, what is the effect of the sale of one mill and the destruction of the other?

"Answer No. 26

(1) Where a party makes an offer thru' a particular medium of communication and requires a reply thru' a particular medium, the use of a different medium in the transmission of the attempted acceptance does not meet the offer.

This [is] an artificial and technical rule of contractual law so the courts have held that the attempted acceptance may be refused on the ground that it did not meet the terms of the offer by failure to use the medium of communication as directed in the offer.

In this case the rejection of the acceptance was not placed upon the somewhat hyper technical ground mentioned but upon a totally different ground, namely; impossibility of performance.

The text of the letter of 'Y' proves that 'X' had already moored his raft at the booming grounds when 'Y' composed the letter.

This shows us that 'Y' is attempting to revoke the contract upon the grounds stated in his letter.

A contract was entered into because 'X' moored his raft at the booming grounds with the consent of 'Y' who by his act in allowing this waived his right to reject the acceptance of 'X' on the ground mentioned.

(2) It appears from the context of the telegraphic communication of 'X' that 'X' was well acquainted and fully conversant with the plan of operation under which 'Y' functioned and operated as the telegram refers to what was done in the past and the usual custom of operations.

An essential element in the technique of the lumber industry is the use of a suitable saw mill at some appropriate point in the transportation of logs from the site of growth in the tree to the preliminary operation at the mill where 'logs' become 'lumber.'

As a 'boomer' X must have known this. Under this situation we must assume that the parties contracted with reference to the existence and the operations of the mills. Logs brought to the mill of 'Y' would have small commercial value unless he could undertake their preliminary fabrication by sawing them.

We comprehend the law to be that where parties enter into contract concerning the fabrication of a particular subject matter and where the site of fabrication is destroyed by calamity, such as flood, that the performance of the contract become impossible to the extent that they regarded the site of fabrication as an element of the agreement.

To the extent that the mill destroyed by flood prevented the performance of contract, to that extent 'Y' is released.

The sale of the other mill was the voluntary act of 'Y' and does not excuse him from performance. To the extent that the upper mill might have functioned in receiving the logs which 'X' might have furnished to it under the conditions contemplated by the parties at the time of the agreement; to that extent 'Y' is not released.

As a matter of legal pragmatism in the ascertainment of damages resulting 'Y' is liable to 'X' for the profit on all the logs that 'X' might have delivered to the upper mill; unless the capacity of the upper mill was less than the volume of the delivery of logs, in which case the measure of damages would be the capacity of the mill to consume the logs. (The contract was for the furnishing of 'all the No. 1 logs' etc.)

"Question No. 27

On February 10th A was the owner of record of a tract of vacant land in the state of Magenta. On February 10th A orally contracted to sell the land to B for the sum of $10,000. Pursuant to this contract A executed a deed to B and handed it to B with the oral direction that the deed was not to become operative until B paid the sum of $10,000 to A. B having failed to pay the $10,000 by April 10th, A executed a deed to C on that date and handed it to C with the following oral statement: 'Put this in your safe until I call for its return. If B doesn't pay me shortly, I may make a gift of the land to you.' C disregarded this direction and had the deed recorded on April 12th. On April 13th B learned of this fact and immediately had his deed recorded. On April 15th C executed a deed of this land to D in discharge of an antecedent debt due D. D accepted the deed in payment of the debt without knowledge of either B's deed or of the facts surrounding the execution of C's deed from A. D immediately recorded his deed. B has not paid A the $10,000.

Discuss the state of the legal title as between A, B, and D.

"Answer No. 27

As between A and B, the deed was not to become affective until the purchase price had been paid. The question presented hinges upon the operation of the Statute of Frauds, among other matters.

While partial performance may take a contract to sell realty "out of the statute" there must be more performance than is shown here, up to the time that B recorded his deed. By so doing B, who was entrusted with his deed demonstrated his intention of becoming the owner of the land. True he recorded the deed because he learned of the previous transaction but whatever motive prompted him; he did by this act take the matter out of the Statute.

In determining questions based upon the Statute it is sometimes helpful to recollect the purpose of the Statute and its history throws light on this doubtful and sometimes bewildering application of this universal bit of Anglo-Saxon legislation.

When the quaint 'lawyer's latin' and Norman Frensh in which the Statute is couched, is translated; the preamble assures us that it was devised to 'prevent frauds and perjuries.' The legal history of the day indicates that it did more to prevent the perjuries than the frauds.

In plain language the statute was designed to prevent doubt as to certain transactions therein enumerated. The doctrine of part performance was developed in instances where the acts of the parties clearly showed that there could be no legal doubt as to the intentions of the parties.

Applying this reasoning to the case the recordation of the deed by B would take the matter out of the statute. The deed then became a matter of public record and doubt resolved.

B is liable to A for the purchase price. A having made it impossible to give title to B because of his deed to C is liable to B for breach of contract on the tender by B to A of the agreed consideration. The retention of B of the deed for the period in which he retained it without payment or tender of payment was lax, as was A; in not demanding the purchase money.

D was an innocent purchaser for value because the extinguishment of an antecedent debt is a good and valuable consideration and D took free of the equities existing between the various parties. The recordation of the deed by C made a good record title and his deed to D put title in D as it was the laxity of A in delivering a deed to C which resulted in the record title having been made.

D has title as against A and B.

"Question No. 28

For value then received, Jones executed and delivered to Smith the following instrument:

'Fairview, State of Megenta,
'October 23, 1938.

'I. O. U. or holder $5,000 on or before 30 days after dissolution of my partnership with James Brown. This note is secured by a mortgage on my ranch, Blackacre. If in the judgment of the holder said collateral depreciates in value, I agree to give when demanded additional security to the satisfaction of said holder; otherwise the holder shall have the option of declaring this note due at once.

'(Signed) John Jones'

Is the above instrument a negotiable promissory note? Discuss all points involved.

"Answer No. 28

No. Our Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, embraced in our Code, requires that a negotiable instrument be made payable to Bearer Or To Order.

Obviously the word 'holder' does not meet the terms of the statute and the words, 'or order' are not included.

The words 'or order' are not needed when it is payable to bearer for the reason that the bearer may 'order.'

The initials 'I O U' are not equivalent to a promise to pay. While these cryptic symbols are frequently used to denote a personal obligation or express an obligation incurred to the gaming table, so we are told, yet the courts have not extended their latitude to include a promise to pay.

The instrument is conditioned upon the judgment of the maker and a negotiable instrument may not be conditional. The agreement to give additional security is a contingency and the instrument may not be contingent in its terms and be negotiable. The option extended to the holder also destroys negotiability under the terms of the Act.

A promissory note cannot be made one by merely calling [it] that. It must contain the elements of negotiability. The time of payment is uncertain as the dissolution of partnership with Brown is uncertain.

In short all of the clauses save the reference to security destroy the 'negotiability' of the instrument. This under the requirements of the Code.

Question No. 29 Grade 70

"Question No. 29

Peters, a resident of California, has valid cause of action based on several contract claims against Adams, Blake and Crowley, respectively, none of whom has ever been in California. Blake is a resident of New York but owns an orchard in California. Crowley is a New York business man who has a branch office in California. Peters' claim against Crowley arose out of the business transacted by the latter in California through a local agent.

Advise Peters as to whether:

(1) He can secure a judgment in California capable of binding Adams' assets outside of California.

(2) He can subject Blake's orchard to the payment of the latter's obligation, and, if so, what procedure must be followed.

(3) The state of California has power to provide for personal jurisdiction over one in the position of Crowley.

"Answer No. 29

(1) Peters cannot for reasons that will be more fully discussed below.

(2) The celebrated case of Pennoyer v. Neff (U.S.Sup.Ct.) is determinative of this matter.

A San Francisco lawyer sued Pennoyer in the State Court for a claim based upon the rendering of legal services. No service of process was obtained personally and the attorney published summons and secured what he thought was a judgment for the amount of his claim.

The defendant during the suit was without the State of California but returned and the Plaintiff attorney having sold property of the Deft. levied upon in execution to the Defendant in the Federal case; the client of the Plaintiff attorney instituted proceedings to vacate the judgment and sale as conflicting with the due process of law clause of the 14th Amendment to the U. S. Constitution. Neff had bought the property on execution.

The Supreme Court of the United States held that the attempted jurisdiction thru publication of summons was not good.

If an attachment is issued in a suit based upon publication of summons the demand is good up to the amount of the fair value of the attached property. This is because an attachment is a proceeding in rem against the property itself and coupled with the published summons it gives the court jurisdiction to render judgment only in the amount mentioned, not the full amount of the plaintiff's demand, necessarily.

Now applying this rule of law to the case against Blake: An action may be brought in our courts based upon publication of summons and attachment against the orchard for the fair value of the attached property.

Blake may appear or default. If he defaults the judgment will be good up to the amount of the attachment.

The U. S. Supreme Court in reviewing the case cited held that service in the matter of an ordinary action at law must be obtained by personal service or the procedure outlined above.

(3) Yes. We have a code section providing that one who does business in the State of California must comply with the statute by indicating the person or agency upon whom service of process may be made. In compliance with the statute one appoints another within the State who is properly empowered to accept service of process in behalf of the person or agency without the State. This is an intra-state function; within the control of the State of California." [This concludes the quoted material from the official questions submitted to and answers written by petitioner John E. Staley.]

The record herein reveals no showing on the part of the respondents as to how or in what respect (if any) either or any of petitioner's answers to the foregoing questions was or were erroneous or defective, either in "analysis of the facts, * * * discussion of the legal problems involved", or "display of legal reasoning", as was required of petitioner—which requirements are hereinafter disclosed. Conclusively, as will appear from the face of each of the questions, petitioner's answers were simply graded in gross,—no indication being apparent regarding the several items which may have been credited in making up the total mark. I have not the time at my disposal to discuss herein either or any of such answers; but on a consideration of the same, to my mind, it is clear that as to each answer petitioner was accorded a credit that was much less than that to which he was reasonably and justly entitled. True, the "highly skilled * * * recent graduates of different law schools" were not of that opinion; but I submit to the bar of this state the proposition that, if its members will but cursorily examine the said questions and answers, although they may disagree with each of many of petitioner's statements as to the law, nevertheless they must conclude that, taken as a whole, petitioner's answers displayed a knowledge of the law and of the procedure of this state that may be deemed to be far in excess of that possessed by the average member of the bar,—with the consequence that, in fairness and justice to petitioner, he clearly should be entitled to practice law in all the courts of this state.

In addition to the said questions and answers, there is attached to the petition the following certificate, to-wit:

"This grading gives the Applicant, Petitioner, a total of 2121 points or percents, making his average well above the minimum passing grade. This average is 81 and 15/26ths per cent.

"I further certify that the Applicant, John E. Staley, has never at any time been a student under me or in any school where and when I was engaged in instructing in law, and that I made his acquaintance for the first time within the present week.

"I further certify that I am now actively engaged in the Practice of Law in the Courts of this State and of the United States.

"Charles E. McGinnis.
"Dated: Los Angeles, California,
"July 27, 1940."

At the outset, on an inspection or examination of such questions and the respective answers thereto, it may be noted that petitioner failed to answer three of the questions which were propounded by the board. As explained by the respondent board, such failure on the part of petitioner is due to the fact that "At recent examinations a total of twenty-nine questions have been given, of which, through the use of options, each applicant has been required to answer twenty-six questions." (Emphasis added.)

The respondents' return to the order to show cause consists chiefly in a detailed explanation of the system which is employed by the board in preparing the questions proposed to be submitted to applicants for admission, as well as the method used in grading the respective answers of such applicants thereto. However, such answer of the respondents also contains several independent allegations of fact which appear to have some material bearing on the question submitted for consideration by this court. Among the other facts thus presented it may be noted that, at least in the first instance, if ever, neither any member of the board of governors of The State Bar, nor any member of its "committee of bar examiners" ever reads or grades the answers which theretofore have been made or given by any applicant for admission to practice; but it appears that in the first instance that arduous and all-important duty is delegated to at least fifteen "recent graduates of a number of different law schools, out-of-state, as well as California", and that to each such "reader" is assigned not more than two questions "in fields for which he is particularly equipped". However, notwithstanding the lack of practical experience of such "readers" in the practice of the law, by the respondents' answer herein it appears that "petitioner's answers to said examination questions were carefully, fully, and completely read and graded by a corps of competent, efficient, trained and highly skilled readers, particularly chosen for their ability to perform this special service." (Emphasis added.)

From the respondents' answer it also appears that, contained within the instructions which are given to the said "highly skilled readers" with respect to the grade which a given answer to a question may merit, is the following statement: "The analyses [formulae] are intended for the guidance of the readers, but they can properly serve that purpose only if it be constantly borne in mind that the applicants need not duplicate the completeness of statement found in the committee analyses in order to be given a perfect mark. The scope of the analyses has been increased only so that an applicant who includes a discussion which is not necessary for full credit, but which, nevertheless, is relevant, may be given a bonus." The "analyses" or formulae to which reference has been had are thus defined: "There is prepared for each question a thorough analysis, complete not only with statements of the weight of authority and minority rules for each legal problem, amply supported by the citation of pertinent authorities, but also with an exposition of the various views and approaches of different authorities, and including an application of the relevant rules to the particular facts." (Emphasis added.)

In the first place, it might be interesting to learn when, where, and under what particular circumstances the said "recent graduates of different law schools" were distinguished as "highly skilled"; and by whom were they originally declared so entitled? On a careful consideration of their work in the instant matter, it would seem just possible that they have not sustained their reputation. But that conclusion, of course, would be but a matter of opinion, regarding which experts (if any) as well as individual, common lawyers might differ, one from the other, or the others.

As may be noted, on the face of the respective answers here under consideration nothing appears that is indicative of any credit which was given to any item that properly was involved in the total credit,—the only showing being that 20, or 30, or 60, or some other per cent was accorded. Any one who has had occasion to observe the grades which may have been given by different, independent, "non-expert" graders on examination questions will readily attest the statement that a difference of 25, 50 or 75 per cent may be, and frequently has been, discovered. In the instant matter, that fact is illustrated by a comparison of the respective grades that were given by the "highly skilled * * * recent graduates of different law schools" and those which were accorded by Mr. McGinnis. For example: by the former, to petitioner's answer given to question No. 1 he was awarded 45 per cent,—whereas by the latter has was credited with 85 per cent; on question No. 2 the "highly skilled" gentleman thought petitioner had earned a credit of 30 per cent, although Mr. McGinnis was of the opinion that 76 per cent was nearer the correct mark; on question No. 3 the respective marks were 35 and 85; and on No. 4 the grades were 30 by the one and 75 by the other. In such circumstances, it would seem impossible that any person, however learned, might accurately and with any assurance assert that any given answer was entitled to be rated as "perfect". But however difficult of solution the problem of grading such answers may be, unquestionably the announced conclusion would be more graciously received by an unsuccessful applicant, and more readily approved by the bar in general, if the fact were widespread and greatly publicized that the answers to the questions had been graded by long-experienced, liberal-minded lawyers of unquestioned ability and integrity, rather than by recent law graduates of whatever skill they might possess and however rightfully they might be entitled to the laurels which by some one had been accorded to them.

Remembering that the instant proceeding is before this court by reason of its issuance of an order directed to the respondents "to show cause why he [petitioner] should not be admitted to practice law in this state" (page 1 of majority opinion [109 P.2d 667]),—paragraph VII of the respondents' "Return to Alternative Writ of Mandate * * *" presents a point of considerable interest. Said paragraph is as follows: "The respondents allege that the records of the Committee of Bar Examiners show that this petitioner is not qualified for admission to practice law in this state as indicated by the fact that he had taken eight examinations since the year 1926, at none of which has he been successful although each examination was determined on its own merits and in each instance all books remained anonymous during the grading period." (Emphasis added.) And clearly as implying emphasis to that point, in their brief herein the respondents again refer to petitioner's "record"—for the very apparent purpose of supplying a good reason for not making a recommendation to the effect that petitioner be admitted to the practice of law within this state. Such reference in the respondents' brief is as follows, to-wit: "The petitioner, John E. Staley, is a man 50 years of age. In June, 1926, he first took a bar examination in California. He failed that examination. He has subsequently failed the examinations given in August 1927, August, 1928, July, 1929, April, 1930, August, 1930, February, 1934, and October, 1939. In each examination his papers were anonymous when graded. He seeks admission to the bar of California despite this record." (Emphasis added.) And as though to clinch the fairness of the respondents' conclusion that petitioner was not nor ever could be entitled to practice law in this state, on the "fly leaf" of their brief herein the respondents include the following statement:

"Question Involved. A person who has failed to pass eight examinations given by the Committee of Bar Examiners seeks admission on a petition alleging his answers to the October 1939 examination were arbitrarily and capriciously graded but alleging no facts to substantiate such charge. * * * The petition for rehearing having been granted and an alternative writ of mandate issued the issue is: Does the petition state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for?"

In other words, according to the pleading and the brief of the respondents,—irrespective of petitioner's integrity and his ability as illustrated by his respective answers to the several questions which were propounded to him,—the asserted fact that on each of seven previous examinations petitioner failed to be accredited a passing grade constitutes its real cause, and in and of itself presents a good and sufficient reason for a recommendation by the board of bar governors that in the instant matter the petition for admission to practice law in this state should be peremptorily denied. Basically, such a suggestion or conclusion is manifestly unfair and unjust.

However, in apparent contradiction of such conclusion, in another connection in the respondents' answer may be noted the allegation that "no factor other than the applicant's work on the examination has any bearing upon his success or failure in the examination". The purport of that language is that whatever may be petitioner's background, scholastically or otherwise, or however extensive and varied and otherwise important may have been his lifework, or his experience or his training in the law, in business, or in other pursuits of life, or whatever may be his established—practical or demonstrated—fitness to practice law by reason of his general legal or other knowledge, or his integrity,—none of nor all such and other qualifications has or have "any bearing" but to the contrary, count for naught. Therefore, it would seem that no reason appears for an applicant, prior to being granted permission to take the examination, to be required to make any showing regarding either or any of such various or other matters hereinbefore set forth. (Emphasis added.)

As related to the system employed by the respondents in grading answers to questions, it should be obvious that in grading an examination paper the giving of "a bonus" to any applicant "who includes a discussion which is not necessary for full credit, but which, nevertheless, is relevant" may or might result in unjust discrimination as to other applicants. As a single illustration of how such rule injuriously may have affected petitioner, it is clear that if on examination of the several questions and the respective answers made thereto by petitioner it should appear that in reality, as to one or several answers, he was entitled to "a perfect mark", the fact that he was not accorded a bonus as to one particular answer, or a bonus as to each of several different answers, may have unjustly affected his total appropriate credit.

Contained within the respondents' "Return to Alternative Writ of Mandate and Brief on Behalf of the State Bar" is the allegation that "At that examination [October, 1939] 718 applicants for admission to practice were examined and of that number 254 were found to have passed the examination and were certified to this court and recommended for admission to practice law in the State of California. Respondents have discharged the duties imposed upon them by law in connection with said examination and the Committee of Bar Examiners has heretofore exercised the best judgment which it has in the premises and has rendered to this court its carefully considered determination as to the result of that examination and has already moved the admission of those applicants which it in good conscience could recommend to the court." (Emphasis added.) Apparently that allegation, in its entirety, was made inadvertently or, if not, it must have been made for the express purpose of inviting adverse and drastic criticism with regard to the best judgment of the committee. And although the respondents have placed themselves in that vulnerable position, it may be that the dignity of the court should forbid any direct response to the invitation thus extended.

Suggested as a matter of great consequence, and as impliedly constituting an additional if not an impelling reason why petitioner should not be permitted to practice law in this state,—in effect, the respondents assert that petitioner was afforded a reasonable period of time to consider the questions and to make his respective written answers thereto, in that he was allowed 48 minutes for each answer. In that regard, the statement of the respondents is as follows: "Inasmuch as applicants at the present time are required to answer twenty-six questions given in six three-and-one-half-hour sessions, they have an average of slightly more than 48 minutes for each answer." (Emphasis added.)

In that connection, further requirements on the part of such applicants are set forth by the respondents as follows: "All questions on the examination are of the long-form or essay type. They consist of a hypothetical case involving several principal points of law and require from the applicant careful analysis of the facts presented and a full discussion of the legal problems involved. The questions are from 200 to 300 words in length and are so expressed as not unduly to confuse the applicant while yet retaining the necessity for legal analysis and a display of legal reasoning." (Emphasis added.) In view of the points presented by such statement, it might not be inappropriate to refer to some of the questions (without again setting them forth herein) which petitioner was required to answer, in writing, in the allotted space of 48 minutes. To my mind, the situation presented to an applicant of requiring from him, within such allotted time, a "careful analysis of the facts", "a full discussion of the legal problems involved" and "a display of legal reasoning" would be, to say the least, both bewildering and disconcerting, if not actually alarming. It seriously may be questioned whether any reputable lawyer, who has successfully practiced law in this state for a period of 10 years or longer, would consider such a feat possible within a space of 48 minutes, even with respect to any one of the several minor points of law here presented for solution in any of the major questions which the applicant was called upon to answer. Furthermore, as to any one of such major questions, it would be even doubtful that, provided with a well-equipped law office, with all pertinent digests, law reports, secretaries and research workers necessary or advisable for the purpose, any lawyer who valued his good reputation as such would undertake to present, in much less than 48 hours, "a careful analysis of the facts" and "a full discussion of the legal problems involved", together with "a display of legal reasoning". And especially would such performance be doubtful where, in addition to the difficulties already present, the said lawyer would have to bear in mind the fact that the correctness of his answer to such question was to be tested not by a group of experienced, practical and tolerant lawyers, who might recognize the fact that law is not an exact science, but by a body of "15 recent graduates of a number of different law schools", and that the answer given, to be considered "perfect", or even entitled to a passing grade, must first be deemed to practically coincide with the "analysis" or formula theretofore prepared by the committee of bar examiners, and thereafter be graded by the said body of "recent graduates". To my mind, if the conditions prescribed and approved by the respondents, which were required and demanded of petitioner, did not amount to an imposition as to him, and did not result in unfair and unjust treatment as far as he was concerned, it would be difficult to imagine just what conditions should exist in order to invoke the application of the rule reiterated by this court in its opinion in the Salot case. (Salot v. State Bar, 3 Cal.2d 615, 45 P.2d 203.) In that case it was intimated that if an unsuccessful applicant for admission to practice law in this state could show that his application was rejected "through fraud, imposition, or coercion, or that he [had] been treated unfairly or unjustly", this court would "listen to his complaint".

But to return to the specific questions and the respective answers thereto that are involved in this proceeding: In the first place, realizing, if possible, my own lack of legal knowledge, nevertheless, with the fullest confidence I venture to predict that if, for the purpose of passing upon the question of the fitness of petitioner to practice law in this state, the identical questions which were propounded to petitioner and the respective answers that were made thereto by him were submitted to a committee composed of 15 average members of the bar, the result of its consideration thereof would be favorable to petitioner, and would be followed by a recommendation by such committee that petitioner be admitted to practice law in this state.

As hereinbefore has been indicated, most lawyers are painfully cognizant of the fact that law is not an exact science, and that with reference to practically any controversy which involves an admitted set of facts a given conclusion of law regarding the respective rights of the several parties thereto will prove almost impossible of agreement as among any considerable number of practicing attorneys,—which is to intimate that as great a number of attorneys will be found who favor a given legal conclusion as will be found who dissent therefrom. If that were not true, very few actions or suits would ever reach the courts. In every lawsuit, or appeal from a judgment, about as many lawyers appear therein in the interest of the defendant as appear in behalf of the plaintiff.

Although it is vigorously asserted by the respondents that they do not require "a perfect answer" to each or any of the questions that are propounded to an applicant, but that, to the contrary, they accord him some credit for an answer that does not agree with their previously prepared "analysis" or formula (provided such answer be logical and well-reasoned),—nevertheless, the several grades that were given to petitioner herein on his respective answers compel the obvious conclusion that petitioner's answers could not have been accorded more than a negligible credit in those instances where it was apparent that his answers had failed to agree with the analyses or formulae which previously had been prepared by the respondents. A careful check of the cases that are reported in the last two issued volumes of the reports of the United States Supreme Court reveals the following facts: that 7 cases therein were decided by a vote of 8 to 1 of the honorable justices of that court; that 5 cases were decided by a 7 to 2 vote; that 2 cases were decided by a 6 to 2 vote; 3 cases by a 6 to 3 vote; 3 cases by a 5 to 3 vote; and that 2 cases were decided by a 4 to 3 vote. Another illustration of the inability of judges to agree with respect to the law which should apply to a case that has been decided on findings of fact is as follows: where an appeal from a judgment has been taken to the appellate court, a decision thereon contrary to that of the trial court may be rendered by a 2 to 1 vote of the justices of the said appellate court; thereafter, should a hearing be granted in this court, the decision that was rendered by the appellate court may be reversed by a 4 to 3 vote of the members of this court; and if the case should be one of which the Supreme Court of the United States will or may take cognizance, the decision therein may be rendered by a 5 to 4 vote, by which the judgment theretofore rendered by this court will be reversed. Such is the certainty of the law! From which it should follow that the opinion of one lawyer may be deemed to be as good as that of any other, and that each of such opinions is entitled to respect, dependent on the reasoning which may be urged or presented in its support,—at least until after a final decision on the issue therein involved has been rendered by the court of last resort.

As though constituting an additional argument why petitioner should not be accorded the relief sought by him, the respondents direct attention to the fact that when the bar examination under consideration was conducted, although there were 718 applicants for admission to practice law in this state, 463 of that total number were unsuccessful. In that connection, considering the several statutory requirements of an applicant under the age of 25 years with which he must comply before he may even take the examination,—which include "at least 2 years of college work", graduation either from "a law school accredited by the examining committee requiring substantially the full time of its students for three years" or "from a law school accredited by the examining committee requiring a part only of its students' time for four years", or the study of law "diligently and in good faith for at least four years",—to my mind, it amounts to a practical demonstration that there is something radically wrong with the system that is pursued by the respondents in conducting the examination and in grading the answers of the applicants to the questions presented to them. Certainly it taxes one's confidence in the fairness of an examination which will admit of the "flunking" of 463 out of a total of 718 duly accredited applicants. It must be apparent that, ordinarily, young men under the age of 25 years who have had "at least 2 years of college work", and who after 3 or 4 years of study therein have been graduated from an accredited law school, should not, and I am persuaded would not, be unsuccessful in the taking of any fairly-conducted bar examination. The law does not demand, nor has the public any right to expect, perfection in legal knowledge by any person before he may be permitted to practice law in this state. The principal quality to be possessed by such an applicant should be that of personal integrity; and I suggest that if in the future the respondents were to devote a fair percentage of their official time to the task of considering and determining whether an applicant for admission to practice law in this state be unreservedly and unquestionably entitled to be respected as an honest person, and that as a matter of right and justice he should merit the entire confidence of all respectable and respected citizens, whether of this state or elsewhere,—a greater and more meritorious service to the general public would be performed than may be secured by an academic examination of an applicant regarding the questioned legal ownership by John Brown or Peter Smith of either "Blackacre" or "Whiteacre", or, indeed, whether a good title would or could be secured by a bona fide purchaser of a pair of shoes that was made from leather which was obtained from the hide of Nellie's or Bossy's calf (see question No. 1).

The fact that a considerable number of the applicants to practice law in this state were successful in the examination here in question may not be considered as proof that imposition or unfairness was not exercised or present on the part of the respondents in conducting the examination. Rather, on a consideration of the questions that were propounded to the applicants as well as of the various and sundry conditions which were attached to the examination, as hereinbefore has been indicated, to my mind, the result simply is suggestive of the thought that those who were successful were either of superintelligence as compared to the less fortunate applicants, or that each of the successful applicants was a "guesser" of superlative ability.

Additionally, perhaps it should not be intimated that if, as a condition to continued tenure of office as a member of the Supreme Court of this state, each of such members were required to take and to successfully pass a yearly examination under conditions similar to those which were imposed upon petitioner herein,—it would be safe to surmise, if not to assert, that as a result thereof (with certain well-recognized exceptions thereto—to which exceptions I lay no claim to membership) opportunities to the governor of this state to make appointments to fill vacancies on this bench probably would be approximately identical with the number of members of this court. However, of course in no event should such a suggested requirement (in principle) be extended to apply to the membership of any other state agency!

Although precedents may be found and so-called "authorities" may be cited to the effect that no person has a vested right to practice law in this state, nevertheless from the fact that a constitutional privilege inheres in the individual to exert and to use his faculties and energy in any manner that he may see fit,—subject to pertinent constitutional inhibitions and statutory regulations,—a citizen does possess a right to practice law, equally with his right to adopt and to pursue any other vocation, trade or calling. That right is a valuable asset of property—as much as is a right or interest in any other kind of property, real or personal; and the denial of the privilege to practice law usually inflicts a more severe loss to the rejected applicant than would be represented by the total loss to the average man of like age of all his assets of every kind or nature. And the damage suffered by the former may not be, and generally is not, confined to a short or limited period of time following the refusal of the requested privilege, but, to the contrary, may pursue him during a long period of succeeding years, or even throughout his remaining lifetime. The examination of applicants for admission to practice law thus becomes an extremely important matter; and the examiner or person entrusted with the final disposal of so valuable a right should be mindful thereof in the conduct of such examination and the determination of the question presented.

Ordinarily, under our system of government, the determination of conflicting rights or privileges of individuals as between or among themselves, or of the state, is entrusted to judicial officers. Such officers should not be chosen solely because of their admitted theoretical or academic knowledge of the law. Something more than that should be required. They should be, and usually are, chosen or delegated to so act not merely for the reason that they are presumed to be learned in the law, but rather, particularly, because of their known integrity, open-mindedness and general tolerance in thought regarding human affairs,—and, if practicable, because of their long and varied experience in considering or in dealing with the solution of problems which have affected or which may seriously affect vital interests of their fellows.

All the respondents herein, and including the "readers" who are "highly skilled * * * recent graduates of different law schools" may be, and presumably are, possessed to a marked degree of each and all of the assumed desirable qualifications to which reference just has been had. In that regard, no complaint is or perhaps properly may be made excepting that with respect to the group last mentioned it is obvious that the members thereof could not have had such a length of experience in the practice of the law as might seem desirable.

It is doubtful that if any member of the board of governors of The State Bar, or of the committee of examiners, were to represent a client who was a party in any litigated cause which involved a decision regarding a property right, great or small, he would be willing to have such right determined by any one or more of a group of "highly skilled * * * recent graduates of different law schools". To the contrary, at least as far as might be possible or practicable, it is most probable that he would insist upon having a decision made or rendered by a regularly elected or appointed and thoroughly qualified judge, whether or not such officer possessed each and all of the recognized qualifications for his office.

It seems irresistibly to follow that in the matter of such great importance as that of determining whether an applicant should be admitted to practice law in this state the determination thereof should rest with some person or persons of learning and experience equal to that confidently expected to be possessed by a judicial officer of the government of the state.

To my mind, it becomes manifest that petitioner has sustained the burden which by the terms of the majority opinion is declared to rest upon him,—that is, "to show" either in what manner he was imposed upon, or wherein the conclusion of the board, as to petitioner, was unfair or unjust.

In my opinion, the petition should be granted, and petitioner be admitted to practice law in all the courts of this state.

I concur: CARTER, J.

BIEWEND v. BIEWEND.

Sac. 5405.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 28, 1941.

1. Divorce ⇐331

An order of court of competent jurisdiction in one state for payment of money as alimony must be recognized by all other states under full faith and credit clause of federal constitution as to all accrued installments not subject to modification by such court, and recovery of amount of such installments may be denied by court of another state only if they are still subject to modification.

2. Divorce ⇐331

As Missouri courts, under law of that state, will not modify divorced wife's right to accrued alimony installments under Missouri divorce decree, she has vested right thereto, enforceable in other states on basis of full faith and credit.

3. Divorce ⇐331

On the question of enforceability in other states of alimony provision of Missouri divorce decree, under Missouri law, neither divorced wife's subsequent marriage to another man, her resumption of marital relations with divorced husband, nor coming of age of their children, automatically releases divorced husband from his obligation under divorce decree to pay alimony for support of divorced wife and such children, but merely affords grounds for court, in its discretion, to modify or vacate alimony order as to future installments on proper application of either party. Mo.St.Ann. § 1355, p. 1564.

4. Judgment ⇐817

A valid judgment rendered by court of any state must be accorded full faith and credit by every other court in United States, though based on cause of action which is against law and public policy of state wherein enforcement of judgment is sought.

5. Divorce ⇐331, 332

The provisions of California law that divorced wife, awarded alimony for support of herself and spouses' minor children, is no longer entitled to alimony after her remarriage, or rule that court may reduce alimony payments on coming of age of such children, cannot diminish California court's obligation to give full faith and credit to divorce decree, rendered by court of another state, with regard to accrued installments of alimony thereunder. Civ.Code, § 139.

6. Divorce ⇐331

The full faith and credit clause of federal Constitution does not obligate courts of one state to enforce alimony decree, rendered in another state, with regard to future installment payments, particularly when such installments are subject to modification by court of original jurisdiction.

7. Divorce ⇐331

The rule of comity, under which California courts have ordered that foreign divorce decrees providing for future payments of alimony be established as California courts' decrees, with same force and effect as if entered in California, is subject to principle that foreign laws will not be given effect when contrary to settled public policy of forum.

8. Courts ⇐8

For state court to refuse to give effect to another state's laws as contrary to settled public policy of state of forum, it must be clear that enforcement of right obtained under such laws will be prejudicial to recognized standards of morality and general interests of citizens of such state.

9. Courts ⇐8

There is strong public policy favoring enforcement of duties validly created by foreign law.

10. Courts ⇐8

A mere variance between law of state of forum and that of another state wherein cause of action arose does not alone warrant denial of enforcement of foreign law in state of forum.

11. Divorce ⇐331

A divorced wife's right under Missouri law to receive alimony installments under Missouri divorce decree after her remarriage is not perforce inharmonious with California public policy as threatening moral standards or general interests of California citizens, though at variance with California statutes, and hence is not so immoral as to be unenforceable in California. Civ.Code, § 139.

12. Divorce ⇐331, 332

As divorced wife's remarriage and coming of age of divorced spouses' minor children offer grounds for modification of Missouri divorce decree as to future alimony installments for support of wife and such children on application by divorced husband in Missouri court of original jurisdiction, it is not incumbent on California court to refuse to give prospective effect to decree on such grounds. Mo.St.Ann. § 1355, p. 1564.

13. Divorce ⇐331

The California Superior Court's judgment, ordering divorced husband to pay divorced wife weekly alimony installments, provided for by Missouri divorce decree, from date of such judgment, is valid and enforceable until modification of decree by Missouri court which rendered it. Mo.St.Ann. § 1355, p. 1564.

14. Limitation of actions ⇐2(1)

The barring of claim by statute of limitations is procedural matter governed by law of forum, regardless of where cause of action arose.

15. Limitation of actions ⇐2(1)

An action on judgment of sister state is subject to limitations prescribed by law of state wherein action is brought.

16. Limitation of actions ⇐169

The statute providing that action on cause arising in another state, by laws of which action thereon cannot be maintained because of lapse of time, shall not be maintained in California, except in favor of one who has been citizen thereof and held cause of action from time it accrued, applies only to causes of action barred by law of state in which created, not by law of California. Code Civ.Proc. § 361.

17. Limitation of actions ⇐169

Under statute providing that action on cause of action arising in another state, by laws of which action thereon cannot be maintained because of lapse of time, shall not be maintained in California, except in favor of one who has been citizen thereof and held cause of action from time it accrued,

Missouri statute of limitations applies to alimony installments accruing under Missouri divorce decree within five years before bringing of action therefor and on which California statute of limitations has not run. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 336, 361; Mo.St.Ann. § 886, p. 1168.

18. Appeal and error ⇐907(2), 931(1)

Every intendment favors validity of judgment as rendered, and if no evidence is presented in record on appeal therefrom, it must be assumed that sufficient evidence was presented to trial court to sustain its fact finding on which judgment was based.

19. Appeal and error ⇐910

In action for alimony installments payable to defendant's divorced wife under Missouri divorce decree, where defendant appealed from judgment for plaintiff on judgment roll alone, made no showing that any evidence sustaining his burden of proving that cause of action was barred by statute of limitations was introduced below, and did not show that plaintiff failed to take some action on original decree within 10 years after its rendition, as required by Missouri statute of limitations, defendant's contention that action was barred by California five-year statute of limitations cannot be sustained. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 336, 361; Mo.St. Ann. § 886, p. 1168.

CARTER, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Lottie C. Biewend against Adolph C. Biewend, on a foreign divorce decree to recover the amount of alimony installments payable thereunder. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Gumpert & Mazzera and C. H. Hogan, all of Stockton, for appellant.

Nathan H. Snyder, of Los Angeles, and Lawrence Edwards and Chas. H. Epperson, both of Stockton, for respondent.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

Plaintiff secured a decree of divorce in Missouri on May 10, 1918, which provided that defendant pay her $25 per week for the support of herself and their four minor children. Both parties were before the court and subject to its jurisdiction. Subsequently they came to California. Between the date of the original divorce decree in Missouri and the time of bringing this action all the minor children reached their majority. Meanwhile plaintiff married and divorced a second time after which she again lived with defendant for a period of four years. In 1938 the plaintiff brought suit upon the decree in the superior court of San Joaquin County, and recovered a judgment ordering not only the payment of those installments which had accrued within five years prior to the beginning of the action but also payment to her of $25 per week from the date of the judgment. Defendant has appealed from this judgment.

[2, 3] Under the law of Missouri courts of that state will make no modification of the right to accrued installments. The wife thus has a vested right to them enforceable in other states on the basis of full faith and credit. Nelson v. Nelson, 282 Mo. 412, 221 S.W. 1066. Neither the subsequent marriage of the divorced wife to another nor her subsequent resumption of marital relations with the defendant nor the coming of age of the children automatically releases the defendant from his obligation to pay alimony. They merely afford grounds for the court in its discretion to modify or vacate the order as to future installments upon proper application. Niedt v. Niedt, Mo.App., 95 S.W.2d 868. Section 1355 of Revised Missouri Statutes 1929, Vol. I, p. 567, Mo.St.Ann. § 1355, p. 1564, provides that the court may modify the order for payment of alimony but only upon application of either of the parties.

[4, 5] It is well settled that once a valid judgment has been rendered it must be accorded full faith and credit by every other court within the United States even though the cause of action upon which the judgment was based is against the law and public policy of the state in which enforcement is sought. Fauntleroy v. Lum, 210 U.S. 230, 28 S.Ct. 641, 52 L.Ed. 1039; Roche v. McDonald, 275 U.S. 449, 48 S.Ct. 142, 72 L.Ed. 365, 53 A.L.R. 1141; Milwaukee County v. M. E. White Company, 296 U.S. 268, 56 S.Ct. 229, 80 L.Ed. 220; Hieston v. National City Bank of Chicago, 51 App.D.C. 394, 280 F. 525, 24 A.L.R. 1434; Westwater v. Murray, 6 Cir., 245 F. 427; Morrow v. Morrow, supra; 24 A.L.R. 1437; Goodrich, Conflict of Laws, 2d Ed., § 207. In the present case the provisions of the California law that a divorced wife is no longer entitled to alimony after she has remarried (California Civil Code, § 139; Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 P. 267, 11 Ann.Cas. 520; Tremper v. Tremper, 39 Cal. App. 62, 177 P. 868; Atlass v. Atlass, 112 Cal.App. 514, 297 P. 53; McClure v. McClure, 4 Cal.2d 356, 49 P.2d 584, 100 A.L.R. 1257; Hale v. Hale, 6 Cal.App.2d 661, 45 P.2d 246) or the rule that a court may reduce alimony payments upon the coming of age of the minor children (Hale v. Hale, supra) can in no way diminish the obligation of the California court to give full faith and credit to the Missouri decree with regard to accrued installments of alimony.

[6] The full faith and credit clause, however, does not obligate the courts of one state to enforce an alimony decree rendered in another state with regard to future payments, particularly when such future installments are subject to modification by the court of original jurisdiction. Sistare v. Sistare, supra; Lynde v. Lynde, supra; Barber v. Barber, supra; Cummings v. Cummings, 97 Cal.App. 144, 275 P. 245; Creager v. Superior Court, supra; Rinkenberger v. Rinkenberger, supra; Barns v. Barns, supra; McCullough v. McCullough, 203 Mich. 288, 168 N.W. 929; Levy v. Dockendorff, 177 App.Div. 249, 163 N.Y.S. 435; Richards v. Richards, 87 Misc. 134, 149 N.Y.S. 1028; Campbell v. Campbell, 28 Okl. 838, 115 P. 1111; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 117 Ohio St. 558, 160 N.E. 34, 57 A.L.R. 1108; Rosenberg v. Rosenberg, 152 Md. 49, 135 A. 840; McWilliams v. McWilliams, 216 Ala. 16, 112 So. 318; Freund v. Freund, 71 N.J.Eq. 524, 63 A. 756; Reik v. Reik, 101 N.J.Eq. 523, 139 A. 385; A.L.I., Restatement, Conflict of Laws, § 464. In the present case the Missouri court clearly retains authority to modify the amount of future installments not yet due upon proper application showing good cause by the defendant. Section 1355, Revised Missouri Statutes, 1929, Vol. I, p. 567, Mo.St.Ann. § 1355, p. 1564; Niedt v. Niedt, Mo.App., 104 S.W.2d 692; Meyers v. Meyers, 91 Mo.App. 151.

[7-10] Upon the basis of comity, however, as distinguished from the requirements of full faith and credit, the California courts have in numerous cases ordered that a foreign decree for future payments of alimony be established as the decree of the California court with the same force and effect as if it had been entered in this state, including punishment for contempt if the defendant fails to comply. Palen v. Palen, 12 Cal.App.2d 357, 55 P.2d 228; Creager v. Superior Court, supra; Straus v. Straus, 4 Cal.App.2d 461, 41 P.2d 218, 42 P.2d 378; Cummings v. Cummings, supra; Bruton v. Tearle, 7 Cal.2d 48, 59 P.2d 953, 106 A.L.R. 580; see, also, Morrow v. Morrow, supra.

Such a rule of comity is subject to the principle that foreign laws will not be given effect when contrary to the settled public policy of the forum. Estate of Lathrop, 165 Cal. 243, 131 P. 752; Whitney v. Dodge, 105 Cal. 192, 38 P. 636; Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 31 P. 915, 19 L.R.A. 40; Pearson v. Pearson, 51 Cal. 120; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714, 24 L.

It must be clear, however, that the enforcement of the right obtained under the laws of another state would be prejudicial to recognized standards of morality and to the general interests of the citizens in the state of the forum. Dennick v. Central R. Co. of N. J., 103 U.S. 11, 26 L.Ed. 439; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. Ry. Co., 31 Minn. 11, 16 N.W. 413, 47 Am.Rep. 771; Powell v. Great Northern R. Co., 102 Minn. 448, 113 N.W. 1017; Loucks v. Standard Oil Co. of New York, 224 N.Y. 99, 120 N.E. 198; International Harvester Co. v. McAdams, 142 Wis. 114, 124 N.W. 1042, 26 L.R.A.,N.S., 774, 20 Ann.Cas. 614; Whitney v. Dodge, 105 Cal. 192, 38 P. 636; 5 Cal.Jur. 423; 12 C.J. 439; 15 C.J.S., Conflict of Laws, § 4. Actually as set forth in the restatement: "There is a strong public policy favoring the enforcement of duties validly created by the law governing their creation. Denial of enforcement of the foreign claim will result in an undeserved benefit to the defendant." A.L.I. Restatement, Conflict of Laws, § 612, comment c; see Beach, Uniform Interstate Enforcement of Vested Rights, 1918, 27 Yale L.Jour. 656. A mere variance between the law of the forum and the law of the state where the cause arose does not alone warrant such denial of enforcement. Dennick v. Central R. Co. of N. J., supra; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. Ry. Co., supra; Powell v. Great Northern R. Co., supra; Loucks v. Standard Oil Co. of New York, supra; International Harvester Co. v. McAdams, supra; Whitney v. Dodge, supra; 5 Cal.Jur. 423; 12 C.J. 439, 15 C.J.S., Conflict of Laws, § 4.

[11-13] In the present case the Missouri law differs from that of California in permitting alimony payments to continue after the remarriage of the divorced wife. Gunderson v. Gunderson, 4 Cal.App.2d 257, 40 P.2d 956. Such a right to receive future installments of alimony, however, even though at variance with Civil Code section 139 is not perforce inharmonious with local public policy. It offers no threat to either the moral standards or the general interests of the citizens of this state. To hold that the right created in Missouri is so immoral as to be unenforceable here would involve a complacent attribution of moral superiority to this state. The remarriage and the coming of age of the minor children offer grounds for modification of the original decree for which the defendant can make application in the court of original jurisdiction in Missouri, and it is not incumbent upon the California court to refuse to give prospective effect to the decree upon these grounds. Handschy v. Handschy, 32 Cal. App.2d 504, 90 P.2d 123. Therefore, the judgment of the trial court ordering the defendant to pay to the plaintiff $25 per week in the future from the date of the judgment is valid and enforceable until such time as the Missouri court modifies its decree.

[14, 15] It is a principle of conflict of laws recognized in California that the barring of a claim by the statute of limitations is a procedural matter governed by the law of the forum, regardless of where the cause of action arose. McElmoyle v. Cohen, 38 U.S. 312, 13 Pet. 312, 10 L.Ed. 177; Townsend v. Jemison, 50 U.S. 407, 9 How. 407, 13 L.Ed. 194; Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean, 168 Cal. 642, 144 P. 139; Miller v. Lane, 160 Cal. 90, 116 P. 58. It is a corollary that an action brought upon a judgment of a sister state is subject to the limitations prescribed by the law of the state where the action is brought. Stewart v. Spaulding, 72 Cal. 264, 13 P. 661; 3 Freeman, Judgments, § 1456.

[16, 17] Section 336 of the California Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action upon a judgment or decree of any court of the United States or of any state within the United States must be brought within five years. A decree for future payments of alimony is a continuing judgment. The trial court in this case therefore gave judgment for those installments of alimony which had accrued within five years prior to the bringing of the action, the California statute of limitations having run on all installments accruing prior to that time.

Section 361 of the California Code of Civil Procedure, however, provides: "When a cause of action has arisen in another state, or in a foreign country, and by the laws thereof an action thereon cannot there be maintained against a person by reason of the lapse of time, an action thereon shall not be maintained against him in this state, except in favor of one who has been a citizen of this state, and who has held the cause of action from the time it accrued." This section applies only to causes of action barred by the law of the state of creation, but not by the law of this state. Littlepage v. Morck, 120 Cal.App. 88, 7 P.2d 716. Since the plaintiff has not been a citizen of this state from the time the cause of action accrued, this section has the effect of applying the Missouri statute of limitations to those installments accruing within five years, upon which the California statute of limitations has not run. Stewart v. Spaulding, 72 Cal. 264, 13 P. 661; Van Buskirk v. Kuhns, 164 Cal. 472, 129 P. 587, 44 L.R.A., N.S., 710, Ann.Cas.1914B, 932.

Defendant therefore sets up as a bar to this action section 886 of the Revised Missouri Statutes of 1929, Mo.St.Ann. § 886, p. 1168, in force at the time the original alimony decree was secured by plaintiff which provides: "Every judgment, order or decree of any court of record of the United States, or of this or any other state, territory or country, shall be presumed to be paid and satisfied after the expiration of ten years from the date of the original rendition thereof, or if the same has been revived upon personal service duly had upon the defendant or defendants therein, then after ten years from and after such revival, or in case a payment has been made on such judgment, order or decree, and duly entered upon the record thereof, after the expiration of ten years from the last payment so made, and after the expiration of ten years from the date of the original rendition or revival upon personal service, or from the date of the last payment, such judgment shall be conclusively presumed to be paid, and no execution, order or process shall issue thereon, nor shall any suit be brought, had or maintained thereon for any purpose whatever."

This section has been held effective to cut off the right to continuing alimony installments if no payment is made or action taken upon the original decree within ten years after rendition. Mayes v. Mayes, 342 Mo. 401, 116 S.W.2d 1. It has been interpreted, however, by the Missouri courts as constituting a statute of limitations which must be specially pleaded to be available in defense to an action on a judgment. Excelsior Steel Furnace Co. v. Smith, Mo. App., 17 S.W.2d 378; Flink v. Parcell, 344 Mo. 49, 124 S.W.2d 1189.

[18, 19] Defendant properly pleaded his contention under California law when he alleged by answer that plaintiff's cause of action "is barred by the provisions of section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California". C.C.P. § 458; Lilly-Brackett Co. v. Sonnemann, 157 Cal. 192, 198, 106 P. 715, 21 Ann.Cas. 1279. The trial court, however, expressly found that "it is not true that said judgment is barred by section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California". Defendant has appealed upon the judgment roll alone. He has made no showing on appeal that any evidence was introduced below to sustain his burden of proving that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. C.C.P. § 458; First National Bank v. Armstrong, 110 Cal.App. 408, 294 P. 25; 16 Cal.Jur. 626. He has not shown that plaintiff failed to take some action upon the original decree within ten years after its rendition. Every intendment favors the validity of the judgment as rendered, and if no evidence is presented in the record on appeal, it must be assumed that sufficient evidence was presented to the trial court to sustain its finding of fact. Morris v. Board of Education, 119 Cal.App. 750, 7 P.2d 364, 8 P.2d 502; Archer v. Harvey, 164 Cal. 274, 128 P. 410. Defendant's contention that the action is barred by section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure therefore cannot be sustained.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

We concur: GIBSON, C. J.; SHENK, J.; EDMONDS, J.; PETERS, J. pro tem.; WARD, J. pro tem.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

I concur in that portion of the majority opinion which holds that the judgment should be affirmed as to those alimony payments which had accrued under the Missouri decree within five years immediately preceding the commencement of this action, but I dissent from that portion of said opinion which purports to affirm that portion of the judgment of the trial court establishing the Missouri decree as a California judgment requiring payments henceforth of $25 per week by the husband to the wife although the Missouri award was for the support of both the children and the wife, and the children have now reached majority, and the wife, since the Missouri decree, has remarried. It is true that the second marriage has been dissolved, but when we consider that the wife has done nothing to enforce the Missouri decree from the time of its entry until 1938, and during that time has lived with the husband for four years and has been married and divorced a second time, considerations of good morals, social principles, natural justice, and fair play require a determination that it is against the public policy of this state to establish the Missouri decree as a California judgment requiring the husband in the future to pay $25 per week to the wife. It must be conceded that whether or not future payments under the Missouri decree shall be so established, lies entirely in the discretion of the trial court, unaffected by the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution; but it is contended that such establishment is not against the public policy of this state as expressed by the legislature in section 139 of the Civil Code, which provides that alimony payments shall cease upon remarriage of the wife. The term "public policy" as used in connection with the enforcement by one state of another state's laws is at best vague and impossible of precise definition, and it is true that a state's public policy ordinarily is not violated merely because there is a variance in the laws of the states involved, and that before there is such a violation of the law of the other state, it must be contrary to good morals or natural justice. But in this instance we have a declaration of policy in California which states that a woman cannot look to her former divorced husband for support and maintenance after she has become the wife of another man. It is undoubtedly a fundamental social principle inherent in the fiber of any flourishing and successful social order, that marriage, and the home life and families that flow therefrom, are to be fostered and encouraged at all times. The law that relieves a man from further alimony payments after his divorced wife remarries, not only encourages a man to remarry and establish a home and rear a family because he is relieved of the burden of supporting his first wife, but in the majority of instances will make his remarriage a possibility; whereas, due to economic circumstances, it would be out of the question, if he has a former wife to support. It necessarily follows, therefore, that natural justice and fundamental social principles are advanced and secured by the policy declared in section 139 of our Civil Code and any law to the contrary is a violation of the public policy involved in the doctrine of comity and should not be countenanced by this court. There is no injustice caused to the woman. When she marries the second time, she takes her new companion for better or worse, and choses, and in justice should look to him and him alone for her maintenance. He should not be relieved from this obligation, nor be permitted to live a life of ease and idleness at the expense of not only the efforts and toil of the first husband, but also at the much greater cost of making it economically impossible for the first husband to remarry. The decision cites Handschy v. Handschy, 32 Cal.App. 2d 504, 90 P.2d 123, for its position, but rather than supporting it, that decision unequivocally states that it is against the public policy of California to enforce a divorce decree of a sister state which requires the payment of alimony after remarriage. In the cited case it is said at page 509 of 32 Cal.App.2d, 90 P.2d at page 126: "Appellant contends also that as the children became of age the amount of alimony awarded was ipso facto reduced to the extent that the same provided for their maintenance and support, and that the trial court erred in refusing to allow him credit accordingly, although no modification had been made of the decree by the Illinois court. No authority is cited by appellant in support of his contention, nor have we found any. There are cases wherein accrued instalments of an award for support and maintenance for wife and minor children were canceled, the wife having remarried and the children become of age, but in those cases it is clear that the remarriage of the wife was the principal factor considered by the court, it being held that to require a husband to pay for the support and maintenance of his divorced wife, following her remarriage to another, would in the absence of extraordinary conditions, violate a sound principle of law and be against a recognized public policy. Hale v. Hale, 6 Cal.App.2d 661, 45 P.2d 246; Atlass v. Atlass, 112 Cal.App. 514, 297 P. 53."

Here the children are of age, and it certainly would do violence to the policy of our state founded on natural justice and basic social principles to permit the establishment of the Missouri decree requiring appellant to make payments to the wife in the future. The portion of the judgment of the trial court so declaring should be reversed.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 26, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 28, 1941.

1. Appeal and error ⇐713(1)

Technically, minute order included in clerk's transcript on judgment roll appeal was not a part of the judgment roll but appellate court could consider it on motion to dismiss appeal on ground that judgment was a consent judgment where certificate of clerk and trial judge certified as to correctness of the minute order. Code Civ.Proc. § 670.

2. Appeal and error ⇐799

Where on judgment roll appeal certificate of clerk and trial judge certified as to correctness of minute order included in the clerk's transcript, the showings made were substantially the same as if motion to dismiss appeal had been accompanied with a separate affidavit of clerk setting forth the minute order, as regards appellate court's right to consider the minute order in passing on motion to dismiss appeal. Code Civ.Proc. § 670.

3. Appeal and error ⇐125

An appeal will be dismissed, on motion, upon showing that judgment appealed from was entered upon the consent of appellant.

4. Appeal and error ⇐125

Where judgment appealed from was entered upon the consent of appellant, the appellant is conclusively presumed to have waived all errors, at least those not going to the jurisdiction of the court.

5. Appeal and error ⇐125

A party cannot object to a judgment, order, or ruling consented to by him.

6. Courts ⇐24

Jurisdiction over the subject matter may not be conferred on a court by consent of the litigant.

7. Courts ⇐170

Where complaint alleged that plaintiff as accommodation to defendant executed a note to another in sum of $1,250 which defendant agreed to pay, that defendant had omitted to make payments past due on note, and that by reason thereof plaintiff had been damaged in sum of $1,250 for which amount he prayed judgment and also requested $250 for attorney's fees but did not allege that plaintiff paid note, the complaint stated a cause of action within jurisdiction of municipal court of San Francisco. Code Civ.Proc. § 89.

8. Courts ⇐486

When a counterclaim arising out of transaction set forth in complaint as foundation of plaintiff's claim or a cross-complaint is filed by defendant in excess of jurisdictional limit of municipal court, the municipal court must transfer the cause to the superior court. Code Civ.Proc. § 396.

9. Courts ⇐486, 488(1)

Where action is instituted in municipal court and a counterclaim arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as foundation of plaintiff's claim or a cross-complaint is filed by defendant in excess of jurisdictional limit of municipal court so that the cause is transferred to the superior court, the superior court then has complete jurisdiction of the controversy. Code Civ.Proc. § 396.

10. Courts ⇐486

The purpose of statute providing for transfer of cause from municipal court to superior court when counterclaim or cross-complaint is filed by defendant in excess of jurisdictional limits of municipal court is to require the entire controversy to be determined in one action. Code Civ.Proc. § 396, and § 439, as amended by St.1939, p. 1940.

11. Pleading ⇐3

The nature of a pleading will be determined from its allegations regardless of its designation.

12. Courts ⇐488(1)

Where complaint alleged that as an accommodation to defendant, plaintiff executed a note which defendant agreed to pay and that by reason of defendant's failure to make payments past due on note, plaintiff had been damaged and requested money judgment, defendant's pleading, designated a cross-complaint, alleging that plaintiff had become indebted to defendant for legal services on which balance of $5,645 was due and owing was probably a "counterclaim" since like the complaint it prayed for a money judgment so that even though it did not relate to or depend upon contract upon which action was brought, the superior court to which municipal court transferred the action had jurisdiction of the entire controversy. Code Civ.

13. Pleading ⇐138, 147

A "cross-complaint" must relate or depend upon the contract, transaction, matter, happening or accident upon which action is brought whereas a "counterclaim" need only tend to diminish or defeat the plaintiff's recovery and need not be related to or connected with the cause of action set up in the complaint. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 438, 442.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Cross-Complaint".

14. Courts ⇐486

Where action was filed in municipal court but defendant filed pleading seeking recovery of amount in excess of municipal court's jurisdiction, if the defendant's pleading was a counterclaim, the municipal court properly transferred the cause to the superior court and the superior court had jurisdiction of the subject matter regardless of whether the transaction set forth in the counterclaim arose out of or was connected with the transaction set forth in the complaint. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 396, 438, 442, and § 439, as amended by St.1939, p. 1940.

15. Courts ⇐486

Where plaintiff alleged that by reason of defendant's failure to pay note on which plaintiff was accommodation maker plaintiff had been damaged, defendant's pleading alleging that plaintiff was indebted to defendant for legal services for $5,645 and that plaintiff breached promise to assist defendant in payment of note by paying the attorney's fee, even if defendant's pleading was a cross-complaint, the transaction set forth therein "arose out of" or was "connected with" the transaction set forth in the complaint within statutory requirement so that the municipal court which did not have jurisdiction of amount claimed in the cross-complaint properly transferred the cause to the superior court. Code Civ.Proc. § 396.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; I. M. Golden, Judge.

Action by Joseph E. Robertson against Ivan N. Maroevich for a money judgment wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint or counterclaim. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. On petition of plaintiff, an order to show cause why a writ of supersedeas should not be granted was issued with a temporary stay in the meantime and thereafter defendant moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the judgment appealed from had been entered upon consent of the plaintiff.

Petition for writ of supersedeas denied, order to show cause with temporary stay discharged and motion to dismiss appeal granted and appeal dismissed.

Edward D. Mabson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edmund J. Holl, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Hearing denied; PETERS, Justice pro tem., took no part in the consideration or decision of this matter.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

On petition of appellant this court issued an order to show cause why a writ of supersedeas should not be granted, with a temporary stay in the meantime. Thereafter, respondent moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the judgment appealed from had been entered upon consent of appellant. Inasmuch as we are of the opinion that the appeal must be dismissed for the reason that the record shows that the judgment appealed from was entered upon, and with the consent of, appellant, the petition for the writ of supersedeas must be denied.

After judgment was rendered by the trial court in favor of respondent, appellant perfected a judgment roll appeal. In the Clerk's Transcript appears a minute order, in which it is recited: "Whereupon, pursuant to stipulation of counsel for respective parties, the Court ordered judgment for defendant and cross-complainant Ivan N. Maroevich and against plaintiff and cross-defendant Joseph E. Robertson for the sum of Fifteen Hundred Dollars ($1,500.00), payable within 30 days, and that said plaintiff and cross-defendant Joseph E. Robertson assume full liability for and pay to the Morris Plan Company of San Francisco the balance due on note No. 43607A amounting to the sum of $750.00, and that plaintiff Joseph E. Robertson take nothing by his complaint against Ivan N. Maroevich.

"Whereupon the Court further ordered the action dismissed as to cross-defendanants Interstate Mausoleum Company, a corporation, and East Bay Mausoleum Company, a corporation.

"Findings waived in open court." (Italics ours.)

[1, 2] While technically this minute order is not a part of the judgment roll, sec. 670, Code Civ.Proc., there can be no doubt of the propriety of this court considering it on this motion to dismiss the appeal, in support of the contention of respondent that the judgment subsequently entered was a consent judgment. The certificate of the clerk and trial judge certifies as to the correctness of the minute order. Under such circumstances the showing made is substantially the same as if respondent had accompanied his notice of motion to dismiss with a separate affidavit of the clerk setting forth the minute order. It should also be added that appellant, both in the supersedeas proceeding, and on this motion, admits that the judgment was entered by, and with, his consent.

[3-5] The law is well settled that an appeal will be dismissed, on motion, upon a showing that the judgment appealed from was entered upon the consent of appellant. Under such circumstances the appellant is conclusively presumed to have waived all errors, at least those not going to the jurisdiction of the court. Reed v. Murphy, 196 Cal. 395, 238 P. 78; Hibernia Savings, etc., Soc. v. Waymire, 152 Cal. 286, 92 P. 645. As was said in Adams v. Southern Pac. Co., 109 Cal.App. 728, 731, 293 P. 681, 682: "It is well-settled law in California that a party cannot object to a judgment, order, or ruling consented to by him. [Citing cases.] This court will not disturb an order or judgment on an appeal taken by a party who consented thereto".

[6] Appellant does not challenge the correctness of this rule, nor deny that the judgment was predicated upon a stipulation in which he participated, but contends that the above rule has no application where the trial court has no jurisdiction to enter the judgment, and that in the instant case the judgment entered was beyond the jurisdiction of the trial court. In Reed v. Murphy, supra, it was intimated that such an exception to the rule may exist. See, also, Guigni v. Ratto, 41 Cal.App. 49, 181 P. 809. The exception contended for is based on the rule that jurisdiction over the subject matter may not be conferred on a court by the consent of the litigants.

If it be assumed that a litigant, after stipulating to the entry of a judgment against him, may, nevertheless, appeal on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject matter, such assumption is of no avail to appellant in the present case. The record here on file demonstrates that the trial court had jurisdiction over the subject matter of the action.

[7] The pleadings are not as clear as might be desired. The complaint was filed in the Municipal Court of San Francisco. It is therein alleged that appellant, as an accommodation to respondent, executed a promissory note to the Morris Plan Company in the sum of $1,250, which respondent agreed to pay; that respondent has omitted to make payments past due on the note; that by reason thereof appellant has been damaged in the sum of $1,250, for which amount he prays judgment. He also requested $250 for attorney's fees. It is not alleged that appellant paid the note. This complaint stated a cause of action within the jurisdiction of the municipal court, sec. 89, Code Civ.Proc.

Thereafter, respondent filed a pleading entitled, "Answer to Complaint, and Cross-Complaint". By the answer respondent admitted that he solicited appellant to sign the note, but denied that such solicitation was for the sole benefit of respondent. Respondent further admitted that he promised to pay the note, but alleged that, "plaintiff [appellant] agreed to assist said defendant [respondent] in the payment of said promissory note by paying to said defendant moneys due and past due on account of attorney's fees, but that said plaintiff has failed to pay any money or moneys to said defendant, necessitating the full obligation relative to said payments to be assumed and borne by said defendant". In another paragraph of the answer respondent alleges that appellant has failed to perform his promises "relative to payments to be made by said plaintiff [appellant] to said defendant [respondent] on account of attorney's fees due and past due to be applied in liquidation of said note". Respondent denies that appellant has been damaged in any sum.

In his so-called cross-complaint respondent alleges that, within two years last past, appellant and two corporations became indebted to him in the sum of $6,000 for legal services performed by respondent for appellant, of which a balance of $5,645 was alleged to be due and owing. In a second count respondent alleges that appellant and these companies became indebted to him in the sum of $5,645 upon an account stated.

In an answer and amended answer to the cross-complaint appellant seems to deny allegations of the first count of the cross-complaint, while admitting the same allegations contained in the second count of the cross-complaint.

Upon the filing of this cross-complaint a judge of the municipal court, inasmuch as the cross-complaint prayed for judgment in an amount in excess of the $2,000 jurisdictional limit of that court ordered the cause transferred to the superior court.

It is the theory of appellant that the superior court had no jurisdiction of the action because, to use his language, the "cross-complaint is not based upon the transaction or matter or happening upon which appellant's action was brought in the court below, nor does it affect the obligation to which plaintiff and appellant's action relates, and it does not state facts nor supply grounds sufficient to constitute a cause of action for cross-complaint against plaintiff and appellant".

This contention that the cause ought not to have been transferred to the superior court, and that, therefore, the superior court had no jurisdiction is clearly without merit. Section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that when an action is commenced in a court which has jurisdiction, but "it thereafter appears from the verified pleadings, or at the trial, or hearing, that the determination of the action or proceeding, or of a counterclaim arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint or petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or of a cross-complaint, will necessarily involve the determination of questions not within the jurisdiction of the court, in which the action or proceeding is pending, the court, whenever such lack of jurisdiction appears, must suspend all further proceedings therein and transfer the action or proceeding and certify the pleadings * * * to a court having jurisdiction thereof * * *".

[8-10] Under this section, when a counterclaim arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim, or a cross-complaint, is filed by defendant in excess of the jurisdictional limit of the municipal court, that court must transfer the cause to the superior court. The latter court then has complete jurisdiction of the controversy. Stratton v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.2d 693, 35 P.2d 393, 43 P.2d 539; Todhunter v. Smith, 219 Cal. 690, 28 P. 2d 916. The obvious purpose of this statute is to require that the entire controversy shall be determined in one action. The same fundamental concept is embodied in a 1939 amendment, St.1939, p. 1940, to section 439 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In that year the following sentence was added to the section: "If the defendant pleads a counterclaim in an amount in excess of the jurisdiction of the court in which the action is filed, the court shall thereupon order the case transferred to a court whose jurisdiction extends to the amount of the counterclaim."

[11-14] It is to be noted that section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure quoted, supra, applies to both a counterclaim and cross-complaint. Respondent designated his pleading as, "Answer to Complaint, and Cross-Complaint". However, the nature of a pleading will be determined from its allegations regardless of its designation. Terry Trading Corp. v. Barsky, 210 Cal. 428, 292 P. 474; Cornblith v. Valentine, 211 Cal. 243, 294 P.

1065. This pleading, although designated a cross-complaint, is probably a counterclaim, since it, like the complaint, prays for a money judgment. Luse v. Peters, 219 Cal. 625, 28 P.2d 357. The only importance, so far as this proceeding is concerned, as to whether the pleading is a counterclaim or cross-complaint is that a cross-complaint must relate or depend "upon the contract, transaction, matter, happening or accident upon which the action is brought", Code Civ.Proc., sec. 442, while a counterclaim, under section 438 of that code, need only "tend to diminish or defeat the plaintiff's recovery and must exist in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action". A counterclaim no longer need be related to, or connected with, the cause of action set up in the complaint. Terry Trading Corp. v. Barsky, supra; Luse v. Peters, supra. This becomes important because section 439 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1939, supra, requires the cause to be transferred to the superior court when any counterclaim in excess of the jurisdiction of the municipal court is filed. It is not required under that section, as it is by section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure quoted, supra, that the counterclaim arise "out of the transaction set forth in the complaint". If the questioned pleading is a counterclaim, then under section 439 of the Code of Civil Procedure the municipal court properly transferred the cause to the superior court, and the latter court clearly had jurisdiction of the subject matter, whether or not the transaction set forth in the counterclaim arose out of, or was connected with, the transaction set forth in the complaint.

[15, 16] However, even if the pleading is a cross-complaint, or if section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure is controlling, so that in either event it would have been improper to transfer the cause to the superior court unless the matter set forth in the cross-complaint or counterclaim arose out of, or was connected with, the transaction set forth in the complaint, nevertheless we are of the opinion that the transaction set forth in this pleading arose out of, or was connected with, the transaction set forth in the complaint. The allegations of the so-called cross-complaint are such as to clearly show that they refer to the same transaction as is set forth in the answer. The answer alleges that appellant agreed to assist respondent in paying the note by paying to respondent moneys past due for attorney's fees. If this is so, and, for purposes of jurisdiction, these allegations must be accepted as true, the transaction set forth in the so-called cross-complaint was integrally connected with, and arose out of, the transaction set forth in the complaint—in fact, the execution of the note and respondent's promise to pay it were part of the very transaction set forth in the so-called cross-complaint. To defeat recovery on the cause of action set forth in the complaint respondent alleged that appellant, at the time the note was executed, agreed to pay a debt owing to respondent, and that respondent was to use these funds to pay the note. A rule that would require respondent to defeat his liability in the municipal court in the action on the note by showing that his agreement to pay the note was conditioned upon appellant paying the indebtedness, and then compel him to sue in the superior court to recover the balance of the indebtedness, would tend to defeat the very purpose of sections 396 and 439 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Those sections were intended to prevent such piecemeal trying of cases.

[17, 18] For the foregoing reasons appellant's contention that the superior court did not have jurisdiction of the subject matter is without merit. Appellant having stipulated and consented to the entry of the judgment, under the authorities already cited, cannot lawfully appeal, and the appeal should be dismissed. Since this is so, the petition for the writ of supersedeas must be denied.

The petition for the writ of supersedeas is denied and the order to show cause with a temporary stay is discharged; the motion to dismiss the appeal is granted and the appeal dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Maxwell McNutt, Judge.

Action by Carl G. Sorensen and others against A. G. Lascy and B. P. Arata in which defendant Arata filed a cross-complaint against defendant Lascy to recover a deposit made by plaintiffs to defendant Lascy on a purchase price of realty owned by defendant Arata. The court found that plaintiffs were entitled to no relief and that Arata was entitled to recover from Lascy, and from the judgment, Lascy alone appeals.

Affirmed.

Aylett B. Cotton, of San Francisco, for appellant Sorensen.

Thomas T. Califro, of San Francisco (George D. Perry, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant Lascy.

Norman S. Menifee, of Redwood City, for respondent.

Hearing denied; PETERS, Justice pro tem., took no part in the consideration or decision of this matter.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiffs Carl G. Sorensen and Mary M. Sorensen, his wife, brought this action against B. P. Arata and A. Lascy to recover a $500 deposit paid by them to Lascy on the purchase price of certain real property owned by Arata in San Mateo County. Plaintiffs contended that Lascy, a real estate agent, and Arata had falsely represented that the land contained 120,000 square feet, when in fact it contained but 83,998 square feet. Defendant Arata filed a cross-complaint in which he sought recovery of the $500 from Lascy. The court found that plaintiffs were entitled to no relief, and that Arata was entitled to recover the $500 from Lascy. From this judgment Lascy alone appeals.

The main contention of appellant Lascy is that, in accepting the $500 deposit from the Sorensens, he was not acting as the agent for Arata, but was acting on his own account. He describes himself as an "option vendor". He refers to the rule that one may lawfully contract to sell property which he does not own, and contends that this was his relationship with the Sorensens. He also challenges the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment.

These contentions are made in spite of the fact that at the trial appellant waived any claim he might have to the $500. He made this waiver after evidence had been introduced showing that he had received the $500 deposit from the Sorensens on January 9, 1937; that he refused for several months thereafter to inform Arata, the owner, the amount of the deposit that he had received; that Arata finally wrote to the Sorensens and also filed charges against appellant before the Real Estate Board before he could ascertain the amount of the deposit. When these facts developed upon the trial, and while appellant was on the witness stand, the following occurred:

"The Court: You weren't selling any of your own property? A. No sir.

"Q. Did you tell Arata what you were getting for his property? A. Not at that time.

"Q. Is that the way you do business? A. What is that?

"Q. You sell a man's property, and you do not tell him what you are getting for it, is that the idea? What are you going to do with this $500? A. I want to give it back to whoever the court decides I should give it to.

"The Court: That is all.

"Mr. Califro [attorney for Lascy]: That is all.

"Mr. Cotton [attorney for the Sorensens]: Submitted.

"(Discussion.)

"The Court: I have not made up my mind what I am going to do, submitted."

The statement above italicized, when read with the rest of appellant's testimony, was reasonably calculated to convey to the trial judge the impression that appellant intended to waive any claim he might have to the $500, and that he was consenting to give this deposit either to the Sorensens or to Arata as the court might decide. That this was the interpretation placed upon the statement by the trial court and by appellant's own counsel is indicated by the fact that immediately upon appellant making the waiver, appellant's counsel stated that he had no further questions, and the trial judge submitted the case.

[1, 2] It is an elementary and fundamental rule of appellate procedure that a judgment or order will not be disturbed on an appeal prosecuted by a party who consented to it. Adams v. Southern Pac. Co., 109 Cal.App. 728, 293 P. 681; Reed v. Murphy, 196 Cal. 395, 238 P. 78; Hibernia Savings, etc., Soc. v. Waymire, 152 Cal. 286, 92 P. 645. See, also, cases collected in 2 Cal.Jur., p. 225, § 62; p. 849, § 498. Under the authority of these cases the judgment must be affirmed, without further consideration of the appeal. La Societe Francaise D'Epargnes v. Beardslee, 63 Cal. 160; Pacific Paving Co. v. Vizelich, 1 Cal.App. 281, 82 P. 82.

The reason behind this rule is well illustrated by the situation presented on the present appeal. When this cause went to trial appellant Lascy had in his possession the $500 deposit. The Sorensens were claiming the return of their deposit. Arata claimed the money as the owner of the land. Lascy also claimed the money. There was, therefore, a three-cornered contest over the deposit. The trial court was attempting to ascertain the theory upon which Lascy claimed the money when appellant stated that he waived his claim to it. Thereafter, the trial court prepared its findings, apparently in the belief that the only question left for determination was whether the Sorensens or Arata was entitled to the money. Judgment was then entered. Appellant then discovered certain defects in the findings, in so far as they relate to him, and prosecuted this appeal. It would be highly unfair to the trial court and to respondent to permit appellant to attack the judgment after they had been led to believe that he had abandoned his claim to the money.

It should also be added that we have read the reporter's transcript. A reading thereof demonstrates that an affirmance of the judgment will not result in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MEYER v. LINDSLEY.

Civ. 2472.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 30, 1941.

1. Appeal and error ⇐110

An order denying a motion for new trial is not an appealable order.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1170(7)

In order to justify reversal on ground of erroneous admission or rejection of evidence, reviewing court must be of opinion, after examination of entire cause including the evidence, that error complained of resulted in miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

3. Appeal and error ⇐901, 1032(1)

Burden rests upon party complaining not only to show error, but also to show that error is sufficiently prejudicial to justify reversal. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

4. Appeal and error ⇐907(4)

Every intendment is in favor of finding, decision, and judgment, and in support thereof it will be presumed that omitted evidence authorized the same unless there is something in record to overcome the presumption.

5. Appeal and error ⇐691

Where transcript filed on appeal contained only part of evidence, if testimony of certain witness contained some hearsay and if court erred in refusing to allow appellant to recall another witness to lay foundation for further impeachment of a witness, such errors would not be ground for reversal; there being nothing before District Court of Appeal to indicate that prejudice may have resulted therefrom.

6. Appeal and error ⇐701(1)

In absence of any evidence relating to main issues involved, reviewing court could not say that instructions were improperly given or refused, nor that, if there were errors, they were prejudicial.

7. Appeal and error ⇐701(1)

In order to secure reversal because of claimed error in giving and refusing of instructions, appellant must bring before reviewing court enough of the evidence to show that error claimed would have, or at least might have, affected result. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

8. Appeal and error ⇐907(4)

On appeal from judgment for plaintiff in malicious prosecution action, where trial lasted 9 days and some 40 witnesses were examined, but reporter's transcript contained only a fragment of testimony, reviewing court could assume in support of judgment that evidence disclosed without conflict that plaintiff did not do the act with which he had been charged in criminal complaint, and that there was not even shadow of probable cause for initiating of criminal action by defendant, and, under such circumstances, any minor error in connection with instructions could not have been misleading or prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; G. K. Scovel, Judge.

Action by R. G. Meyer against Floyd R. Lindsley for malicious prosecution. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. He also attempted to appeal from an order denying his motion for new trial.

Attempted appeal from order denying new trial dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Turner & Walde, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Winthrop O. Gordon, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

[1] This is an action for malicious prosecution, the complaint alleging that the defendant had initiated a criminal action in which this plaintiff was charged with drawing and exhibiting a pistol in violation of section 417 of the Penal Code. A jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the amount of $1,500, and the defendant has appealed from the ensuing judgment and has attempted to appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial, which is not an appealable order.

The appellant filed a written request for a transcript in which he asked only for that part of the record which contained the instructions, cross-examination of one witness, the testimony of one other witness, and offers of proof made in connection therewith. While it is stated in respondent's brief, and not denied in the appellant's closing brief, that the trial of this case lasted nine days and that some forty witnesses were examined, the reporter's transcript filed herein contains only, in addition to the instructions given and refused, the testimony of one witness on cross-examination and re-direct, the testimony of another witness given in rebuttal, the testimony of a third witness given in sur-rebuttal, and certain offers of proof. All of this evidence relates to whether or not the first two of these witnesses were biased against the appellant. There is no evidence before us as to any fact relating to the issues which were presented by the pleadings, and no evidence, pro or con, as to what happened on the occasion when the respondent was charged with having exhibited a gun.

[2-5] The appellant complains that the testimony of the first of these witnesses on redirect examination contains some hearsay, and that the court also erred in refusing to allow him to recall another witness in order to lay the foundation for further impeachment of one of these witnesses. It appears from the limited record before us that the testimony first objected to came in incidentally in explanation of the witness' previous testimony. The other matter, with the offers of proof, related to further attempts to show bias on the part of the two witnesses first mentioned and was purely cumulative. It would seem that the court was not unduly strict with the appellant in this regard since the only evidence now before us, consisting of ninety-five pages of the transcript, relates solely to bias on the part of these two witnesses.

Moreover, if we assume error in these respects, there is nothing before us to indicate that prejudice may have resulted therefrom. As was said in Coleman v. Farwell, 206 Cal. 740, 276 P. 335, 336: "In order to justify the reversal of the judgment on the ground of erroneous admission or rejection of evidence, the reviewing court must be of the opinion, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½. The burden rests upon the party complaining not only to show error but also to show that the error is sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal. 2 Cal.Jur. p. 1008 and cases cited. Confronted with the foregoing stipulation of counsel and the certificate of the trial judge reciting that the bill of exceptions contains only a part of the evidence offered by both the plaintiff and the defendant, and since, therefore, the record does not contain all of the evidence, we are unable to fulfill the constitutional requirement and declare that the errors complained of were prejudicial. See Foster v. Young, 172 Cal. 317, 156 P. 476. Every intendment is in favor of the findings, decision, and judgment, and in support thereof it will be presumed that the omitted evidence authorized the same unless there is something in the record to overcome the presumption. Owen v. Morton, 24 Cal. 373; 2 Cal.Jur. p. 852 et seq. For aught that appears in the record there may have been evidence of sufficient competency and weight to overcome any detriment caused by the erroneous rulings."

[6, 7] The appellant also contends that portions of certain instructions given were erroneous and that an instruction requested by him and refused should have been given. Both the giving and the effect of instructions necessarily depend on the evidence to which they relate and upon which they are based. And again, in the complete absence of any evidence relating to the main issues involved, it is neither possible to say that any of the matters here presented are erroneous nor that, if so, they are prejudicial. In order to secure a reversal because of claimed error in the giving and refusing of instructions it is incumbent upon an appellant to bring before the reviewing court enough of the evidence to show that the error claimed would have, or at least might have, affected the result. Moss v. Stubbs, 111 Cal.App. 359, 295 P. 572, 296 P. 86; Thompson v. M. K. & T. Oil Co., 5 Cal.App.2d 117, 42 P.2d 374.

[8] If we assume that portions of these instructions were technically incorrect, the instructions as a whole seem to present the issues which apparently must have been raised at the trial in a complete and rather fair manner. Many of the instructions, including some of which the appellant complains, were entirely too favorable to him. Insofar as here appears, it may well be that the evidence disclosed, without conflict, that the respondent did not do the act with which he had been charged in the criminal complaint and that there was not even a shadow of probable cause for the initiating of that criminal action by the appellant. Under such circumstances, which may be assumed in support of this judgment, any minor error in connection with the instructions could not have been misleading or prejudicial.

The attempted appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ASSUR. CORPORATION, LIMITED, OF LONDON, ENGLAND, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 12725.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 28, 1941.

1. Workmen's compensation ⇐1939

Question of duration of employee's disability was one of fact for the Industrial Accident Commission, and if there was substantial evidence to support finding and order of commission, District Court of Appeal could not substitute its views for those of the commission and annul the award.

2. Workmen's compensation ⇐1653

Testimony of employee to effect that he was unable to work because he had pains in his back presented substantial evidence to support finding of Industrial Accident Commission that disability had not ceased.

3. Workmen's compensation ⇐1416

The Industrial Accident Commission may not disregard opinion of medical experts, where the question is one within the knowledge of experts only and not within the common knowledge of laymen.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇐1418

In determining whether disability from injury to employee's back and head had ceased, opinions of expert witnesses were not conclusive on probable duration of pain, since employee himself was in best position to tell whether he was suffering pain, and question was not one which could be determined only by resorting to the sciences.

5. Evidence ⇐508

Expert testimony must be relied upon in cases where the truth is occult and can be found only by resorting to the sciences.

6. Workmen's compensation ⇐1939

Where insurance carrier claimed that disability of employee who testified he was unable to work because of pains in back had ceased, and claimed that guardian ad litem should have been appointed for employee, and that value of employee's testimony was lessened because of physician's report that employee was suffering from a mental disease, contention was overruled where both matters were before Industrial Accident Commission for consideration and referee was in position to judge value of employee's testimony, especially where employee had been in psychopathic ward for six days and had been discharged.

7. Workmen's compensation ⇐1001

Where Industrial Accident Commission conceded that finding that part of medical treatment furnished to injured employee was furnished by county and that he was entitled to reimbursement for reasonable medical expenses to be subsequently determined was erroneous, it was necessary to remand proceedings to commission.

8. Workmen's compensation ⇐1937

Where Industrial Accident Commission did not specifically find that employee's head injury had ceased on October 21, 1939, but commission conceded that employee did not suffer from head injury after such date and in view of fact that proceeding was required to be remanded for further action, petitioner was not injured by failure of commission to specify liability for back injury only.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Law by Joseph E. Christian, claimant, opposed by the Otis Elevator Company, employer and the Employers' Liability Insurance Corporation, Limited, insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation in favor of the claimant, and the insurance carrier petitions for writ of review.

Award annulled, and proceeding remanded.

Joe Crider, Jr., Clarence B. Runkle, and John J. Haydon, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice.

Joseph E. Christian was injured on August 11, 1939, while in the employ of Otis Elevator Company. There is no question but that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment. Petitioner is the insurance carrier for the employer and seeks to annul an award by the commission in favor of the employee.

Christian fell and struck his back and head while hoisting sections of an escalator. The commission found that he suffered "injury to his back and head * * * said injury caused temporary total disability beginning August 11, 1939, to and including January 8, 1940, and continuing indefinitely thereafter * * *". Petitioner admits some injury to both the back and head of the employee but contends that all of the disability had disappeared as of October 21, 1939, the date on which it stopped payments of disability indemnity to the employee.

The respondent commission concedes that the head injury did not endure later than October 21, 1939, but contends that the back injury continued beyond that date and that the evidence is sufficient to uphold the award. Petitioner presented reports of a number of medical experts holding that the employee was suffering from a mental affliction having no bearing upon his employment and also holding that the disability caused by the injury to the back did not continue beyond the date on which payment ceased. It is contended that there is no substantial conflict in the evidence and that the opinions and findings of the experts must be followed by the commission. Dr. C. W. Irish was on January 15, 1940, appointed by the commission as expert medical adviser and he reported: "Tenderness was reported on palpitation over the sacroiliac synchondroses, but particularly of the gluteli muscles, entirely bilaterally". The employee stated that he had not been able to do any work since the time of the accident. He testified: "The reason I am unable to work at this time is because I have pains in the back, and I can't do any heavy lifting; that is why I can't work.

"Q. Have you tried to do any work? A. I haven't tried to. I changed a tire on my car, and I had a terrible time doing it."

[1-5] The question of the duration of the disability is one of fact to be determined by the commission and if there is substantial evidence to support the finding and order of the commission this court may not substitute its views for those of the commission and annul the award. Hartford A. & I. Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 202 Cal. 688, 262 P. 309, 58 A.L.R. 1392. It appears from the reports of the physicians that the employee did in fact receive an injury to his back. The testimony of the employee presented substantial evidence to support the finding of the commission that the disability had not ceased on January 8, 1940. We are not unmindful of the rule that the commission may not disregard the opinion of medical experts in cases where the question is "one within the knowledge of experts only, and * * * not within the common knowledge of laymen". William Simpson Const. Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 74 Cal.App. 239, 240 P. 58, 59. The present case, however, is not one in which experts only could supply information, for the injured person naturally was in the best position to tell whether he was suffering pain. The experts could give opinions as to the probable duration of the pain, but their opinions would not be conclusive in a particular case. Expert testimony must be relied upon "in cases where the truth is occult and can be found only by resorting to the sciences". State Comp. Ins. Fund v. Industrial Accident Comm., 195 Cal. 174, 231 P. 996, 1000. The question whether Mr. Christian was suffering such pain as would prevent his working at the time of the hearing by the commission was not one which could be determined only by resorting to the sciences. In Los Angeles County v. Industrial Accident Comm., 14 Cal. App.2d 134, 57 P.2d 1341, the employee suffered a severe pain in the lower part of his back while lifting a heavy tire wheel. The commission made an award for permanent injury based upon the testimony of the employee without the evidence of experts. This court refused to annul the award.

[6] Petitioner contends that a guardian ad litem should have been appointed for Mr. Christian, basing the contention upon the reports of physicians that he was suffering from a mental disease. It is also argued that the mental condition of the employee was such as to lessen the value of his testimony given before the commission. Both of these matters were before the commission for its consideration and the referee was in position to judge the value of the testimony of the employee in view of the claims of his mental incapacity. Moreover, the evidence on the subject of the mental condition of the employee is not without conflict. Mr. Christian was in the psychopathic ward of the General Hospital for observation for a period of six days and was discharged on the recommendation of the physician in charge, Dr. Carter stating: "Patient may have had some episode before coming here as described, but since he has been here he has been perfectly all right. I see no reason why he could not go outside".

[7] The commission found that part of the medical treatment furnished to Mr. Christian was furnished by the county of Los Angeles and that he is entitled to reimbursement for the reasonable medical expenses to be subsequently determined. The commission now concedes that this finding is erroneous and it will therefore be necessary to remand the proceeding to the commission.

[8] Petitioner complains that the commission did not specifically find that the head injury had ceased on October 21, 1939, and expresses the fear that it may be held liable indefinitely for the mental unsoundness of the employee. The commission concedes that the employee did not suffer from the head injury after October 21, 1939. In view of this concession on the part of the commission and in view of the fact that the proceeding must be remanded for further action, we fail to see how petitioner has been injured by the failure of the commission to specify liability for the back injury only. This point may be clarified by the commission in a subsequent award.

The award is annulled and the proceeding is remanded to respondent commission for further action not inconsistent with this opinion.

VOTAW v. MILLER et al.

Civ. 11561.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 29, 1941.

1. Venue ⇐68

The burden of excusing delays in the making of a motion for change of venue rested on the defendant seeking the change of venue.

2. Venue ⇐77

Whether defendant which sought a change of venue acted with reasonable diligence was a fact question to be determined by the trial court.

3. Venue ⇐77

Where defendant made no motion for change of venue when it appeared on August 19 to have default judgment vacated, and did not serve a notice of motion to change the venue until August 25, reciting that the motion would be made on September 6, and defendant did not appear when order denying motion to change the venue was denied on October 7 and made no showing as to the reason for the delays, trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying motion for change of venue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Swain, Judge.

Suit in equity by V. J. Votaw, etc., against Mervin Miller, Mervin Miller, Inc., Limited, and others. From an order denying the motion of Mervin Miller, Inc., Limited, for change of venue, Mervin Miller, Inc., Limited, appeals.

Order affirmed.

John Preston King, of Lindsay, for Appellant.

Nichols, Cooper & Hickson, of Pomona, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

On August 27, 1937, the plaintiff filed a complaint in equity against Mervin Miller Incorporated, Ltd., and three individuals alleged to be the sole stockholders. On November 5, 1937, the default of the corporation was entered. On December 17, 1937, the action was dismissed as to the personal defendants. On August 19, 1938, the motion of the corporation to vacate its default was granted. On August 25, 1938, the corporation served a notice of motion to change the place of trial from Los Angeles county to Tulare county and at the same time it served a copy of a written demand, an affidavit of merits, and a demurrer. The notice of motion recited that the motion would be made on the 6th day of September, 1938. On October 7, 1938, the plaintiff filed an affidavit in opposition to the motion to change the venue. On the 7th day of October the trial court caused to be entered an order as follows: "Demurrer of defendant Mervin Miller Incorporated, Ltd., to complaint and motion for change of venue come on for hearing, Nichols, Cooper & Hickson appearing as attorneys for plaintiff, and John Preston King, attorney for the defendants but not present. Said demurrer is overruled; defendant named is given ten days to answer. Motion for change of venue is denied." From the order denying the motion to change the venue the defendant has appealed.

[1-3] The defendant calls to our attention that its affidavit was regular in form and set forth that its principal place of business was in Tulare county. Continuing it asserts that the affidavit in opposition was insufficient because in part it was made on information and belief. The defendant contends that its motion should therefore have been granted. The plaintiff replies that the order made by the trial court was general in terms and, nothing to the contrary appearing, it will be assumed that the trial court based its ruling on the fact that the defendant had not acted with due diligence. We think the reply is entirely sufficient. The record is entirely silent as to why the defendant did not make its motion to change the venue when it appeared on August 19.

1938. The record is also silent as to why the defendant did not bring its motion to a hearing on September 16, 1938. Furthermore, the record is silent as to why the defendant did not appear and present its motion on October 7, 1938, the day on which the order was made. The burden of excusing these delays rested on the defendant. Hart v. Forgeus, 184 Cal. 327, 330, 193 P. 764. Whether the defendant acted with reasonable diligence was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court. Smith v. Pelton Water Wheel Co., 151 Cal. 399, 401, 90 P. 932, 1135; Davison v. Gentry, 136 Cal.App. 423, 428, 29 P.2d 266. On the record as made it may not be said that the trial court abused its discretion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MONROE v. SAN JOAQUIN LIGHT & POWER CORPORATION.

Civ. 6436.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 28, 1941.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 28, 1941.

1. Negligence ⇐2, 56(1)

In order to constitute "actionable negligence", it is necessary to show a legal duty to use due care, a breach of such legal duty, and that such breach is the proximate cause of the resulting injury.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Actionable Negligence".

2. Electricity ⇐16(1)

If power company was negligent in the installation of transformation facilities for milk products company and such negligence constituted proximate cause of injuries received by employee of products company to whom power company owed duty to use due care, lack of ownership, control, or obligation to maintain such electrical equipment was immaterial in determining power company's liability for employee's injuries.

3. Electricity ⇐14(1)

One who supplies electricity is under a duty to use due care in the construction and installation of the necessary electrical facilities.

4. Electricity ⇐14(1), 15(1)

The duty of one who supplies electricity to use due care in the construction and installation of the necessary electrical facilities is extended to any person who might with reasonable anticipation be endangered by faulty or improper electrical equipment or installation, and the duty is obviated only as to trespassers or individuals who may be unlawfully upon the premises at time of injury.

5. Electricity ⇐19(5)

Evidence that power company, in installing transformation facilities under contract with milk products company for purpose of facilitating use of electrical power by products company, installed a wire carrying 6,600 volts encased only in a weatherproof covering within three feet of ground in the enclosed transformer yard, supported finding that electric company was negligent in installation of transformation facilities and that such negligence was the "proximate cause" of injuries resulting from electric shock sustained by employee of products company when he came in contact with wire while cutting weeds in the transformer yard.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Proximate Cause".

6. Negligence ⇐4

The conduct of an individual is "negligent" when it creates an unreasonable risk of harm to some general class of persons.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Negligent".

7. Electricity ⇐14(1)

The duty of due care required in use of electricity is such care as a reasonably careful and prudent person, having in view the dangers to be avoided and the likelihood of injury therefrom, would exercise under the circumstances, in order to prevent injury.

8. Electricity ⇐14(1)

Where death may be caused by an agency lawfully in use such as electricity, ordinary care requires that every means known, or that with reasonable inquiry would be known, must be used to prevent it.

9. Negligence ⇐142

Trial court's finding that defendant's negligent conduct was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries was necessarily a finding against any contention in regard to an independent intervening act as a superseding cause of the injuries.

10. Negligence ⇐56(1)

The doctrine of "proximate cause" is based on principle that consequences which follow from the original wrong in unbroken sequence, without an intervening sufficient independent cause, are natural and proximate, and for these the original wrongdoer is responsible.

11. Electricity ⇐16(7)

In action by employee of milk products company against power company for injuries sustained as result of electric shock when he came in contact with an uninsulated wire while cutting weeds in transformer yard installed by power company under contract with products company, finding that power company's negligent installation of transformation facilities was "proximate cause" of employee's injuries, and that act of products company's foreman in admitting employee into transformer yard without calling on power company to turn off electric power was not a "superseding cause", was proper.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Superseding Cause".

12. Electricity ⇐19(5)

In action by employee of milk products company against power company for injuries sustained as result of electric shock when he came in contact with an uninsulated wire while cutting weeds in transformer yard installed by power company under contract with products company, evidence supported finding that employee was not contributorily negligent, so as to prevent recovery.

13. Negligence ⇐82, 122(1)

The burden of proving contributory negligence is on defendant, and, in order to find that plaintiff's negligence constitutes a defense, such negligent conduct must proximately contribute to the injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; J. D. Garibaldi, Judge.

Action by Eugene Monroe against the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation for personal injuries resulting from electric shock. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Thos. J. Straub and W. H. Spaulding, both of San Francisco, and F. H. Pearson, of Fresno, for appellant.

C. Ray Robinson, Willard B. Treadwell, and W. Eugene Craven, all of Merced, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a judgment by the court awarding damages to respondent for personal injuries. The injuries, resulting from electric shock, were received by the respondent while he was performing work as an employee of The California Milk Products Company. Respondent's employment with the products company consisted in carrying out duties both as fireman and common laborer. Upon the occasion of the injury, Mr. Monroe, the respondent, and a fellow employee, Mr. Lopez, were directed by their foreman to enter the company transformer yard or sub-station for the purpose of clearing out a growth of weeds. The men were supplied with the proper tools for their work and were repeatedly warned by the foreman as to the dangerous nature of the sub-station electrical equipment, and to keep away from the electric wires. There was also a large warning sign placed upon the outside of the wire fence enclosing the transformer yard, which read: "High Voltage, Danger, High Voltage". Both men admittedly read this sign.

The two men proceeded to their work as directed, and had been working for perhaps a half hour prior to the time of the accident. Lopez testified that he heard a sputtering of electricity and a loud groan, and that upon looking around he perceived that respondent was up against the electric wire which was connected to the first of the three transformers; that the electricity was sputtering on respondent's shoulder and that after a brief interval respondent dropped to the ground. Respondent testified that he had cleaned out some weeds near the first transformer and that he had then walked over to discuss their disposal with Lopez; that he had returned to work when the accident happened. He testified as follows: "Well, all I knew it hit me all at once and I felt as though something was going to tear me to pieces,—I couldn't holler or make any noise,—I couldn't see,—I just finally went down to the ground on my head there." Lopez and respondent were the only witnesses present at the time of the accident. There is no evidence in explanation of the immediate cause for the contact with the electric wire. There were no eyewitnesses to that circumstance, as Lopez had turned his back to respondent, and the testimony discloses a failure on his part to perceive the contact with the wire.

The transformer yard, which was the scene of the accident, is located adjacent to the products company plant, and the electrical equipment therein, consisting of transformers, poles, wiring, etc., was provided and installed by appellant power corporation for the purpose of facilitating the use of electrical power necessary for production carried on by the products company. This equipment, which may be termed "transformation facilities", was installed by the power company under a contract entered into with the products company on September 27, 1929, and the transformation facilities were completely installed by the early part of 1930. The contract provided that the products company should pay the power corporation in five equal annual installments,—the title to the transformers and equipment to remain in the power corporation until payment in full by the products company. It was also provided the power corporation would repurchase the transformation facilities from the products company in the event of certain changes taking place in the power corporation's schedule. The products company made their last and final payment on the transformers under this contract in 1934.

During the period of service under this contract, and until the date of respondent's injury on May 12, 1937, the operation and maintenance of the sub-station electrical equipment was taken care of by employees of both the power corporation and the products company. There were two padlocks on the sub-station gate. One lock was owned by the power corporation and the other owned by the products company. The opening of either lock permitted access to the transformer yard, as the two padlocks were interlocked within one another.

The products company employed their own electrician for the purpose of operating the sub-station and he took care of the repair work, with the exception of a few instances when employees of the power corporation did certain repair work, which was necessary from time to time, subsequent to the installation of the electrical equipment.

It appears that the power corporation was called upon for assistance only when the electrician employed by the products company was unable to perform the repair work, and with few exceptions, the only employee of the power corporation having occasion to enter the transformer yard was the meter reader. Except for the work performed by the product company's electrician, the only occasion for sending employees within the enclosure was for the purpose of clearing out the weeds about once a year.

The three transformers in this enclosure were fixed to concrete bases set in the ground and were approximately two feet apart. The wires supplying current to these transformers drop from an overhead service and connect with leads between the transformers in pairs. Leading out from the first transformer in line, which transformer is adjacent to the meter box, another wire, which extends from a position some three feet from the ground, carries up and across at an angle contacting an insulator which is fixed to a cross-arm on a pole. This cross-arm is located approximately five feet from the ground.

The respondent came in contact with this wire at a point approximately four feet from the ground and some twelve inches from the position of the insulator located upon the cross-arm. Mr. Simonson, an expert electrical engineer, testified that this was a copper wire insulated with a weather-proofing cover. This covering consists of two or more cotton braids or a tape and braid which has been saturated with a compound, and resembles in outward appearance an insulated wire. Mr. Simonson testified that this type of covering was of very little, if any, value as an insulation against electric current. Appellant, power corporation, does not contend that the weather-proof covering enclosing the wire with which respondent came in contact, was sufficient insulation against 6,600 volts to ground, which was being carried by the wire.

With the exception of a few minor changes the electrical equipment within the transformer yard, including the weather-proof covered wire, was in the same condition at the time of injury to respondent as existed at the time of installation.

The complaint alleges negligence on the part of appellant in the installation and maintenance of the transformation facilities and alleged that such negligence constituted a proximate cause of the injuries to respondent.

The answer of appellant denies any negligence in the construction or installation of the electrical equipment and further denies maintenance or operation of such equipment subsequent to the installation thereof in September of 1929, and alleges ownership and operation of the transformers in the California Milk Products Company since September of 1929. It is denied that installation of the electrical equipment was not in accordance with General Order No. 64–A of the California Railroad Commission, and as a separate answer and defense alleges contributory negligence on the part of respondent.

The findings of the trial court are that subsequent to September, 1929, and prior to May 12, 1927, appellant power corporation did carelessly and negligently construct, install, and maintain the transformation facilities upon the premises of the California Milk Products Company; that the construction and installation of the transformers and equipment was not in accordance with General Order No. 64–A of the California Railroad Commission; that, as a proximate result of appellant's negligent conduct, a current of electricity passed through the body of respondent, causing injury to him; that the allegation of ownership of the transformers by the products company since September of 1929 is untrue; that the allegations contained in the separate answer and defense of contributory negligence on the part of respondent were untrue, and that therefore respondent is entitled to judgment against appellant, power corporation.

The briefs disclose a dispute between the parties as to ownership of the transformation facilities and as to the obligation of maintenance thereof up until the time of the accident on May 12, 1937. It is necessary that the issues of ownership and obligation of maintenance be settled before discussing the fundamental question of appellant's liability for respondent's injuries. The issues of ownership and maintenance, do not, however, control the question of appellant's liability under the circumstances presented by this case. The trial court does find, and there is ample support therefor, that subsequent to September, 1929, and prior to May 12, 1937, appellant, power corporation, "maintained and operated" the transformers upon the premises of products company, etc. The retention of title to the electrical equipment by the power corporation until final payment under the contract on May 19, 1934, was in conformity with the duty to maintain and service such equipment. Consequently the evidence does disclose that there was a duty to, and the company did, maintain this electrical equipment during the life of the contract, but the finding that there was a duty of "maintenance and operation" subsequent to the date of transfer is not supported by the evidence. And as the meaning of the term "operated" as used in conjunction with "maintained" in the findings, is not made sufficiently clear, we conclude that the evidence does not support a finding that the power company operated the transformation facilities.

[1] The question as to whether appellant has been guilty of actionable negligence is to be determined by a consideration of the circumstances preceding and attendant at the time of respondent's injury. In order to constitute actionable negligence, it is necessary that the following three elements be present: (1) The legal duty to use due care; (2) a breach of that legal duty; and (3) that such breach is the proximate or legal cause of the resulting injury. Johnstone v. Panama Pacific I. E. Co., 187 Cal. 323, 202 P. 34.

[2] Assuming that appellant was negligent in regard to the installation of the electrical equipment, and that such negligence constituted the proximate cause of injuries received by respondent, to whom, we shall assume, appellant owed a legal duty to use due care, we are then of the opinion that the lack of ownership, control, or obligation to maintain such electrical equipment is immaterial in determining liability.

[3, 4] One who supplies electricity is under a legal duty to use due care in the construction and installation of the necessary electrical facilities. This legal duty is necessarily extended to any person who might with reasonable anticipation be endangered by faulty or improper electrical equipment or installation. The duty to use due care is obviated only as to trespassers or individuals who may be unlawfully upon the premises at the time of the injury. If the facts in a particular case disclose negligence on the part of an electric company in the installation of electrical equipment, either in the omission to do something which an ordinarily prudent person would have done under the given circumstances, or in the doing of something which an ordinarily prudent person would not have done under such circumstances, the transfer of ownership and maintenance does not in and of itself relieve the electric company from liability to an individual who has been injured as a result of the acts or omission constituting the negligence. Consequently, where the injury results from improper installation or material, and this be proven negligent, it is immaterial that the wire or equipment which carries the electric current is not owned or controlled by the negligent party at the time of the injury. 20 Corpus Juris, 365; Appalachian Power Co. v. Mitchell's Adm'x, 145 Va. 409, 134 S.E. 558.

If the particular wire causing the injury to respondent had been sufficiently insulated at the time of installation and became defective through weathering or neglect, for instance, after transfer of the equipment to the products company, the ownership and duty of maintenance as to such equipment would be material in determining liability.

The foregoing principle pertaining to the liability for negligence of one failing to use due care in the installation of electrical equipment is not inconsistent with, nor contrary to, any of the conclusions reached in the cases cited by appellant. Those cases, which include Hill v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 22 Cal.App. 788, 136 P. 492; Roberts v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 102 Cal.App. 422, 283 P. 353, and Ray v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 3 Cal.App.2d 329, 39 P.2d 812, do not raise the question of liability for negligence in the original construction or installation of electrical facilities.

[5] We are of the opinion that there is substantial evidence to support the finding of the trial court that appellant did carelessly and negligently construct and install the electrical equipment and further conclude that the evidence supports the finding that the injuries received by respondent were caused as a proximate result of such negligent installation.

[6] The conduct of an individual is negligent when it creates an unreasonable risk of harm to some general class of persons. Unquestionably, as clearly disclosed by the evidence, the particular wire with which respondent came in contact was insufficiently insulated against shock. This wire carried 6,600 volts to ground and was only encased in a weather-proof covering. The fact that such a covering was insufficient as insulation against the particular voltage being carried was not denied by appellant.

There being no doubt, therefore, as to the probable resulting effect of contact with this particular wire at a time that it was charged with 6,600 volts of electricity, the question then arises, as to whether the installation of the wire within three feet of the ground constituted an unreasonable risk of harm to a class of persons, within which class respondent may be deemed a member. We believe that this question should be answered in the affirmative, and consequently conclude that the conduct of appellant amounted to the breach of a legal duty of due care owed to respondent.

The appellant, power corporation, had knowledge of the fact at the time of the erection and installation of the electrical equipment, that employees of the products company would necessarily be required to work in and about the sub-station enclosure. This conclusion follows from the fact that the transformation facilities were to become the property of the products company as so provided by the contract. It is no more than reasonable that appellant should have anticipated that some employee, such as respondent, would be required to perform some type of manual labor within the enclosure.

In applying the test of foreseeability, for the purpose of determining negligent conduct, it was not necessary that appellant have knowledge of the fact that employees might be required to clear out weeds within the transformer yard. A considerable portion of the transformer yard was left in its natural state, and the growth of weeds therein was simply a normal act of nature. The necessity of requiring employees to clear out the growth of weeds from time to time was one of the circumstances which an ordinarily prudent person should have anticipated.

[7, 8] The duty of due care required in the use of electricity is well stated in 1 Joyce on Electricity, section 438a as follows: "The standard to be attained is that of ordinary and reasonable care, and this means such care as a reasonably careful and prudent person, having in view the dangers to be avoided and the likelihood of injury therefrom, would exercise, under the circumstances, in order to prevent injury. Where death may be caused by an agency lawfully in use, ordinary care requires that every means known, or that with reasonable inquiry would be known, must be used to prevent it."

Appellant was under a legal duty to use due care in avoiding injury to respondent, and there was a breach of that duty in the negligent installation of the electrical equipment. In view of the existing circumstances, appellant should have either properly insulated the high power wires, or placed them beyond the danger of contact with individuals who would be required to work within close proximity to such wires. Either safeguard against injury might have easily been taken. As disclosed by the evidence, insulation was readily obtainable, which would have been sufficient as against shock from a wire carrying up to 7,500 volts to ground. Mr. Simonson testified that such types of wire were commercially sold and used in the vicinity. Appellant had the choice of an alternative safeguard, either insulation of the high power wires or the placing of the transformers and wires upon an elevated platform. This would have prevented injury to employees working about the transformer yard.

As indicated, the negligence of appellant consisted in a failure to use due care under the circumstances, and this being true, it is immaterial as to whether or not the installation of the transformation facilities was governed by General Order No. 64–A of the California Railroad Commission. Consequently, we do not deem that it is necessary to discuss the question of the applicability of the particular order of the commission.

[9, 10] Appellant strongly urges that the sole proximate cause of the accident in this case, aside from respondent's contributory negligence, was the act of the products company foreman in admitting respondent into the transformer yard without calling on appellant to turn off the electric power. The trial court having found that the negligent conduct of appellant was the proximate cause of respondent's injuries, such finding is necessarily against any contention in regard to an independent intervening act as a superseding cause of the injuries. A well stated rule of proximate cause is found in Merrill v. Los Angeles G. & E. Co., 158 Cal. 499, at page 503, 111 P. 534, at page 536, 31 L.R.A.,N.S., 559, 139 Am.St.Rep. 134. The language is as follows: "* * * Consequences which follow from the original wrong in unbroken sequence, without an intervening sufficient independent cause, are natural and proximate and for these the original wrongdoer is responsible."

[11] Applying the foregoing rule of causation to the circumstances in the present case we can find no error in the conclusions of the trial court in regard to the proximate cause of respondent's injuries. It certainly would be transgressing the power of that court to decide, as a matter of law, that the conduct of respondent's superior constituted an independent intervening act sufficient to break the chain of causation, and be deemed a superseding cause.

[12, 13] The trial court having found against appellant in regard to the separate defense of contributory negligence, we have examined the record, and it is our opinion that there is substantial evidence in support of such finding. The burden of proving contributory negligence was on appellant, and in order to find that respondent's negligence constituted a defense, such negligent conduct must proximately contribute to the injury. Proof of careless conduct or acts amounting to mere negligence is insufficient to establish such a defense. Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066; Gaster v. Hinkley, 85 Cal.App. 55, 258 P. 988.

We conclude that the injuries to respondent were proximately caused by appellant's failure to use due care in properly insulating the high power wire with which respondent came in contact, and that such injuries were not proximately contributed to nor caused by any failure to exercise due care on the part of respondent.

The appellant has not contended that the damages allowed by the trial court are excessive and consequently we are not concerned with that issue.

The judgment is affirmed.

MEYER v. CALIFORNIA PRUNE & APRICOT GROWERS' ASS'N et al.

Civ. 6358.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 27, 1941.

1. Agriculture ⇐6

In action against state and county co-operative marketing associations by member of county association to recover sum claimed to be due for prunes delivered to defendants by plaintiff, allegation of amended complaint that state association notified plaintiff that it would make advance payment for plaintiff's prune crop did not set out new oral contract superseding original membership agreement, which provided for advance payments, but recognized continued existence thereof, as "advance payment" signifies partial payment to be followed by other payments which go to make up full payment.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Advance Payment".

2. Agriculture ⇐6

Where membership agreement between prune grower and county co-operative marketing association authorized state co-operative marketing association to act for county association, fact that state association notified grower that it would make advance payment for his prune crop did not indicate new oral contract superseding membership agreement which provided for advance payments.

3. Agriculture ⇐6

Where membership agreement between prune grower and county co-operative marketing association provided for termination thereof by either party solely by registered mail notice between certain days of year, notification of grower by state co-operative marketing association, authorized by agreement to act for county association, that state association would make advance payment for grower's prune crop, did not supersede membership agreement.

4. Agriculture ⇐6

A co-operative marketing agreement, specifying exactly how it may be terminated, cannot be abrogated or modified by any party thereto in violation of rights of other parties.

5. Agriculture ⇐6

In action against co-operative marketing associations for sums claimed to be due for prunes delivered by plaintiff to defendants pursuant to marketing agreement providing for payment of best price obtainable, less certain deductions, amended complaint, alleging such price to be stated sum, but not how such sum was determined, what best price obtainable was, what deductions were, or various grades or sizes of prunes delivered, stated no cause of action.

6. Appeal and error ⇐882(3)

In action for sum claimed to be due plaintiff for prunes delivered to defendant co-operative marketing associations, plaintiff, not having framed complaint on theory of indebitatus assumpsit or for goods sold and delivered, cannot support his allegations and proof on such theory, but is limited by issues of his own pleading on appeal from judgment for him.

7. Agriculture ⇐6

One suing on contract for sum claimed to be due for prunes delivered by him to defendant co-operative marketing associations and not for damages must establish such contract, terms thereof, and amount due thereunder, and cannot show that prunes were lost to him because of defendants' neglect.

8. Appeal and error ⇐173(2)

In action for sum claimed to be due plaintiff for prunes delivered by him to defendant co-operative marketing associations, where no pleading presented issue of fraudulent grading of prunes, such question cannot be considered on appeal from judgment for plaintiff.

Calkins, Hagar, Hall & Linforth, of San Francisco, and Curtiss E. Wetter, of Red Bluff, for appellants.

Pugh & Pugh, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

PULLEN, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, a prune grower of Tehama county, brought this action against the Tehama County Dried Fruit Association and the California Prune and Apricot Growers' Association (each a nonprofit cooperative marketing association) to recover the sum of $448, claimed to be due him for some 16,000 pounds of prunes delivered by him to defendants in 1937.

The amended complaint alleges, in substance, that plaintiff entered into a written contract with the Tehama County Dried Fruit Association (hereinafter referred to as the Local), wherein he agreed to sell to said Local his entire crop of dried prunes grown on his ranch during the season of 1937, and to deliver them to the warehouse of defendant California Prune and Apricot Growers' Association (herein referred to as the Association) in Red Bluff, and for which the Local agreed to pay plaintiff the best price obtainable therefor, less costs of marketing. It is further alleged that on or about September 1, 1937, defendant Association notified plaintiff that it would pay him an advance payment for the 1937 crop at a certain rate for specified grades. It is then alleged the prunes were inspected on the ranch, and plaintiff was, by defendants, directed to deliver the crop to the warehouse of the Association in Red Bluff. It is also alleged plaintiff made delivery and received receipts therefor from the Association, and thereafter plaintiff received grade sheets, and was paid for some 12,000 pounds, but the defendants failed to grade or pay for an additional 16,000 pounds here in question, of the asserted value of $56 per ton, or a total of $448.

The answer admitted the membership of plaintiff, and the payments made, but denied any failure to grade the 16,000 pounds here in dispute, and alleged affirmatively this lot of prunes was graded and declared unfit to be marketed, and a tender to plaintiff of $80.37 in full payment therefor. During the trial it developed the theory of plaintiff was that the notification to him by the Association as to the advance payments constituted a new contract between him and the Association which superseded the membership agreement between plaintiff and the Local. The trial court adopted this theory, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff against the Association only.

Five points are presented as grounds for reversal,—first, the amended complaint failed to state a cause of action; second, the court erred in finding that the notification as to advance payments constituted an oral or any contract which superseded the membership agreement; third, the court erred in finding that defendants failed to grade the prunes; fourth, the court erred in giving judgment for plaintiff in an amount in excess of $80.37, and lastly, that the court erred in failing to render any judgment as to the Local.

We need not consider in detail all of these objections as the conclusion we have reached makes it unnecessary.

[1] It is the contention of plaintiff that the following allegation in his amended complaint sets out a new oral contract—"that on or about the 1st day of September 1937, the defendant California Prune & Apricot Growers Association notified plaintiff that they would pay him an advance payment for said 1937 prune crop * * *."

With this interpretation we cannot agree. This notification of an advance was not an offer or a new agreement but was in strict conformity with the terms of the written agreement already in existence between the parties. The original agreement provides for such advance payments (not an unusual provision in marketing contracts) in paragraph 6(b) of the marketing agreement entered into between plaintiff and the Local, as follows:

"6(b) The Local agrees to pay as substantial an advance payment on the prunes as the market and financial conditions will permit, as determined by the Board of Directors in each season, and such payments shall be made as soon as practicable after delivery of the prunes to it; and such advance payments may be proportionately higher for fruit classifying in more desirable grades or sizes from a commercial standpoint."

It seems clear that by this allegation in the amended complaint plaintiff recognized the continued existence of the membership agreement, for an advance payment signifies a partial payment with other payments to follow, which go to make up the full payment. What that full payment was to be is found in the membership agreement, where it is provided:

"5. The Local agrees to resell such prunes, * * * at the best prices obtainable under market conditions and to pay over the net amount received therefrom as payment in full to the Grower * * * after deducting therefrom * * *" (certain specified charges).

[2] Whether the notification as to advance payments came from the Local or from the Association is immaterial. Plaintiff claims because the notification came from the Association it was indicative of a new contract, but the membership agreement authorizes the State Association to act for the County Association. Paragraph 7 provides:

"7. This local may exercise all of the packing, marketing and grading and inspection or other powers and rights herein granted to it through California Prune and Apricot Growers Association as a Central Sales Agency, the Grower recognizing that this Local will become a member of the California Prune and Apricot Growers Association and will contract with the California Prune and Apricot Growers Association to deliver all of the prunes and apricots handled by it to the California Prune and Apricot Growers Association for packing and marketing, and the Grower agrees that the Local may enter into any contract with the California Prune and Apricot Growers Association for such purposes and may agree to pool the prunes delivered hereunder with prunes of a similar grade and quality delivered by similar Locals under marketing agreements substantially similar to this, and the proceeds thereof shall be divided ratably according to deliveries from such Locals and shall be distributed to the grower members thereof as above provided."

[3] A further reason for holding the notification as to advances cannot be accepted as superseding the membership agreement is that the agreement itself provides the sole method of withdrawal. The first part of the membership agreement provides:

"This agreement may be terminated at any time during any year after 1936 by the Local or by the Grower by notice mailed to the Grower or the Local by registered mail between February 15th and the last day of February of said year, said termination to take effect on March 15th of the year in which said notice is delivered, provided, however, that this agreement shall remain in full force and effect as to all prunes delivered to the Local prior to such termination and until the sale of such prunes and the payment of the proceeds thereof to the Grower. Notice must be mailed within the period named herein to be effective, and shall be mailed to the Local at its principal place of business and to the Grower at his last-known address."

And in paragraph 13 thereof, it is further provided:

"This agreement is one of a series generally similar in terms comprising with all such agreements, signed by individual growers, or otherwise, one single contract between the Local and the said Growers, mutually and individually obligated under all terms thereof."

[4] We are here considering such a co-operative marketing agreement. The agreement specifies exactly how it may be terminated, and it cannot be abrogated or modified by any one in violation of the rights of others to the contract. Obviously the court erred in holding the advance created a new or different contract, or that it superseded the membership agreement.

[5] A further ground for reversal is that the amended complaint failed to state a cause of action. In view of the allegations of the original amended complaint that the rights of the parties were based upon a written agreement, and the theory apparently upon which the cause was tried and the judgment entered, that the plaintiff and the Association had entered in a new and oral agreement by virtue of notification of certain advance payments, it is difficult to know just what complaint is under scrutiny. It is clear, however, plaintiff is suing upon a contract wherein he was to be paid by some one, "the best price obtainable less certain deductions". He has alleged that price to be $56 per ton, but the amended complaint does not allege how that figure was determined or what the best price obtainable was, or what the deductions were or what were the various grades or sizes of the prunes delivered. These facts are essential as a part of plaintiff's case.

[6-8] Plaintiff attempts to support his allegations and proof upon the theory of indebitatus assumpsit, or for goods sold and delivered, but plaintiff did not so frame his complaint and he is now limited by the issues of his own pleading. Neither does plaintiff show that the prunes were lost to him by reason of neglect on the part of defendants, as he did not sue for damages. He has sued upon a contract, and he is obligated to establish that contract and its terms, and the amount he claim to be due thereunder. Plaintiff also asserts that the grading was fraudulent, but no pleading of fraud has presented that issue, so it cannot be now considered.

The judgment is modified with directions to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendants for the sum of $80.37 which amount is conceded by defendants to be due. As so modified the judgment is affirmed. Each side to bear their own costs.

7. Adoption ⇐23

The provision of the Probate Code relating to succession of an adopted child to estate of his adoptive parent did not change pre-existing law so as to preclude heirs of decedent's adopted son who predeceased decedent from succeeding to decedent's personalty as his "heirs at law," in view of fact that the Probate Code provision was a mere restatement designed to express clearly and correctly the existing provisions of the law as interpreted by the courts. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Georgia Anna Hebert, deceased. From orders determining heirship and decreeing partial distribution, Laura Loland Flanigan and others appeal, and the appeal is answered by the Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles and others.

Orders affirmed.

Louis Thomsen, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

O'Melveny & Myers, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice.

The decedent Georgia Anna Hebert, who died intestate as to most of her estate, during her lifetime legally adopted Howard Hugh Hebert as her son. At the time of the adoption the interested parties were residents of the state of Washington and the order of adoption was made by a court of that state having the proper jurisdiction. The adopted son predeceased the decedent, leaving as his sole heirs two daughters, his legitimate issue by blood. The appellants, who are cousins of the decedent and would be entitled to inherit as next of kin if it be declared that the daughters of the adopted son are not entitled to inherit, have appealed from orders determining heirship and decreeing partial distribution which were made by the probate court in favor of the daughters of the adopted son. The question for determination is whether the daughters of the adopted son are heirs at law of the party who adopted their father.

[1-4] The status of an adopted child is determined by the laws of the state in which the adoption was effected, but the rules of inheritance as to personal property are to be determined by the laws of the state where the decedent was domiciled at the time of death and as to real property the rules of inheritance are to be determined by the laws of the state in which the realty is situated. Although expressing "some doubt" as to whether the laws of California or the laws of Washington should be held to be controlling upon the question involved in this appeal, respondent argues that the Washington laws should govern and cites In re Williams' Estate, 102 Cal. 70, 36 P. 407, 41 Am.St.Rep. 163, in which the court quotes with approval from the opinion in Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 246, 37 Am.Rep. 321. In the Williams case the question involved was the sufficiency of the adoption proceedings. The Ross case was therein cited on the question of the status of the adopted child, but the Ross case, in which the adoption had been effected in the state of Pennsylvania, also sets forth the rule to be followed in determining the rights of inheritance. In a comprehensive annotation in 73 A.L.R. at page 970 the author points out that the Ross case has been frequently "misquoted and miscited by the courts" but summarizes the holding in the Ross case as follows: "In short, the court in effect held that the question whether the child had the 'capacity' to inherit land in Massachusetts should be determined by the laws of the state of his adoption, but that the question whether, assuming that he had the capacity, he had the 'right' to inherit, should be determined by the law of Massachusetts." Under this rule the laws of California, the domicile of the decedent, must govern as to rights of inheritance since the property involved is personalty. It is not contended that the status of an adopted child under the laws of Washington is different from the status of a child adopted under the California law.

Without conceding that the inheritance laws of Washington are not controlling, respondent contends that under the California statutes the two daughters of the adopted son have the right to inherit. The statutes applicable are sections 221, 222 and 257 of the Probate Code. Appellants rely particularly upon section 257, which is as follows: "An adopted child succeeds to the estate of one who has adopted him, the same as a natural child; and the person adopting succeeds to the estate of an adopted child, the same as a natural parent. An adopted child does not succeed to the estate of a natural parent when the relationship between them has been severed by the adoption, nor does such natural parent succeed to the estate of such adopted child." It is argued that the legislators in adopting this section have expressed the entire rights of inheritance of adopted children and that adopted children can have no rights other than those expressly stated in the section.

The decisions of the reviewing courts of California rendered before the adoption of the Probate Code in 1931 clearly sustain the contentions of the respondents. In Re Estate of Winchester, 140 Cal. 468, 74 P. 10, the decedent had adopted a daughter and had left legacies to the natural children of the daughter. The question before the court for determination was whether legacies for the benefit of the children of the adopted daughter were subject to the Collateral Inheritance Act of 1893, p. 193. It became necessary to determine whether the children were lineal descendants of the decedent. In holding that they were in fact heirs and lineal descendants and were accordingly exempt from the tax the court said that "the children of such adopted child take by inheritance as issue of the adopting father. * * * Otherwise the child adopted and the adopting parent would not sustain towards each other the relation of parent and child". The Winchester case has been cited with approval in Re Estate of Hunsicker, 65 Cal.App. 114, 223 P.

411; In re Darling's Estate, 173 Cal. 221, 159 P. 606; In re Estate of Moore, 7 Cal. App.2d 722, 47 P.2d 533, 48 P.2d 28; In re Estate of Mercer, 205 Cal. 506, 271 P. 1067. Appellants rely upon In re Estate of Darling, supra [173 Cal. 221, 159 P. 607], in which it was held that an adopted child is entitled to succeed to the share in the estate of his grandfather by blood which his father by blood would have succeeded to had he survived his own father. This decision is not in conflict with the Winchester decision, but rather the Winchester decision was approved therein in this language: "One other consequence in the matter of inheritance may be noted as arising from the same relation, viz., that the children of the adopted child take by inheritance from the adopting parent as issue of such adopting parent. This was practically the question decided in Re Estate of Winchester * * *."

[5-7] Prior to the adoption of the Probate Code in 1931, the decisions of the Supreme Court had, as we have shown, established the right of those in the position of the respondents to inherit in accordance with the contentions which they are now making. It remains to be determined whether by enacting the Probate Code the legislature changed the rules which had theretofore been established. The legislature which created the code commission instructed the commissioners to prepare "such restatement as will best serve clearly and correctly to express the existing provisions of law". Stats. of 1929, page 1428. The commissioners realized that they were not authorized to propose changes in the substance of the existing laws, for in the report which they submitted with the draft of the Probate Code they stated: "By the statute creating the code commission, its powers are limited to preparing such 'restatement as would best serve clearly and correctly to express the existing provisions of law', and it is not within the province of the code commission to embody in its report any substantial changes in the existing law". California Probate Code, Commissioners' Report, 1930, p. 10. The same legislature which enacted the Code section above quoted also enacted section 222 of the Probate Code, which was based upon section 1386 of the Civil Code. Both of these sections provide that the issue of a decedent shall inherit by right of representation. At the same time the legislature continued in effect the adoption provisions of the Civil Code, sections 227–229. These sections had theretofore been construed as granting inheritance rights to the children of a predeceased adopted child of the adopting parent. In re Estate of Winchester, supra, In re Estate of Darling, supra. If a statute has been judicially construed and is later re-enacted in the same or substantially the same terms it is presumed that the legislature was familiar with the construction which had been placed upon the statute by the courts and that such construction, in the absence of an express provision requiring a different construction, was adopted by the legislature as a part of the law. Dalton v. Lelande, 22 Cal.App. 481, 135 P. 54. It is clear that if section 257 had been omitted when the Probate Code was enacted it would have been the clear duty of the court to declare the respondents to be the heirs of decedent. We find nothing in section 257 requiring any other determination, since it is a "restatement" designed to "clearly and correctly express the existing provisions of law" as interpreted by the courts.

The orders are affirmed, respondents to recover costs from appellants.

1. Mandamus ⇐174

Where permanent teachers sought a writ of mandate to compel school board to fix teachers' salaries at certain sum and to draw a warrant upon county treasurer for such sum and alleged that reduction in their salaries was discriminatory, decision adverse to teachers was not against law on ground that there was failure to make findings upon material issues, where court specifically found that salaries were fixed at certain sum upon recommendation of superintendent of school district and that in fixing such salaries the board did not act arbitrarily but in good faith and not from any improper or illegal motive, even though the decreased salary should be regarded as a "reduction" rather than a "fixing" of salary. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

* Subsequent opinion 116 P.2d 593.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Fixing" and "Reduction".

2. Mandamus ⇦174

In proceedings by permanent teachers to compel school board to fix teachers' salaries at certain sum and to draw a warrant upon county treasurer for such sum, finding of trial court that salaries were fixed upon recommendation of superintendent of school district and that in fixing salaries board did not act arbitrarily, which finding was so framed that teachers could intelligently specify particulars in which finding was not supported by the evidence as to presence or absence of discrimination or unreasonableness with reference to change made in salaries, and which clearly disclosed theory upon which it was grounded as to controverted issue, was sufficient. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

3. Mandamus ⇦174

In proceedings by permanent teachers to compel school board to fix teachers' salaries for the year 1938–39 at certain sum and to draw a warrant upon county treasurer for such sum, court's failure to find upon issue of existence or nonexistence of a salary schedule for years preceding 1938–39 did not constitute a material omission where court was concerned only with question of salary schedule for the year 1938–39, and an express finding was made that for such year there was no salary schedule. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

4. Mandamus ⇦174

In proceedings by permanent teachers to compel school board to fix teachers' salaries for year 1938–1939 at certain sum and to draw a warrant upon county treasurer for such sum, court's failure to make a finding upon action of board in reclassifying teachers' duties or as to whether such action was taken in good faith was not error where teachers were not seeking reinstatement to their previous particular positions. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

5. Mandamus ⇦174

In proceedings by permanent teachers to compel school board to fix teachers' salaries at certain sum and to draw a warrant upon county treasurer for such sum, when court found that action of board in fixing salaries was not arbitrary or unreasonable, it became unnecessary to make a finding upon whether teachers' assignment to other duties was made in good faith. School Code, §§ 5.-731, 5.751.

6. Schools and school districts ⇦141(1)

The board of trustees of elementary school district which had under 850 pupils average daily attendance was empowered to transfer permanent teachers to other duties when in so doing board did not impair teachers' status in violation of the School Code. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

7. Schools and school districts ⇦144(4)

The law does not require that all certificated employees of a school district should be paid the same salary. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

8. Schools and school districts ⇦144(4)

The right of school district governing boards to fix salary of a permanent employee must be reasonably exercised, and may not be exercised in a discriminatory or arbitrary manner. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

9. Schools and school districts ⇦144(4)

The School Code, which empowers school boards to "fix" the compensation of permanent teachers, confers upon such boards discretionary power to regulate such compensation and in exercise of such power to decrease as well as increase such salaries, provided that when reductions in salary are made such decreases are not unjust, but made in good faith and without any purpose to discriminate. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Fix".

10. Schools and school districts ⇦141(1)

A school board, despite permanency of a teacher's tenure, is clothed with authority to change such teacher's assignment and to prescribe his or her duties from time to time, when such power is exercised reasonably and the duties prescribed are in line with teacher's profession, and such teacher is not required to teach outside the district. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

11. Schools and school districts ⇐144(4)

The legislative enactments which give to teachers under certain conditions a tenure permanency carry with them no assurance against change in salary. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

12. Schools and school districts ⇐133

The position of a "teacher" in the public schools of California is not an "office" but is strictly and essentially an "employment", and such employment is initiated by a contract.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Employment", "Office", and "Teacher".

13. Schools and school districts ⇐141(1), 144(4)

Teachers, who had attained status of permanency prior to effective date of statute by which it was made optional with boards in school district of certain classification to classify certificated employees as "permanent", had right to continue as permanent teachers, but school board had right, if it acted in good faith as well as reasonably and without discrimination, to reclassify duties to be performed by teachers and to fix their compensation under new contract. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

14. Schools and school districts ⇐141(1), 144(4)

That two out of twenty-five teachers employed by elementary school district were the only permanent teachers, standing by itself, did not establish such fact as the motive behind school board's action in fixing such teachers' salaries at a lower figure than they had received and in reclassifying their duties. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

15. Schools and school districts ⇐141(1), 144(4)

Evidence was not insufficient to show that action of school board in fixing permanent teachers' salaries at a lower figure than they had received and in reclassifying their duties was taken in "good faith" because no charges were made against teachers and it was not alleged that they were incompetent, since board was vested with discretion in fixing their salaries and in reclassifying their duties and it was not necessary to prefer charges against teachers as a prerequisite to exercise of such discretion. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Good Faith".

16. Schools and school districts ⇐144(4)

Other than restriction as to minimum salary to be paid teachers, school board is free to contract with teacher as to salary to be paid, and hence, when permanent teachers' contracts as to salaries for year expired, board was authorized in exercise of its discretion to offer either a higher or lower salary in the contracts for the ensuing year. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

17. Schools and school districts ⇐144(4)

Except for a clear abuse of discretion exercised by school board, amount of salary allowed by the board to permanent teachers may not be interfered with by the courts. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

18. Schools and school districts ⇐141(1), 144(4)

Evidence was not insufficient to show "good faith" on part of school board in fixing permanent teachers' salaries at a lower figure than they had received and in reclassifying their duties because board was opposed to the tenure law, since such alleged opposition to teachers' tenure did not impair exercise of reasonable discretion in fixing salaries, if under all circumstances such action was not motivated by injustice or discrimination. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

19. Schools and school districts ⇐141(1), 144(4)

Evidence was not insufficient to show "good faith" on part of school board in fixing permanent teachers' salaries at a lower figure than they had received for preceding year and in reclassifying their duties because teachers had been requested to resign when board had been advised that teachers were permanent and could not be dismissed on account of marriage, where personnel of board at time of request for resignations was entirely changed when salary decrease was made and there was no showing that attitude of board members who had requested resignations had anything to do with influencing changed personnel of the board six years later. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

20. Schools and school districts ⇐141(1), 144(4)

The alleged facts that salary of a probationary teacher was maintained at previous level while salaries of permanent teachers were reduced, that rates for other teachers were increased, that substitutes were paid practically the same salaries as those paid to permanent teachers, that new teachers were employed at higher salaries than the permanent teachers, that salaries of re-employed teachers were increased, and that permanent teachers were transferred to other grades, were not determinative of good or bad faith of board in reducing permanent teachers' salaries and reclassifying their duties in view of broad discretionary power vested in board to fix teachers' salaries. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

21. Schools and school districts ⇐144(4)

In view of broad discretionary power vested in school board to fix teachers' salaries, there must be clear and convincing evidence of abuse of such discretion before a court will vitiate the action of the board. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

22. Schools and school districts ⇐141(1), 144(4)

The action of board of trustees of elementary school district in fixing permanent teachers' salaries at a lower figure than they had received for preceding year and in reclassifying their duties was not an abuse of discretion, in view of evidence disclosing that school superintendent advised board that such teachers were not carrying out superintendent's philosophy of teaching and that in his opinion a reclassification would be to their benefit. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

23. Schools and school districts ⇐144(4)

A permanent teacher whose duties were transferred to "home teaching", which required teacher to go into homes of pupils throughout the district for purpose of teaching them, was entitled to recover from school board traveling expenses necessarily incurred in such travels throughout the district. School Code, § 5.532.

24. Mandamus ⇐167

In proceedings by permanent teachers to compel school board to fix their salaries for certain year at certain sum and to draw a warrant upon county treasurer for such sum, wherein board denied teachers' allegations that fixing of salaries at lower figure was unfair, discriminatory, and unreasonable or was prompted by any improper motive, testimony showing that teachers were inefficient was properly admitted to meet the issue of unfairness and bad faith, especially where teachers were permitted to introduce evidence to show their competency and right to continuance of previously paid salaries. School Code, §§ 5.731, 5.751.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Proceedings by Eleanor Roehr Kacsur and by Thelma Weagley Hill against the Board of Trustees of South Whittier Elementary School District and others, for a writ of mandate to require respondents to fix salaries in certain sums and to draw warrants upon the county treasurer therefor. From adverse judgments, the plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed in part and in part modified and, as modified, affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. H. O'Connor, Co. Counsel, and W. B. McKesson, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WHITE, Justice.

Each appellant herein, a teacher in the South Whittier Elementary School District, sought a writ of mandate in the superior court to require the respondents to fix her salary for the school year 1938-39 at the sum of $1,600 and accordingly to draw a warrant upon the county treasurer of Los Angeles county therefor. Appellant Eleanor Roehr Kacsur also sought the recovery of certain traveling expenses incurred by her in connection with her assignment as a home teacher. The cases were tried together under a stipulation that all the evidence introduced should be considered in both cases. From a judgment denying the relief prayed for these appeals are prosecuted, and by stipulation are presented upon a single set of briefs.

In general, the question before this court is the correctness of the trial court's conclusion that the board of trustees, in tendering to each appellant a contract for the year 1938-39 at a reduction in salary from $1,600 to $1,325, acted within the bounds of its legal discretion and did not unlawfully discriminate against the appellants.

From the record, it appears that appellants are the only permanent teachers among 25 employed by the respondent district, they having attained such status prior to August 14, 1931, the effective date of the amendment to section 5.501 of the School Code, by which it was made optional with boards in school districts, such as the one here in question, which have under 850 pupils average daily attendance, to classify certificated employees as "permanent". Respondent district availed itself of such option and decided not to classify any teachers as "permanent".

Appellant Thelma Weagley Hill has been employed by the district since 1927, and appellant Eleanor Roehr Kacsur since 1928. Their salaries for the years 1933-34, 1934-35, 1935-36, and 1936-37, had been $1,570. For the year 1937-38, pursuant to a salary schedule adopted by the board which provided for annual increments if certain requirements of special study were met, their salaries were fixed at $1,600. A new contract of employment was made each year. For three years prior to the occasion of the present dispute appellant Hill had taught the eighth grade and petitioner Kacsur had taught first grade, fourth and fifth grade, as well as domestic science.

[1-3] It is first contended by appellants that the decision is against law in that there was a failure to make findings upon material issues. In this connection it is asserted that there was contained in the answers a denial of the allegations contained in the complaint that the reduction in petitioners' salaries was discriminatory, unreasonable and without any just cause or legal ground. In this claim appellants cannot be upheld, because the court specifically found "that the salary for petitioner (s) for the services as a certificated employee in aforesaid school district for the school year 1938-39 was fixed by the respondents at the sum of $1,325 upon the recommendation of the superintendent of said school district; that in fixing said salary the governing board of the district did not act arbitrarily or fix an unreasonable salary for said petitioner (s), but said salary was fixed by said board in good faith and not from any improper or illegal motive." Even though we regard the decreased salary fixed for the year 1938-39 as a "reduction", rather than a "fixing" of salary under a new yearly contract, the finding nevertheless declares the grounds which prompted the board to determine the salary at a lesser figure than was paid for the preceding year and finds that such grounds absolve the board of any arbitrary or discriminatory motive or purpose. This finding was so framed that the defeated parties could intelligently specify the particulars in which it was not supported by the evidence as to the presence or absence of discrimination or unreasonableness in the action of the board with reference to the change made in petitioners' salaries. This is all that is required. The finding clearly discloses the theory upon which it is grounded as to the controverted issue above referred to. Neither did the failure of the court to find upon the issue of the existence or non-existence of a salary schedule for the years preceding 1938-39 constitute a material omission, because the court was concerned only with the question of a salary schedule for the year 1938-39, and an express finding was made that for such year there was no salary schedule.

[4-6] Because petitioners sought only a mandate compelling the board of trustees to fix their salaries for the year 1938-39 at $1,600 and to draw a warrant upon the county treasury for such sum, and were not seeking reinstatement to their previous particular grades and classroom teaching positions, it was not error for the court to fail to make a finding upon the action of the board in transferring petitioners from performing the kind of services rendered by them prior to 1938-39 to a different type of service during the last-mentioned year, or as to whether such action was taken in good faith. When the court found that the action of the board of trustees in fixing the salaries for the year 1938-39 was not arbitrary or unreasonable, it became unnecessary to make a finding upon whether their assignment to other duties was made in good faith. The board was empowered to transfer teachers to other duties when in so doing it did not impair their status in violation of the School Code. Therefore, so far as the findings are concerned, the judgment rendered is amply supported thereby.

[7-13] We come now to a consideration of appellants' claim that the action of the board of trustees in fixing the salaries of petitioners at a figure less than that received by them for the school year immediately preceding 1938-39 was without authority in law. Appellants concede that the law does not require that all certificated employees of a school district must be paid the same salary, but base their claim of illegality herein upon the ground that the right of such school district governing boards to fix the salary of a permanent employee must be reasonably exercised, and may not be exercised in a discriminatory or arbitrary manner. This uniformly has been held to be the law. The board may not substitute its arbitrary determination in opposition to rights guaranteed teachers by law that they shall not be dealt with in an arbitrary or discriminatory manner. Section 5.731 of the School Code is as follows: "Boards of school trustees, and city, and city and county boards of education shall have power and it shall be their duty to fix and order paid the compensation of persons in public school service requiring certification qualifications, employed by such boards, unless the same be otherwise prescribed by law." We hold, upon the authority of Fidler v. Board of Trustees, 112 Cal.App. 296, 301, 296 P. 912, and cases therein cited, that the California School Code, which empowers school boards to fix the compensation of permanent teachers, confers upon such boards discretionary power to regulate such compensation and in the exercise of such power to decrease as well as increase such salaries; provided, of course, that when reductions in salary are made such decreases are not unjust, but made in good faith and without any purpose to discriminate against an employee. It is also the established law of this state that a school board, despite the permanency of a teacher's tenure, is clothed with authority to change such teacher's assignment and to prescribe his or her duties from time to time, when such power is exercised reasonably and the duties prescribed are in line with the teacher's profession, and such teacher is not required to teach outside the district. Abraham v. Sims, 2 Cal.2d 698, 711, 42 P.2d 1029. The legislative enactments which give to teachers under certain conditions a tenure permanency carry with them no assurance against change in salary. Abraham v. Sims, supra, 2 Cal.2d at page 711, 42 P.2d 1029. The last-cited case, as well as Martin v. Fisher, 108 Cal.App. 34, 39, 291 P. 276, 278, is authority for the statement that "the position of a teacher in the public schools of California is not an office". It is strictly and essentially an employment, and such employment is initiated by a contract. Appellants herein had the unquestioned right to continue as permanent teachers, but the school board had the right, if it acted in good faith, as well as reasonably and without discrimination, to reclassify the duties to be performed by appellants and to fix the latter's compensation under the new contract entered into with them for the school year 1938-39. This power is expressly conferred upon respondent board of trustees.

Therefore we must now examine the record in this case to determine whether the evidence supports the findings and judgment of the trial court that the action of the board in fixing appellants' salaries at a lower figure than they received for the year immediately preceding and in reclassifying their duties, was just, reasonable and not discriminatory. In their attack upon the sufficiency of the evidence to show that the action of the board was taken in good faith, appellants assert:

[14] (1) "* * * that appellants are the only permanent teachers in the district." This may be true, but standing by itself does not establish that fact as the motive behind the board's action.

[15-17] (2) "* * * that no charges have ever been made against them and it is not alleged or contended that they are incompetent." The board was vested with a discretion in fixing appellants' salaries and reclassifying their duties. It was not necessary to prefer charges against the teachers as a prerequisite to the exercise of such discretion. True, before teachers who have attained permanent tenure may be discharged, the law requires that they shall be apprised of charges against them and afforded an opportunity to meet such accusations, but the question of dismissal is not here involved. As was said in Fidler v. Board of Trustees, supra [112 Cal.App. 296, 296 P. 915]: "A distinction must be kept in mind at all times in consideration of the instant case between the right to permanent tenure of the office and the right to compensation during each year. * * * It is an important distinction, for his status as a permanent teacher is conferred upon him by the statute, and is not dependent upon contract; while his right to compensation is a proper subject of contract." Other than the restriction as to the minimum salary to be paid teachers, School Code, sec. 5.751, the board is free to contract with the teacher as to the salary to be paid. When, therefore, appellants' contracts as to salaries for year 1937-38 expired as they did, the board was authorized in the exercise of its discretion to offer either a higher or lower salary in the contracts for the ensuing year. Except for a clear abuse of this discretion the amount of salary allowed by the board may not be interfered with by the courts. Chambers v. Davis, 131 Cal.App. 500, 22 P.2d 27.

[18] (3) "That the board of trustees is opposed to the tenure of law." Conceding that to be true, nevertheless we cannot see that such opposition to teachers' tenure impairs the exercise of reasonable discretion by the board in fixing the salary, if under all the circumstances such action is not motivated by injustice or discrimination.

[19] (4) "That the appellants were each requested to resign near the end of the third year of employment for the purpose of 'breaking' their tenure and then re-employed, their teaching service being continuous to the present time," and (5) "that appellants and the only other permanent teacher in the district at that time were requested in April, 1932, to resign when the board was advised by the county superintendent of schools that they were permanent teachers and could not be dismissed on account of marriage." We fail to perceive the relevancy of this argument, because the personnel of the board at the time of the request for such resignations was entirely changed when the salary decrease with which we are here concerned was made in 1938. There is no showing that the attitude of the board members in 1932 had anything to do with influencing the changed personnel of the board six years later.

[20-22] The remaining grounds upon which appellants rest their contention of injustice, unreasonableness and discrimination on the part of the board are:

"(6) That the salary of Miss Harrington, a probationary teacher, was maintained at $1,600.00 while appellants were reduced to $1,325.00.

"(7) The fixing of higher salaries for the school year 1938-39 at much higher rates for many other teachers.

"(8) The payment to substitutes of practically the same salary as those paid to appellants.

"(9) The employment of new teachers at higher salaries than those of appellants.

"(10) Increasing the salaries of re-employed teachers while reducing appellants.

"(11) Transferring appellant Hill to the third grade.

"(12) Transferring appellant Kacsur to so-called 'home teaching' and clerical work in the superintendent's office."

As we view the record in this case, none of these reasons are determinative of the good or bad faith of the board in its reduction of appellants' salaries and the transferring of them to other duties during the school year 1938-39. When we consider the broad discretionary power vested in the board to fix teachers' salaries, there must be clear and convincing evidence of abuse of such discretion before a court will vitiate the action of the board. Appellants introduced considerable evidence to establish the fact of their competency and willingness to cooperate and work with the school superintendent, yet the action of the board in decreasing appellants' salaries was prompted by the recommendations of such superintendent. While testifying as a witness, and in explanation of his recommendations to the board, the superintendent read excerpts from the "Intermediate Guide, Teachers' Guide, Intermediate Unit, Los Angeles County Schools", after which he testified as follows:

"A. (After reading) * * * Now, I have repeated these excerpts to bear out the idea of what is expected of a teacher in a room. They must have definite ideas, definite requirements and very definite suggestions, and the amount of interest that a teacher will create will depend entirely on the individual teacher. And under these captions here everything was given to bear that out. Now, in my observation of the classrooms of these teachers—do you want both of the teachers or just one, shall we consider them together?

"Q. We are considering them together, yes. A. In my observation of these classrooms of these two teachers and in conference with the teachers, I couldn't find that they had the philosophy expressed in these paragraphs. I tried to search the school philosophy rather than the subject matter, in other words, what is behind their teaching of the subject matter, and it appeared to me that both Mrs. Hill and Mrs. Kacsur failed to get the underlying philosophy of these paragraphs.

"Q. Did you observe anything in Mrs. Hill's teaching that would lead you to believe that she would be more adaptable for activities of a manual character than those that were employed in the eighth grade? A. You mean in regard to my recommendation that she be assigned to the third grade?

"Q. That is what I mean. A. My opinion in regard to her was that she was trained as a formal classroom teacher, but if she remained there it might be very hard, if not impossible, for her to become a good informal teacher, and I thought if she would be put in a different grade, say the third grade, for example, that it would be entirely foreign to her and that she would have to realign her work and her method of teaching, and there would perhaps be a better chance to adapt her to the methods which I would like to see her employ and possibly remove her present theories from her mind.

"Q. Did you think it would be helpful to Mrs. Hill, or did you think it might be difficult for her to enjoy the third grade? A. I thought she would enjoy her work. I didn't think she was going to be antagonistic to the work. I didn't think she was going to be a success as a third grade teacher, but I thought she might be a greater success as a third grade teacher than an eighth grade teacher."

In the final analysis, therefore, we find that the superintendent was dissatisfied with the mode and method of appellants' system of teaching, and it was his claim that they did not adjust themselves to the philosophy of teaching which he had. He so reported to the respondent board and recommended a change. There is substantial evidence in the record that, based upon such recommendation of the superintendent, respondent board determined to reclassify appellants' duties, and further concluded that the services of appellants in the discharge of their duties under the reclassification for the term covered by the contracts proffered them, if they chose to continue teaching in the district for the school year 1938-39, was $1,325. After all, the right and power to fix salaries rests with the board of trustees, and we cannot conclude in the face of the record before us that in adopting the views and recommendations of the district superintendent, employed as he was to advise and counsel with the board on such matters, that the latter abused the discretion vested in it to determine and fix appellants' salaries.

[23] While we conclude that the board was authorized to reassign and transfer appellant Eleanor Roehr Kacsur to what is referred to as "home teaching", we nevertheless are in accord with her contention that when such transfer was made and she was required to go into the homes of pupils throughout the district for the purpose of teaching them, the respondent board was obligated to pay her reasonable traveling expenses necessarily incurred in such travels throughout the district. The allegations in the complaint of appellant Kacsur that she incurred necessary traveling expenses of $20.50 while acting in the capacity of a "home teacher" during the school year 1937-38 were not denied and were found by the court to be true. Section 5.532 of the School Code provides as follows: "The governing board of any school district shall have the power and the duty to provide for the payment of the actual and necessary traveling expenses of any employee of the district when performing services for the district under the direction of the governing board thereof. * * *" By reason of the foregoing provision, appellant Kacsur was entitled to payment of her claim.

[24] The trial court did not err in its ruling admitting into evidence testimony designed to show that appellants were inefficient. Appellants base their claim in this regard upon the fact that by the pleadings it was admitted that no charges had ever been preferred against them. However, the answer of respondents did deny appellants' allegations that the fixing of their salaries at $1,325 for 1938-39 was unfair, discriminatory and unreasonable or was prompted by any improper motive. Just as appellants were permitted to introduce evidence to show their competency and right to a continuance of the salary paid them during the preceding year, respondent board was also entitled to present testimony to show the reason why appellants were offered a decreased salary in the contracts proffered them for the school year 1938-39. Such evidence was competent, relevant and material to meet the issue of unfairness and bad faith charged against the board.

In the appeal taken by Thelma Weagley Hill the judgment is affirmed; and in the matter of the appeal taken by Eleanor Roehr Kacsur the judgment is modified to provide that appellant is entitled to the sum of $20.50 expended by her as necessary traveling expenses incurred by her in performing services directed by said defendants for the school year 1937-38, and is further entitled to be paid her necessary traveling expenses incurred in performing like services under the direction of respondent board during the school year 1938-39. In all other respects such judgment is affirmed. All parties will bear their respective costs on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Arthur Coats, Judge.

Action for divorce by Elaine T. Smith against Sidney V. Smith, Jr. From an order denying a motion for execution upon a modified final decree of divorce, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., and Treadwell & Laughlin, all of San Francisco (Robert A. Grantier, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Loyd E. Hewitt, and James R. McBride, both of Yuba City, for respondent.

PULLEN, Presiding Justice.

A modified final decree of divorce between the parties hereto was entered on July 14, 1936, wherein defendant was required to make certain monthly payments to plaintiff as alimony, and to pay to plaintiff the sum of $500 for legal expenses. Thereafter defendant, having failed to pay this sum of $500, was cited for contempt, but after a hearing the same was dismissed.

On May 27, 1938, a motion for execution upon the modified final decree of July 14, 1936, was heard and denied. From that order this appeal is taken on the ground the evidence was insufficient to support the findings that there was not due to plaintiff the sum of $500 for legal expenses; that any sum had been paid on account thereof; that plaintiff had, for a consideration, released or discharged the defendant from the payment thereof, or that any of the matters there involved had been previously adjudicated in the contempt proceeding, or that the judgment in the contempt proceedings were a bar to these proceedings.

The determination of this case depends largely upon the effect of a receipt given by plaintiff to defendant in these words: "Received of Sidney V. Smith Jr. all moneys due to date under any and all orders in the above entitled matter, including the order made by Judge Dierup on the 14th. day of July 1936, from which an appeal was taken by the above entitled defendant. Dated June 8, 1937.

"Elaine T. Smith DeWitt, plaintiff."

[1] This receipt and $200 had been sent to Mr. Eugene D. Bennett, an attorney in San Francisco by the attorney of defendant, and he was directed to deliver to plaintiff the $200 upon her signing the receipt. On June 8, 1937, plaintiff called at the office of Mr. Bennett and offered to sign the receipt. Mr. Bennett expressed the desire to discuss the matter with Mr. Treadwell, her attorney, but she said such was unnecessary. Nevertheless, Mr. Bennett called the office of Mr. Treadwell, but he was out of town. He then explained to the secretary for Mr. Treadwell the request of plaintiff that he, Mr. Bennett, had been directed to pay her the $200, and that in view of the request and his instructions he would have to do so. Plaintiff then signed the receipt and Mr. Bennett gave her the $200. Plaintiff claims she did not know her release covered the matter of attorney fees or that she had anything to do with that matter, but there is no claim here of undue influence or any misrepresentation. In fact there is no evidence of anything of that nature, and the language of the receipt seems clear and comprehensive.

[2] It is to be noted, however, that she knew there was only $125 due on the delinquent installments of alimony at that time, and she does not clearly state what she believed the remaining $75 was for. In addition to this $200 defendant orally promised that he would terminate proceedings to appeal from an order of this court, and the appeal was subsequently dismissed. Plaintiff denied any such agreement, but the evidence upon that subject is conflicting and the trial court having found in favor of defendant, its finding will not be disturbed by us.

[3] It is now urged by defendant that the release of a judgment in consideration of the payment of a part thereof is not binding, and cites among other cases, Siddall v. Clark, 89 Cal. 321, 26 P. 829. There a note was given in payment of a judgment for a larger amount and the court held that a payment of a part of the amount due upon a money judgment under an agreement that it shall operate as satisfaction in full will not discharge the judgment. Here, however, in addition to the sum of $200, was a promise by defendant to forego his right to appeal. Forbearance to sue, or the giving up of a legal right is sufficient consideration. Wells Fargo v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669, 60 P. 439, 49 L.R.A. 647.

[4] Appellant also claims the testimony of defendant as to the transaction between the parties, being directly contrary to his written statement in a letter to his former wife, cannot support a finding. However, the trial court apparently believed defendant when he testified his letter had nothing to do with the $200 settlement. In examining the letter of July 15, 1937, written about a month after the issuance of the receipt, we cannot find that it throws any light either way in interpreting the receipt. It reads: "As to the money paid you and the $150.00 note, the original agreement was that if I paid you that, you were, in consideration, to sign and to have your attorney sign a stipulation reducing the court order here to $75.00 per month. This you failed to do. However, I sent you down $200.00 when you telephoned you were in great distress, and you promised that as soon as you could you would go ahead with your end of the agreement. The only difference between my agreement with you and the one drawn up by your attorney Treadwell was the amount of money involved,—$350.00 against $500.00. * * *" Defendant testified, "It would take a lot of explaining all that letter meant. It was previously agreed that it has nothing to do with the $200.00 settlement at all."

[5, 6] It is not for this court to weigh the evidence or pass upon the credibility of the witnesses.

The order is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 30, 1941.

1. Constitutional law ⇐70(3)

The privilege against testifying to communications between husband and wife is a matter of "evidence", which is a subject within province of legislature to control, and District Court of Appeal will not concern itself with reason for rule or its effect upon administration of justice. Code Civ.Proc. § 1881, subd. 1.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Evidence".

2. Statutes ⇐190

A statute which is clear and unambiguous does not admit of judicial interpretation or construction.

3. Statutes ⇐228

Where a statute itself specifies its exceptions, other exceptions cannot be added under the guise of judicial construction.

4. Witnesses ⇐21, 192

Under statute relating to privilege against testifying to communications between husband and wife without the consent of the other, a wife suing as beneficiary of policy on life of deceased husband could not be required to answer insurer's interrogatories regarding communications made by husband to wife regarding husband's physical condition, and hence order of commitment of wife for contempt based on such refusal was void, where wife expressly refused to give her consent. Code Civ.Proc. § 1881, subd. 1.

5. Witnesses ⇐219(2)

A "waiver" by deceased husband of privilege against testifying to communications between husband and wife must have been such as would amount to consent of husband to examination of wife. Code Civ.Proc. § 1881, subd. 1.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waiver".

6. Estoppel ⇐53, 54

The primary essentials of a "waiver" are knowledge and intent, and before one may be deemed to have waived a right granted by statute, he must be shown to have knowledge of the right and an intent to waive or forego such right.

7. Insurance ⇐146(3)

In construing life policy, District Court of Appeal would assume that, in accord with the usual practice, application and policy were both prepared by insurer, and hence would construe application and policy strictly against the insurer.

8. Witnesses ⇐219(2, 6)

A provision in life policy application prepared by insurer, by which insured waived privilege of physician and patient, would be deemed to have intended that which was written and nothing more, and hence did not operate as a waiver of privilege against testifying to communications between husband and wife. Code Civ.Proc. § 1881, subds. 1, 4.

Proceeding in the matter of the petition of Lillian De Neef for a writ of habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from a commitment for contempt.

Petitioner discharged and her bail exonerated.

Frank J. Perry and George Olshausen, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Hartley F. Peart and Sylvester J. McAtee, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The petitioner seeks her release in habeas corpus from a commitment for contempt based upon her refusal to answer certain interrogatories. Petitioner's husband took out a policy of life insurance on December 16, 1939, with the California Western States Life Insurance Company. He died on February 15, 1940, and petitioner sued the company as beneficiary of the policy. The company answered setting up the defense that the policy had been secured by fraudulent representations as to the physical condition of the insured. In taking the deposition of the petitioner, questions were asked regarding communications made by deceased to the petitioner regarding the physical condition of the insured. Her refusal to answer the questions was based upon the provisions of subdivision one of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Other objections to the questions—that they called for hearsay, and were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial—need not be discussed as the case is closed by the code section.

The first subdivision of this section reads: "A husband can not be examined for or against his wife without her consent; nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other, or for a crime committed against another person by a husband or wife while engaged in committing and connected with the commission of a crime by one against the other; or in an action for damages against another person for adultery committed by either husband or wife." The petitioner correctly directs attention to the fact that two distinct privileges are granted by the section—(a) the privilege making husband or wife incompetent as a witness in an action for or against the other; (b) the privilege against testifying to communications between husband and wife. The distinction is an important one. We are here concerned with the second privilege only. For that reason we will not discuss the many decisions or the observations of text writers which relate to the first privilege mentioned.

[1-4] The privilege relating to testimony disclosing confidential communications between husband and wife is like that stated in the other subdivisions of section 1881 relating to attorney and client, physician and patient, and a clergyman and one making a confession. We are not concerned with the reason for the rule or its effect upon the administration of justice. It is purely a matter of evidence which is a subject within the province of the legislature to control. The legislature has declared that neither husband nor wife can be "examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage" without the consent of the other. It has also made certain specified exceptions to the rule none of which is applicable here. Thus we are confronted with two well known rules of statutory construction—that when the language of a statute is clear and unambiguous it does not permit judicial interpretation or construction; and that, when the statute itself specifies its exceptions, no other may be added under the guise of judicial construction. With the husband not able to give his consent to the disclosure of these communications, and the wife expressly refusing to give hers, the inhibitions of the statute that the wife cannot be examined regarding these communications effectively bar the examination and it makes little difference whether we call it a matter of privilege or incompetent testimony.

[5-8] To avoid the operation of the section the respondent argues that the privilege was waived. If this is so the waiver must have been such as would amount to the consent of the husband to the examination of petitioner. But since the husband is dead and unable to give his consent, the respondent argues that he must be deemed to have consented at the time of the execution of the policy. There are two answers to the argument. First, primary essentials of a waiver are knowledge and intent. Before one may be deemed to have waived a right granted by statute he must be shown to have knowledge of the right and an intent to waive or forego it. There is nothing in the conduct of the deceased which would support an inference that he had either knowledge of the right or an intention to waive it. The only reasonable inference is to the contrary because of what follows. Second. When the policy was executed the insurer required the insured to sign as a part of his application an express waiver reading: "I expressly consent, on behalf of myself and of any person who shall have or claim any interest in any policy issued hereunder, or in the proceeds thereof, that any physician may disclose to California-Western States Life Insurance Company, its successors or assigns, any facts, information or knowledge, heretofore, or hereafter communicated to or acquired by him as my physician for any purpose, and I expressly waive any and all privilege or provision of law which now or may hereafter exist, either exempting or prohibiting any physician from disclosing any such facts, information or knowledge so communicated to or acquired by him in his professional capacity as my physician, or rendering such physician incompetent as a witness in any court of law or equity. The word 'physician' as used herein shall be construed to include 'practitioner' of every character." We may assume that, in accord with the usual practice, the application and the policy were both prepared by the insurer, and so they must be construed strictly against the company. It is manifest that this express waiver relating to subdivision four of section 1881 was not intended, by either insurer, or insured, to cover the provisions of subdivision one of that section. Having prepared the application and the policy, and having required a waiver of the privilege of physician and patient, the insurer must be deemed to have intended that which was written and nothing more.

Since the statute expressly declares that one spouse may not be examined under these circumstances the order of commitment was void.

The petitioner is discharged and her bail is exonerated.

VICKERSON v. WEHR.

Civ. 11471.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 29, 1941.

1. Executors and administrators ⇐436

The proper county in which to institute an action on rejected claim against a decedent's estate is the county in which the executor or administrator resides, regardless of where the estate is pending settlement or where decedent might have been sued. Code Civ.Proc. § 395.

2. Venue ⇐40

The statutory rule that the county in which defendants or some of them reside at commencement of action is proper county for trial of action is not absolute, and a party who is substituted involuntarily as sole defendant or comes in as a real party in interest may apply for change of venue. Code Civ.Proc. § 395.

3. Venue ⇐40

Where action on claim against decedent's estate was brought in county of administrator's residence and subsequently the administrator resigned and his letters were revoked, and special administratrix who resided in another county was appointed, and upon her motion she was substituted as sole defendant, administratrix was not entitled to a change of venue to county of her residence. Code Civ.Proc. § 395.

4. Executors and administrators ⇐453(2)

In action on rejected claim against estate of decedent, any judgment which might be obtained could go no further than to direct that the claim be paid in the course of administration out of the assets of the estate and no judgment in personam could be rendered against the defendant representative of the estate. Probate Code, § 730.

5. Venue ⇐40

Where action was brought on rejected claim against estate, against administrator in county of his residence, and upon resignation of administrator special administratrix who resided in another county was appointed and was substituted as defendant, the decedent's estate was the "real party in interest," and administratrix was not entitled to change of venue to county of her residence on ground that she came into the action as the real party in interest. Probate Code, § 730; Code Civ.Proc. § 395.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Real Party in Interest".

6. Venue ⇐21

The general spirit and policy of statute providing that the county in which defendants or some of them reside at commencement of action is proper county for trial of action is to give defendant right of having all personal actions tried in the county of his residence. Code Civ.Proc. § 395.

7. Venue ⇐21

Where action on rejected claim against decedent's estate was properly brought in county in which administrator resided at time of commencement of action, such county was the proper county for trial of the action, subject to power of court to transfer cause as provided by statute, even though administrator resigned and special administratrix who resided in another county was appointed and on her motion was substituted as defendant. Code Civ.Proc. § 395.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; C. J. Goodell, Judge.

Action by Julia Vickerson against A. Terkel, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Charles D. Wehr, deceased, on a rejected claim for money which plaintiff allegedly furnished and loaned to decedent during the two years preceding his death. Subsequently, the administrator resigned and his letters were revoked, and Alicia Wehr was appointed special administratrix and on her motion was substituted as defendant. From an order granting motion of Alicia Wehr for change of venue, the plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Leo R. Friedman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clark & Heafey, of Oakland, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

This is an appeal from an order granting respondent's motion for a change of venue. The question involved concerns the right of a party substituted as sole defendant to a change of place of trial upon the ground of residence.

The action was filed in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco by the appellant, Julia Vickerson, against A. Terkel, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Charles D. Wehr, deceased, on a rejected claim for money which appellant alleges she furnished and loaned to the decedent at various times during the two years preceding his death. The decedent was a resident of Alameda county, and his estate is pending settlement therein; but Terkel at all times mentioned in the complaint and at the time of the filing thereof was a resident of San Francisco; and summons was served on him therein on January 15, 1940. By written stipulation his time to appear in the action was extended to February 25, 1940; but prior to the expiration of the extended time and without having appeared in the action, to-wit, on February 15, 1940, he resigned as such administrator and his letters were revoked; whereupon and on the same day the respondent, Alicia Wehr, widow of the decedent and a resident of Alameda county, was appointed special administratrix with full power of a general administrator. Thereafter and on February 21, 1940, pursuant to a motion made by her in that behalf and after notice to appellant, the court in which the action was pending made an order substituting respondent as sole defendant in the place and stead of Terkel; and two days later she filed notice of motion, supported by the necessary demand and affidavit, for change of venue to the county of Alameda. The grounds of the motion were: "That at the time of the commencement of this action defendant was, and since that time has continued to be and still is, a resident of the County of Alameda, State of California, and that said Superior Court in and for the County of Alameda, State of California, is the proper court for the trial of the above entitled cause." The motion was contested by appellant, and after a hearing the same was granted.

[1] In some states the venue of actions against executors and administrators is specially declared to be where it would have been necessary to sue the deceased, but in this state it has been definitely held, in conformity with the common-law rule, that the proper county in which to institute an action on a rejected claim is in the county in which the executor or administrator resides, regardless of where the estate is pending settlement or where the decedent might have been sued. (Thompson v. Wood, 115 Cal. 301, 47 P. 50; Chiapella v. County National Bank, 217 Cal. 503, 19 P.2d 983); and section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares in part that except as noted therein "and subject to the power of the court to transfer actions or proceedings as provided in this title [Title 4, Part 2, Code Civ.Proc.], the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action, is the proper county for the trial of the action".

[2] It is appellant's contention that the wording of the foregoing Code provision is plain, explicit, and unambiguous; and that since it is expressly declared therein that the county in which the defendant resides at the commencement of the action is the proper county for the trial of the action, the trial court's ruling granting the change clearly contravenes the mandate of the statute. Appellant concedes, however, that the statutory rule embodied in said section is not absolute, nor in all cases controlling as against a party substituted as sole defendant; that two of the well organized exceptions thereto are where a party "is substituted involuntarily as sole defendant, or * * * comes in as the real party in interest", and that under those circumstances he may apply for a change of venue. 67 Cor.Jur., p. 140. The case at Howell v. Stetefeldt Furnace Co., 69 Cal. 153, 10 P. 390, has been cited by both sides as showing that such is the rule in this state.

[3] There is, however, a sharp disagreement between the parties as to whether the present case falls within either of the exceptions noted. Respondent argues that it is in all material respects similar to Howell v. Stetefeldt Furnace Co., supra, and that therefore the decision therein is here controlling. A comparison of the cases demonstrates, however, that they are essentially different. In that case the furnace company, whose place of business was in San Francisco, was in possession of a certain sum of money which was claimed respectively by John Howell, a resident of Santa Clara county, and James Thompson, a resident of San Francisco; and Howell brought suit in Santa Clara county against the furnace company to recover the money. The furnace company made no defense, but pursuant to the provisions of section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure and after notice to Howell and Thompson, paid the money into court, obtained an order substituting Thompson in its place as party defendant, and ceased to have any further connection with the action. Thereupon Thompson filed a demand for a change of venue to San Francisco, where he resided; and the motion was denied. He appealed, and the order was reversed, the ground of the reversal being that he was brought into the action in invitum under section 386; that he had not come in as a voluntary intervenor; that the appearance of the corporation was not his appearance, and that not until he became a party to the action did he have the opportunity nor was he entitled to move for a change of venue. In the present case respondent was not brought in as an interpleader under the provisions of said section 386, nor as the result of any move whatever on the part of the appellant. She came in voluntarily. At her request she was appointed special administratrix, and upon her motion she was substituted as sole defendant. Respondent points out that having been appointed special administratrix with full power of a general administrator, it was her legal duty to defend the action, and that if she had not obtained the order of substitution it would have been necessary for appellant to have done so, before proceeding with the case. Conceding that to be true, the undisputed facts show, nevertheless, that she came into the action voluntarily. Whether a different conclusion would be reached if the order of substitution had been obtained by appellant rather than by respondent involves a situation not here present; consequently whatever might be said in this regard would amount to nothing more than dictum.

[4, 5] Nor can it be successfully maintained that respondent came into the case as the real party in interest, for the reason that the action does not involve any personal liability of the party sued. The relief is sought against the decedent's estate; and any judgment which appellant might obtain as the result of the action can go no further than to direct that the claim be paid in the course of administration, out of the assets of the estate, Prob. Code, sec. 730; no judgment can be rendered against the representative in personam. 11B Cal.Jur. p. 342. It follows, therefore, that since from the beginning the estate and not the legal representative has been the real party in interest, no new or different interest was brought into the case by respondent's substitution.

In further support of the order of transfer respondent relies on certain language used in deciding the cases of McClung v. Watt, 190 Cal. 155, 211 P. 17; Kallen v. Serretto, 126 Cal.App. 548, 14 P.2d 917; and Ah Fong v. Sternes, 79 Cal. 30, 21 P. 381, to the effect that the right of a moving party to a change of venue to the place of his residence is to be determined by the condition of things existing at the time the moving party first appeared in the action, as those conditions are revealed by the pleadings at the time the demand for change of venue is made. In this connection respondent contends that upon the revocation of Terkel's letters of administration he ceased to be a party to the action as absolutely as if he had died (More v. More, 127 Cal. 460, 59 P. 823), and that since his relation to the case terminated and she was substituted before he appeared in the case, she was entitled as a matter of right to have the place of trial of the action removed to the county of her residence. An examination of the three cases respondent relies upon discloses, however, that in none of them was the court, as here, dealing with the situation of a substituted defendant, and it is apparent that the language there employed has no application to such a case. To be more specific, in McClung v. Watt, supra, the action was filed in San Francisco against a corporate defendant and the appellant Watt. The corporation maintained its place of business in San Francisco; but Watt was a resident of Sacramento, and he moved for a change of place of trial to Sacramento county on two grounds: that he was a resident of that county, and that the corporation was joined as a party defendant solely for the purpose of having the action tried in San Francisco. The motion was denied, and in affirming the order the court stated that a motion for a change of place of trial to the county of the party's residence must be made by the moving party and determined by the court in advance of any other judicial action in the case; hence that the right to a change of place of trial to the residence of the defendant must necessarily be determined by the status of the parties joined as defendants in the action as revealed by the pleadings existing at the time the party claiming the right first appeared in the action. The court then went on to hold that the complaint therein, in apparent good faith, attempted to state a cause of action against the parties so joined as defendants, and that therefore the moving defendant had not the right to have the place of trial changed to the county of his residence. Obviously, in so holding there was no intention to deviate from the statutory rule embodied in said section 395, because, referring especially thereto the court said [190 Cal. 155, 211 P. 19]: "Section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which defendant here claims the right to have the action transferred, provides that 'the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them reside.' If under this section an action is commenced in the county of the residence of one of the defendants, another defendant resident of a different county does not have the right to have the action changed to the county of his residence, and this is so even though it may happen that all of the defendants join in the demand." In the second case, Kallen v. Serretto, supra, an action for damages growing out of an automobile collision was instituted in San Francisco wherein the appellants Serretto and two fictitious persons were joined as parties defendant. The accident happened in San Mateo county, and the Serrettos were residents thereof. They filed a demand and motion for change of venue to that county, and thereafter the plaintiff was permitted to file an amended complaint wherein she changed the allegations relating to the operation of defendants' car and in an affidavit filed in opposition to appellants' motion averred that "First Doe" was one Irani, a resident of San Francisco. Apparently, so the decision states, Irani was never substituted as a party defendant. The trial court denied appellants' motion, and on appeal the order was reversed, mainly on the authority of McClung v. Watt, supra, the court holding in conformity therewith that the right of a moving party to a change depended upon the conditions existing at the time the demand was made, as those conditions were then revealed by the pleadings. In the third case, Ah Fong v. Sternes, supra, an action for damages was filed in Nevada county against a resident of Sutter county, who moved for a change of venue on the ground of residence, and the motion was denied. On appeal the court pointed out that if the action were to be regarded as one for false imprisonment, appellant was entitled to a change of venue; and that if it were to be regarded as one for the recovery of a penalty under section 1505 of the Penal Code, for having disobeyed a writ of habeas corpus, appellant was not entitled to a change of venue. With respect to that matter the court said that it believed the complaint stated a good cause of action for false imprisonment, and that it doubted whether it stated a cause of action for a penalty under section 1505 of the Penal Code. It was held, however, that the plaintiff in thus framing the complaint with the double aspect could not deprive the defendant of his right to have the cause tried in the county of his residence; and furthermore that for the reasons set forth in the opinion the result would be the same even though the complaint be regarded as stating two causes of action upon one of which the defendant was entitled to a change of venue, and not upon the other. It will be seen, therefore, that in each of the foregoing cases the factual situation was entirely different from the one here presented, and that the language there used has no application to a case involving the status of a substituted defendant.

[6, 7] Finally, in support of the order appealed from, respondent cites and quotes from the cases of Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal.

572, 26 P. 356, and Brown v. Happy Valley Fruit Growers, Inc., 206 Cal. 515, 274 P. 977, to the effect that the general spirit and policy of said section 395 is to give a defendant the right of having all personal actions tried in the county of his residence, and that such right has always been safeguarded by a long line of judicial decisions. The soundness of that doctrine is, of course, not questioned; and beyond doubt it is applicable in cases such as the two cited, wherein a personal judgment was sought against a sole defendant who had been sued in a county other than the one in which he resided. Here it is conceded that the action was properly brought in the county in which the sole defendant resided at the time of the commencement of the action; therefore, by virtue of the express provisions of said section 395, such is the proper county for the trial thereof, subject, of course, to the power of the court to transfer the same as provided in title 4, part 2 of said code.

It follows that since no legal ground has been shown upon which the order appealed from may be sustained, it must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

SEBERN v. CITY OF RIVERSIDE.

Civ. 2489.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 30, 1941.

1. Municipal corporations ⇐819(1)

Evidence, including photographs, supported finding that metal flange of a drainpipe which protruded about half an inch through the pavement within a crosswalk constituted a "dangerous condition" which was hazardous to pedestrians, so as to authorize pedestrian to recover against city for injuries sustained when she fell as result of catching heel of her shoe on the flange.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Dangerous Condition".

2. Municipal corporations ⇐819(6)

Evidence that metal flange of a drainpipe had protruded about half an inch through pavement within a crosswalk for a number of years, and that condition disclosed a conspicuously dangerous situation, justified finding that municipality had such "constructive notice" of defect as would permit pedestrian to recover for injuries sustained therefrom.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Constructive Notice".

3. Municipal corporations ⇐819(6)

Evidence that the protruding of a metal flange of a drainpipe about a half an inch through the pavement within a crosswalk was the result of defective design or construction established that municipality had such actual notice of defect as would permit pedestrian to recover for injuries sustained therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; O. K. Morton, Judge.

Action by Eleanor M. Sebern against the City of Riverside for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff when she fell while walking across street at a crosswalk in defendant city. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Eugene Best, City Attorney, of Riverside, for appellant.

Thos. L. Clay, of Riverside, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

In this action for personal injuries the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $482, and the defendant has appealed.

The accident happened at the intersection of Magnolia Avenue and Fairfax Avenue in the defendant city. Magnolia Avenue runs north and south and Fairfax Avenue east and west. On the occasion in question the respondent, while proceeding north on the easterly sidewalk of Magnolia Avenue, walked across Fairfax Avenue at the crosswalk and caught the heel of her shoe on the metal flange of a drainpipe which protruded through the pavement, within the crosswalk and near the north curb of Fairfax Avenue. A fall resulted, which caused the injuries in question.

This drainpipe extended north and south across Fairfax Avenue along what may be called the easterly line of the crosswalk. The pipe was about thirteen inches in diameter and about one-third of it was within this crosswalk or within the extended easterly line of the concrete sidewalk paralleling Magnolia Avenue. The northerly end of the pipe was about a foot south of the northerly curb of Fairfax Avenue and the top of the pipe was about level with the curb, leaving a gutter between the two which was about eight inches deep. Most of the pipe was under the pavement but at its northerly end an edge or flange protruded about half an inch through the paving material. This, of course, was at the edge of the gutter.

[1] The appellant first contends that the court's finding to the effect that the end of this pipe constituted a dangerous condition which was hazardous to pedestrians is not supported by the evidence. In addition to the oral testimony as to the situation at this place and what occurred on this occasion, a plan prepared by the city engineer, showing the construction of this drainpipe in connection with the surrounding street, curb and sidewalk, was introduced in evidence, together with a number of photographs showing the conditions at that point. These photographs alone amply justify the inference that the north end of this drainpipe and its flange constituted an extremely dangerous hazard for pedestrians. Moreover, the pictures rather clearly indicate that while this danger was obvious from certain viewpoints it would be almost entirely concealed from the view of one approaching from the south, which is what the respondent was doing. Coming from that direction the general situation would be much less visible, and the thin layer of paving material on the north end of the pipe, being of the same color as the rest of the street, would naturally make the protruding flange less visible. The evidence supports the court's finding in this regard.

[2, 3] The only other point raised is that a finding to the effect that the appellant had knowledge of this dangerous condition is unsupported. There is evidence that this condition had existed for a number of years. The photographs in evidence disclose such a conspicuously dangerous situation that the court would be justified in finding that the city had constructive notice under the rules discussed in Nicholson v. Los Angeles, 5 Cal.2d 361, 54 P.2d 725. Moreover, the evidence justifies the inference that this dangerous condition was the result of defective design or construction, of which the city must be held to have had actual notice. Durante v. City of Oakland, 19 Cal.App.2d 543, 65 P.2d 1326; Rafferty v. City of Marysville, 207 Cal. 657, 280 P. 118.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

In re EWING'S ESTATE.

BROWN v. FORD.

Civ. 12827.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 27, 1941.

1. Guardian and ward ⇐58

In guardianship matters, it is not necessary in all cases to procure a court order before an expenditure may be made.

2. Guardian and ward ⇐58

If expenditures made by guardian were just and equitable they should be allowed, notwithstanding guardian failed to obtain an order from the court in advance.

3. Guardian and ward ⇐58

In passing upon expenditures of guardian shown in guardian's account, much discretion must be reposed in trial judge.

4. Insane persons ⇐65

Where court authorized guardian to expend $80 per month for support and maintenance of incompetent, and an additional $20 for a boy to act as incompetent's companion, and court later authorized guardian to expend $125 per month for room, board and care of the incompetent, court acted within its discretion in approving additional expenditure of $1,108.04 made for personal needs of the incompetent such as clothing, laundry, auto rides, and barber expenses.

5. Insane persons ⇐42(2)

The burden of proof was on party excepting to guardian's account to establish that incompetent possessed jewelry which should have been included in inventory.

6. Insane persons ⇐42(2)

Where party excepting to a guardian's account did not present proof that incompetent possessed jewelry which should have been included in inventory, court properly made finding that it was not true that incompetent at time of appointment of guardian was possessed of considerable quantity of, or any, jewelry.

7. Guardian and ward ⇐154

Failure of guardian to present vouchers for some of items of expenditure in excess of $20 did not preclude approval of guardianship account. Probate Code, § 1534.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William S. Baird, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of Alexander C. Ewing, an incompetent, wherein Nettie Ford was appointed guardian of the person and estate of Alexander C. Ewing. Howard C. Brown filed exceptions to the account filed by Nettie Ford, and from an order approving the account, Howard C. Brown appeals.

Affirmed.

Harmel L. Pratt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ralph J. Brown, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice.

The respondent, Nettie Ford, was appointed guardian of the person and estate of Alexander C. Ewing, and letters of guardianship were issued to her on August 14, 1935. She filed her verified account current on December 30, 1938. Exceptions to the account were filed by appellant, and thereafter a hearing was held by the court and the account was approved except as hereinafter noted. The appeal is from the order approving the account.

Soon after the guardian was appointed, the court, at her request, made an order authorizing her to expend the sum of $80 per month for the support and maintenance of the incompetent and an additional sum of $20 per month for a boy to act as his companion. Later the court made an order authorizing the guardian to expend the sum of $125 per month for the room, board and care of the incompetent. In her account the guardian claimed credit for the sum of $1,159.39, in addition to the monthly allowance which had been allowed for room, board and care. This sum had been advanced by the guardian for the personal needs of the incompetent, such as clothing, laundry, auto rides and barber expenses. The court approved the additional expenditures except that they were reduced to the sum of $1,108.04. Appellant contends that the court erred in approving the expenditure of the last-mentioned sum, asserting that it should have been included in the allowance which the court had authorized by previous order. We are satisfied that the court acted within the bounds of its legal discretion in approving the additional expenditures.

[1-4] In guardianship matters it is not necessary in all cases to procure a court order before an expenditure may be made. If the expenditures by the guardian were just and equitable they should be allowed, notwithstanding the guardian failed to obtain an order from the court in advance. Estate of Clanton, 171 Cal. 381, 153 P. 459. In passing upon expenditures of guardians shown in their accounts much discretion must necessarily be reposed in the trial judge. We find nothing in the record to justify disturbing the action taken by the court.

[5, 6] The trial court found that "it is not true that said incompetent at the time of the appointment of said guardian was possessed of a considerable quantity of, or any, jewelry". In attacking this finding appellant asserts that it is not supported by the evidence. The burden of proof was upon appellant to establish that the incompetent possessed jewelry which should have been included in the inventory. Estate of Vance, 141 Cal. 624, 75 P. 323. Since appellant did not present such proof the court properly made the finding in question.

[7] Complaint is made that the guardian did not present vouchers for some of the items in excess of $20 in the account of the additional expenditures above referred to. The omission to present these vouchers does not call for the reversal of the order. The point in question was before the court for consideration in Re Estate of Forthmann, 118 Cal.App. 332, 5 P.2d 472, 473, and it was there held that the presentation of vouchers was not necessary for the approval of a guardianship account. In that case the Code section involved was section 1789 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provided that "all the proceedings by guardians concerning sales of property of their wards * * * accounting and settlement of accounts, must be had and made as required by the provisions of this title concerning estates of decedents, unless otherwise specially provided in this chapter. * * *" The nearest counterpart to section 1789 of the Code of Civil Procedure is section 1534 of the Probate Code. It is to be noted that the words "accounting and settlement of accounts" were omitted when section 1534 of the Probate Code was adopted. We find no requirement for the presentation of vouchers by guardians in the provisions of the Probate Code or under the Code sections in force before its adoption.

The order is affirmed.

JANOFSKY et al. v. GARLAND.
Civ. 12514.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.
Jan. 28, 1941.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 20, 1941.
Hearing Denied March 28, 1941.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇐164(3)

Landlord who voluntarily made repairs was within the general rule that a volunteer may not do in a negligent manner what he undertakes to do.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇐164(3)

A landlord is liable in damages if he fails to exercise reasonable care in making repairs, whether they be made by agreement or voluntarily.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇐164(3)

Landlord who negligently made voluntary repairs was liable to tenants for injuries resulting therefrom without proof that landlord thereby rendered a defective condition more dangerous.

4. Courts ⇐89

The rules announced in the Restatement of the Law do not have the force of statutory enactment nor do they supersede judicial decisions.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇐169(3)

Allegations that landlord replaced old plaster in ceiling with new, that he informed tenants that room was safe, that room looked safe to tenants who relied upon appearance and landlord's statement, but that work had been negligently done and that plaster subsequently fell upon tenants were sufficient to bring tenants within the rule that a landlord who makes repairs and gives premises a deceptive appearance of safety and leads tenant to use premises in a way which but for the repairs tenant would recognize to be dangerous, the landlord is liable for resulting injuries.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇐118(2), 164(3)

Landlord who negligently made repairs of premises let for an indefinite period could not avoid liability for injuries to tenants on ground that there was a monthly re-entry and re-letting, since the tenancy was a "continuing tenancy", and repairs made by landlord were made during such tenancy.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Continuing Tenancy".

7. Landlord and tenant ⇐169(3)

Complaint showing that landlord voluntarily replaced old plaster in ceiling with new, that he informed tenants that room was safe, that room looked safe to tenants who relied upon appearance and landlord's statement, but that work had been negligently done and that plaster subsequently fell upon and injured tenants was good as against contention that it failed to allege proximate cause and that allegations were not sufficiently certain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action by David Janofsky and another against William M. Garland, etc., to recover damages for injuries resulting from falling plaster. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed with directions.

Mark F. Jones, by Sydney Tannen, both of Los Angeles, (Walter L. Engelhardt, and Edward I. Harris, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Clyde C. Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, (William J. Currer, Jr., of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiffs commenced this action to recover damages for injuries which they suffered when they were struck by plaster falling from a ceiling in their bedroom. The trial court sustained a demurrer to their third amended complaint without leave to amend and they have appealed from the judgment of dismissal.

It appears from the allegations of the complaint that plaintiffs on February 1, 1936, rented from defendant a part of a four-family flat building located at 946 North Western Avenue in Los Angeles at an agreed rental to be paid monthly. The agreement was oral and for an indefinite period. Thereafter plaintiffs occupied the premises continuously up to March 1, 1939. It further appears that during the occupancy of the premises by plaintiffs and within two years from the date of the commencement of the action on February 19, 1939, defendant inspected the ceiling in the bedroom of the premises rented to plaintiffs and found that the plaster of the ceiling was "cracked and bulged". Defendant removed the defective plaster, causing holes in the ceiling to be produced in several places, one of which was directly above the bed of plaintiffs. Defendants caused the defective holes to be repaired by replastering and "causing the said ceiling and room to appear safe for plaintiffs to sleep in and * * * informed plaintiffs that it was safe for plaintiffs to sleep in the said bedroom * * * plaintiffs looked at the said replastered portions of the ceiling and observed them to be safe, and relying thereon, as well as on the statement of defendant's agents and servants, that the said bedroom was safe to sleep in, as aforesaid, that plaintiffs thereafter continuously occupied the said room as a bedroom". It is further alleged that the replastering was done negligently and with a faulty mixture. While plaintiffs were asleep in their bed on February 1, 1939, a portion of the replastered part of the ceiling became loose and suddenly fell upon plaintiffs, causing the injuries for which damages are sought.

[1, 2] Although no duty rested upon defendant to make the repairs referred to in the complaint, yet, having volunteered to do so defendant was brought within the general rule that a volunteer may not do what he undertakes to do in a negligent manner. There appears to be some conflict in the authorities but the rule is established in California that a landlord is liable in damages if he fails to exercise reasonable care in making repairs whether they be made by agreement or voluntarily. In Nelson v. Myers, 94 Cal.App. 66, 270 P. 719, 723, it is said: "It is true that a landlord who voluntarily attempts to repair defective premises, whether he has contracted to do so or not, will be required by law to exercise reasonable care therein, and will become liable for injuries caused by his careless or unskillful workmanship." In Callahan v. Loughran, 102 Cal. 476, at page 481, 36 P. 835, at page 836, it is said that "when the landlord undertook to make the repairs, whether pursuant to a contract, or an obligation imposed by statute, or as a volunteer, he was in duty bound to use ordinary care in the conduct of the work".

[3] Defendant contends that plaintiffs may not recover unless it be established that defendant made a defective condition more dangerous. We find no ruling so holding in the California decisions. A similar contention was discussed by Mr. Justice Cardozo in Marks v. Nambil Realty Co., 245 N.Y. 256, 157 N.E. 129. In that case the landlord "made a bungling job" of repairing a defective stairway. The court held that there was no duty on the part of the landlord to make the repairs but also held: "The landlord, though a volunteer in making the repairs, is liable, none the less, for negligence in making them. * * * The distinction in such cases is the old one between nonfeasance and misfeasance." Concerning the argument that it must be shown that a defective condition was made more dangerous the court said: "We recall these familiar principles because they seem to have been overlooked in cases in the Appellate Division relied on by the defendant here. Marston v. Frisbie, 168 App. Div. 666, 154 N.Y.S. 367; Wynne v. Haight, 27 App.Div. 7, 50 N.Y.S. 187. There is a suggestion, if not a ruling, in these cases, that to make the landlord liable, the negligent repairs must have aggravated the defect, so that what was dangerous before became more dangerous than ever. We cannot yield assent to this restriction of the field of duty. The tenant does not have to prove that by the negligent making of the repairs what was wrong has been made worse. His case is made out when it appears that by reason of such negligence what was wrong is still wrong, though prudence would have made it right. * * *" Defendant contends that this case was overruled by the later case of Kirshenbaum v. General Outdoor Adv. Co., 258 N.Y. 489, 180 N.E. 245, 84 A.L.R. 645, but we find nothing in the later case which is contrary to the doctrine of the earlier case. Indeed, a quotation from the earlier case is made with approval in the later case.

[4, 5] Defendant places reliance upon a rule set forth in Restatement of the Law, 2 Torts § 362, which is as follows: "A lessor of land who, by purporting to make repairs thereon while the land is in the possession of his lessee or by the negligent manner in which he has made such repairs has, as the lessee neither knows nor should know, made the land more dangerous for use, is subject to liability for bodily harm caused thereby to the lessee and others upon the land with the consent of the lessee or a sub-lessee." Immediately following this rule appears the following Comment: "The rule stated in this section applies if the negligent manner in which the repairs are made makes the land more dangerous for use, irrespective of whether the added danger is due to the fact that the physical condition of land is changed for the worse by the repairs or to the fact that the making of the repairs gives it a deceptive appearance of safety and so leads the tenant or others with his consent to use the land in a way which but for the repairs they would recognize to be dangerous." The rules announced in the Restatement of the Law do not have the force of statutory enactment nor do they supersede judicial decisions. Kolburn v. P. J. Walker Co., 38 Cal.App.2d 545, 101 P.2d 747. Where as here decisions of the highest tribunal of the state have enunciated the rule applicable to a given set of facts such rule should be followed by the courts of the state and not be disregarded in favor of a rule set forth in the Restatement. Moreover, even if the rule of the Restatement should be followed it does not bar recovery by plaintiffs in the present litigation. The statement is made in the rule that a lessor is liable if he does in fact make the premises more dangerous for use but the rule does not definitely provide that a volunteer landlord who negligently makes repairs is not liable. If we turn to the "Comment" in the Restatement which is above quoted we find that the rule stated in § 362 is applicable if the landlord makes repairs and the making of the repairs gives the premises a deceptive appearance of safety and so leads the tenant to use the premises in a way which but for the repairs he would recognize to be dangerous. Plaintiffs properly contend that the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to bring them within the rule as set forth in the Comment of the Restatement.

[6] Defendant cites the rule that a landlord is not liable for the defective condition of leased property unless there was a latent defect known to the landlord and not known to the tenant and from this basis argues that at the beginning of each month there was a renewal of the lease and a reentry by the tenant. The same argument was presented in Ward v. Hinkleman, 37 Wash. 375, 79 P. 956, 958, and the court there said that the "legal fiction that there is a re-entry and a reletting at the beginning of every month is too refined to meet our approval". We heartily agree with the conclusion reached by the Washington tribunal. The tenancy of plaintiffs was a continuing tenancy. They became tenants of the property long before the repairs on the ceiling were made and remained continuously until after the falling of the defective plaster which during the tenancy had been repaired by defendant.

[7] Other attacks made by defendant upon the complaint, such as the charge that plaintiffs failed to allege the proximate cause of their injuries and to make their allegations sufficiently certain, are not of sufficient importance to merit discussion.

The judgment is reversed and the superior court is directed to overrule the demurrer.

GENUSER v. OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION, LIMITED.

Civ. 11556.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 29, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 28, 1941.

1. Reformation of Instruments ⇐36(3)

An amended complaint alleging that insured and insurer agreed to have automobile policy describe 1934 automobile rather than 1933 automobile, and that through insured's mistake, which was known to insurer, the policy issued described the 1933 automobile instead of the 1934 automobile, stated cause of action for reformation of policy. Civ.Code, § 3399.

2. Appeal and error ⇐863

On appeal from judgment for defendant after trial court sustained demurrer to amended complaint, District Court of Appeal was not concerned with any possible difficulties which might arise in the proof of allegations in amended complaint, or with possible difficulties which might arise in decision of incidental legal questions, but inquiry was confined to a consideration of whether amended complaint stated sufficient facts with sufficient certainty to entitle plaintiff to have the demurrer overruled and to have the cause proceed to trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Robert W. Kenny, Judge.

Action by Frank S. Genuser against the Ocean Accident & Guaranty Corporation, Limited, for reformation of a policy of insurance. From a judgment for the defendant after a demurrer to the amended complaint had been sustained, the plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer.

Hibbard & Kleindienst and Jack H. Faucett, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George H. Moore and Hugh B. Rotchford, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Hearing denied; SPENCE, Justice pro tem., took no part in the consideration or decision of this matter.

SPENCE, Justice.

Plaintiff sued for reformation of a policy of insurance. The trial court sustained a demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint and thereafter entered judgment in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals from said judgment.

On November 6, 1937, defendant issued a policy of automobile insurance to plaintiff describing the automobile therein as a 1933 Ford automobile coupe bearing motor number 18-447073. Plaintiff sought by this action to have said policy reformed upon the ground of mistake claiming that said automobile should have been described in the policy as a 1934 de luxe Ford coupe bearing motor number 18-075524.

Section 3399 of the civil code provides, "When, through fraud or a mutual mistake of the parties, or a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected, a written contract does not truly express the intention of the parties, it may be revised, on the application of a party aggrieved, so as to express that intention * * *."

Plaintiff alleged numerous facts purporting to show how the mistake occurred and further alleged as follows:

"That it was the intention of the plaintiff and defendant, the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited, to insure the plaintiff from liability caused by accident, as aforesaid, arising out of the use, ownership and maintenance of an automobile owned by plaintiff and in which he had an insurable interest, to wit, a 1934 de luxe Ford coupe, motor number 18-075524, and not to insure the plaintiff from liability in connection with the use, ownership and maintenance of any automobile not owned or operated by him or in which or the use of which he had no insurable interest. That through the mistake of plaintiff, known to defendant, a policy of insurance was issued upon an automobile which the plaintiff did not own or was not operating or in which he had no insurable interest. That each of plaintiff and said defendant, the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited, intended and agreed that the legal consequences of their acts should be the indemnification of plaintiff against loss and damage from bodily injury and injury to or destruction of property caused by accident in the amounts hereinabove specified, arising out of the ownership, maintenance or use of an automobile which plaintiff then owned, to wit, a de luxe Ford coupe automobile, year model 1934, engine number 18-705524."

[1, 2] The demurrer of defendant was both general and special and it was apparently directed largely at certain allegations of the complaint other than those above quoted. Said demurrer was directed particularly at those allegations of the complaint relating to the dealings of plaintiff with Widenham Company when ordering the insurance and at those allegations relating to the relationship of said Widenham Company to the parties. The first two headings of defendant's brief read "Widenham Company was not the agent of defendant" and "Widenham Company was the agent of appellant". The complaint alleged otherwise. The third heading in defendant's brief is directed to the point that the knowledge of a mere soliciting agent is not the knowledge of the insurance company. While there appears to be some dispute between the parties as to the exact nature of the agency, if any, and as to the question of whether the knowledge of the alleged agent was knowledge chargeable to defendant, we are nevertheless of the opinion that the allegations above quoted, if proved upon the trial, would be sufficient to warrant the granting of a decree reforming the policy and that said allegations were sufficient to withstand defendant's attack by general and special demurrer. These allegations cover the alleged intention and agreement of plaintiff and defendant to have the insurance policy describe the 1934 rather than the 1933 automobile and they further cover the issuance of the policy describing the 1933 automobile through an alleged mistake of plaintiff which was known to defendant. We are not now concerned with any possible difficulties which may arise in the proof of the quoted allegations or with the possible difficulties which may arise in the decision of incidental legal questions upon the trial of the cause. The inquiry here, in the light of the ground specified in defendant's demurrer, is confined to a consideration of whether the amended complaint stated sufficient facts with sufficient certainty to entitle plaintiff to have the demurrer overruled and to have the cause proceed to trial. Our reading of the amended complaint leads us to the conclusion that it does.

The judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer.

1. Pilots ⇐15

Care and skill required of pilots is the ordinary care and skill of an expert, such as is commonly possessed by other pilots in the profession.

2. Pilots ⇐16

Although a pilot is not liable for mere errors of judgment, he is liable for damages caused by failure to exercise the diligence which other pilots similarly situated would ordinarily have exercised.

3. Pilots ⇐16

A pilot would be liable for damages resulting from the handling of a vessel in a manner which nautical experience and good seamanship would condemn as unjustifiable at the time.

4. Wharves ⇐22

The fact that a moving vessel struck a stationary object, such as a wharf, would raise an inference of negligence on the part of those in charge of the vessel, upon whom would rest the burden of rebutting such inference.

5. Appeal and error ⇐996
Evidence ⇐597

Trial court may base its findings upon an inference or presumption, and such findings will not be disturbed on appeal unless such inference or presumption is wholly irreconcilable with the evidence as a whole.

6. Wharves ⇐22

In action for damages to wharf caused by alleged negligence of pilot in docking a ship, conflicting evidence as to strength of gust of wind at time of collision, as to distance of vessel from wharf as it proceeded toward dock, and as to whether two tugs should have been used in view of weather conditions was not inconsistent with inference of negligence arising from fact that moving ship collided with wharf, and was sufficient to support a finding of negligence on part of pilot in attempting to dock vessel, after being forced out of mid-channel by outgoing ships rather than proceeding to turning basin and trying again under more favorable conditions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by the General Petroleum Corporation of California against the City of Los Angeles and others, for damages caused to plaintiff's wharves when struck by a ship piloted by an employee of defendant city. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff obtained a judgment against defendants as compensation for damage to its wharves caused by the Japanese Steamship Hakonesan Maru which was being brought to the wharves by defendant Oliegreen, a pilot in the employ of defendant city. It is charged that the pilot was negligent in docking the vessel. On a former appeal, taken by plaintiff from a judgment after a ruling that the complaint failed to state a cause of action against defendant city (22 Cal.App.2d 332, 70 P.2d 998, 72 P.2d 551), it was held that the city was engaged in a proprietary function at the time of the accident and is liable for the negligence of its agent, the pilot Oliegreen. After the remittitur went down the action was tried and the court found that the damage was caused by the negligence of the pilot. It is now contended on behalf of defendants that this finding is not supported by the evidence and that the damage was caused by an unavoidable accident brought about by a sudden gust of wind.

The vessel struck the wharves on the afternoon of May 21, 1932, between 5:30 and 6 o'clock. As the vessel entered the harbor the tugboat John Stuart was tied to her bow and the pilot prepared to take her to plaintiff's wharves. The witness Foley, chemist in plaintiff's employ, testified that he saw the Hakonesan Maru as she approached plaintiff's wharves and that her bow was angled into the wharves when she was only 20 feet away from it. The witness McKinney, a dockman, testified that as the vessel proceeded up the channel she was about 115 feet distant from the wharves. A number of witnesses testified that the weather had been windy and squally all the afternoon. The witness Foley and the witness Brown, a dockman, testified that they did not notice a gust of wind of any great intensity immediately before the accident. From the chart of the United States Weather Bureau it appeared that from 3 p. m. to 7 p. m. on the date in question the wind was blowing between 24 and 30 miles per hour and between 5 p. m. and 6 p. m. it varied between a low of 25 and a high of 32 miles per hour. The chief of the weather bureau testified that a wind blowing from 25 to 30 miles per hour at Los Angeles harbor would be "somewhat gusty" and that the gusts would vary "considerably" from the average velocity. Captain Gilbert, port captain for defendant city, in answer to the question, "How do you bring boats into the General Petroleum docks when it is blowing a good breeze," answered, "I employ two tugs, each with a tow line, one at the bow of the vessel the other at the stern. * * *"

The record discloses that Captain Stofen, an expert called by defendants, testified in part:

"The Court: Well, what I mean to say, with a ship like this Japanese ship; it was from 30 to 50 feet in places out of the water possibly; light; a lot of freeboard; how far off would you feel it was safe to be from the lee shore? A. Well, if I were coming in under those conditions, I would certainly want to stand off close to mid-channel, or about mid-channel.

"The Court: That would give you approximately 500 feet? A. Yes; that is, in approaching the dock."

The witness further testified:

"Q. Yes; that you saw at that point that ships were coming down the harbor, that were crowding you over closer than you wanted to be, would you still try to make a landing at the docks? A. If I felt that they were going to crowd me too close, no; I would increase the speed of my ship then and try and pass the dock; that is, if I could see that far ahead.

"Q. And then you would go up to the turning basin, would you? A. Yes.

"Q. And come out and try over again when you were not crowded? A. Presuming it did not make any difference which side the ship had to go to.

"Q. But if it did make any difference which side, you could go to the turning basin and then out into the outer harbor, and come up when things were less crowded? A. Yes, try it again."

The vessel was lightly laden and an unusually large part of it extended above the water. Captain Oliegreen testified that as he approached the neighborhood of plaintiff's wharves he met two steamships, the Point San Pablo and the Admiral Senn, which were coming out of the harbor on a mid-channel course and that he was compelled to bear over in order to pass them. He testified:

"Q. And if there is a cross-channel wind, isn't it sometimes a little more difficult to dock at those docks than at other docks? A. Yes, it is.

"Q. For that reason isn't it true that the usual practice of masters and pilots in coming up to the dock, is to stay a considerable distance off the docks, and then bring their ship to a standstill and allow her to drift over under the pressure of the wind? A. That just depends on the conditions, if you have a fresh wind, or something like that.

"Q. Well, if it is blowing as hard as 28 miles per hour, we will say. A. Oh, yes. * * *

"Q. Now, on this particular day, if you had not met the Point San Pablo and the Admiral Senn, do I understand that you would have stayed further off the dock? A. I would, yes.

"Q. About how far? A. Well, I would have stayed at least mid-channel until I got up to 239.

"Q. That is about four to five hundred feet off; is that correct? A. Yes, about 400 feet off.

"Q. Because that was the safest procedure to follow; is that right? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. If it had not been for the one or more ships approaching from the other direction, would you have kept farther out in the channel? A. I would have kept mid-channel. I was forced to the right.

"Q. Now, by 'farther out in the channel,' you were referring there to what you have now drawn as the dashed line on this Exhibit A? A. Yes, that is correct; that is all right.

"Q. And in your opinion at that time, that was the preferable course to follow, wasn't it? A. Yes, I guess so.

"Q. And when you saw that you could not follow that course, you still tried to make the landing, didn't you? A. Yes."

Captain Oliegreen further testified that as he approached the wharves a sudden gust of wind of a velocity of 40 to 50 miles per hour threw the vessel against the landing; that when the squall hit the ship he gave the order "full speed ahead" to try to get away from the wharves; that when the ship did not answer her helm he gave the order to "reverse at full speed" and drop the port anchor; that if he had gone forward past the wharves he would have landed the ship in a rock pile which might have caused damage of about $150,000. Several expert witnesses testified on behalf of defendants that Captain Oliegreen had acted properly at the time the squall struck the vessel.

[1-3] A pilot is required to use the ordinary care of an expert in his profession. He must exercise the degree of skill commonly possessed by others in the same employment and, although he is not liable for mere errors of judgment he is liable for damage caused by his failure to exercise the diligence which others similarly situated would ordinarily have exercised. The Dora Allison, D.C., 213 F. 645. Pilots are liable if they handle vessels in a manner which nautical experience and good seamanship would condemn as unjustifiable at the time. The Clarence L. Blackeslee, 2 Cir., 243 F. 365.

[4-6] When a moving vessel strikes a stationary object, such as a wharf, an inference of negligence arises and the burden is then upon the owners of the vessel to rebut the inference of negligence. 24 R.C.L. 1270; The Louisiana, 3 Wall. 164, 70 U.S. 164, 18 L.Ed. 85; The Marian, 9 Cir., 66 F.2d 354. The trial court may make findings based upon an inference or a presumption. Barsha v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 32 Cal.App.2d 556, 90 P.2d 371; Westberg v. Willde, 14 Cal.2d 360, 365, 94 P.2d 590. Such a finding will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears from all the evidence that the inference, or presumption as the case may be, is wholly irreconcilable with the evidence. The record before us discloses that the inference of negligence is consistent with the evidence and that the court's finding of negligence on the part of the pilot is sufficiently supported. It will be noted that there is a conflict in the testimony on the point of the strength of the gust of wind at the time the vessel struck the wharf. Three of the witnesses testified in effect that at that moment the wind was not of great violence. There is also a conflict in the testimony as to the distance between the Hakonesan Maru and the wharves as the vessel advanced. From the testimony of one expert it appears that in view of the weather conditions two tugboats should have been used instead of one. Even Captain Oliegreen himself testified that the preferable course would have been to "keep mid-channel" and that when he could not do so he "still tried to make the landing". The trial court could reasonably conclude from the evidence that good seamanship would have required the pilot to proceed to the turning basin and after making the turn to make another attempt to approach the wharves when the middle part of the channel was not occupied by outgoing vessels.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Benjamin J. Scheinman, Judge.

Action by C. R. Williams and others, as residents and taxpayers of Topanga School District, against Mark A. Venneman and others, as members of the Board of Trustees of the Topanga School District, to have a certain bond election declared void. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

SPENCE, Justice.

Plaintiffs, as residents and taxpayers of the Topanga School District, brought this action against the defendants, as members of the board of trustees of said school district, seeking to have a certain bond election declared void. The trial court entered its findings and judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and from said judgment defendants appeal.

The trial court's findings of fact read in part as follows:

"That upon the day of the election referred to in said complaint the plaintiffs Oka Stewart and Odo B. Stade were struck and beaten at or near the polling place where the same was being held and conducted, and were thereby intimidated by force and violence, and by threats of additional violence, from bringing to the said polling place four qualified voters of said district who desired and intended to and who would have voted against said proposed bond issue; * * *

"That at said election a total of 197 votes were cast, and the proponents of said bond issue polled 132 votes; that except for said force and violence and intimidation so committed as aforesaid the opponents of said bond issue would have polled four additional votes, and would have polled sufficient votes to prevent a two-thirds majority in favor of said bond issue, and would have polled sufficient votes to change the result of said election and to defeat said proposed bond issue."

As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the trial court concluded that the election "was unfairly and irregularly held and conducted, and that said irregularity affected the substantial rights of the taxpayers of said Topanga School District, and of the electors voting at said election, and of the plaintiffs", and that plaintiffs were entitled to have said election declared void. Judgment was entered accordingly.

Defendants contend that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings of fact and that said findings were insufficient to support the judgment entered.

[1] We do not believe that defendants are seriously urging the claim that the evidence was insufficient to support the above-mentioned findings. The uncontradicted evidence showed a particularly flagrant case of the use of force and violence upon plaintiffs Stewart and Stade and that said plaintiffs were intimidated by said use of force and violence and by threats of the further use thereof from bringing to the polls four qualified voters who would have voted against said bond issue. It is a fair inference from the remarks made by the assailants of said plaintiffs that there previously had been another bond election which had failed; that there was considerable feeling on the part of some of the proponents toward the opponents of the bond issue at the time of the second election; and that there was a deliberate and premeditated plan on the part of at least three men to intimidate said plaintiffs from bringing to the polls voters who were opposed to the bond issue. Said three men voted early and remained in the vicinity of the polling place throughout practically the entire day. They struck plaintiff Stade on one occasion and they struck plaintiff Stewart on two occasions. They were described as "a riotous-looking crowd" and it was testified that "they looked like they were going to start a riot". On one occasion one of them said to plaintiff Stewart, "By God, you and Ray Williams and the rest of these —— —— —— had it your way last time, and we are here to see that you don't do it this time. You get the hell out of here." Plaintiff Stade was struck in the face with great force after he had gotten into his car and was told by his assailant to get out of his car and fight. Another of the men advised him not to get out, and stated, "You had better get out of here and stay out." While it is true that plaintiffs Stewart and Stade voted at the election and that neither was struck until after he had voted, it seems quite apparent that the purpose of the use of force and of threats upon them was to intimidate them from remaining near or returning to the vicinity of the polling place for any purpose.

Said plaintiffs Stade and Stewart had previously arranged to bring four elderly persons to the polls by automobile. These four persons were opponents of the bond issue and each of the four resided three miles or more from the polling place. They testified that they would have voted against the bond issue but were prevented from doing so by the failure of plaintiffs Stade and Stewart to call for them in the late afternoon as previously arranged. Said plantiffs testified that they did not bring said four persons to the polling place as arranged because of their fear for the safety of themselves and the safety of any voters that they might bring there. All of the foregoing testimony is uncontradicted and it is conceded that two additional negative votes would have defeated the bond issue. It is therefore apparent that the foregoing findings of fact are amply supported by the evidence.

[2-4] The only debatable question is whether said findings are sufficient to support the judgment. Neither side has brought to our attention any authority directly in point. It is of course of the utmost importance under our form of government that elections should be conducted fairly and without any material interference with the freedom of such elections. The general acceptance of this view is evidenced by the fact that there are comparatively few authorities to be found dealing with the question of the effect of the use of violence and intimidation upon the validity of elections. In reviewing the authorities it is said in McCrary on Elections, 4th Edition, sec. 550, "If it clearly appears that the fairness, purity or freedom of an election has been materially interfered with by acts of violence, intimidation or armed interference, such election should be set aside. * * * The true rule is this: The violence or intimidation should be shown to have been sufficient either to change the result, or that by reason of it the true result cannot be ascertained with certainty from the returns." See, also, Paine on Elections, secs. 467–471; 18 Amer.Juris. 336; 20 Corp.Juris. 189 and cases cited.

[5, 6] We find no conflict of authority on the subject, but the only cases which have arisen appear to have involved instances where the violence or intimidation was directly applied to the qualified electors who failed to vote. In the present case the violence and intimidation was not directly applied to the four qualified electors who failed to vote, but the uncontradicted evidence showed that the violence and intimidation which was applied to plaintiffs was equally effective in accomplishing its intended purpose as though it had been directly applied to said four qualified electors who failed to vote. We are therefore of the view that it requires no unwarranted extension of the salutary principles laid down in said authorities to hold that the above-mentioned findings of the trial court were sufficient to support the judgment declaring said election void. There could be no freedom of elections if the tactics employed in the present case were permitted to succeed, and as was said in Hatfield v. Scaggs, 101 W.Va. 425, 133 S.E. 109, 114, a case involving intimidation, "We agree with the Michigan court that—'The readiest way to stop fraud and corruption at elections is to see to it that the same is not rewarded by success.'" Citing Attorney General v. Stillson, 108 Mich. 419, 423, 66 N.W. 388.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Judgment ⇐720

In action on a judgment based on a note, evidence as to matters set up in defense to prior action wherein judgment sued on was recovered, and as to alleged fraudulent conspiracy on plaintiff's part in concealing from court at prior trial facts which if revealed would allegedly have established defendant's defense was inadmissible, because prior judgment was "res judicata" as to such matters.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Judicata".

2. Judgment ⇐906

Where party suing on note had no obligation to disclose facts which allegedly would have established a defense to suit, the concealment of such facts from court would not constitute "fraud", nor afford to judgment debtor a defense to action on the judgment recovered on the note.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Fraud".

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement L. Shinn, Judge.

Action by Mary Alice Fritsche against Thomas F. McCue, wherein the defendant filed a cross-complaint. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

See, also, 34 Cal.App.2d 46, 92 P.2d 928.

Thomas F. McCue, of Los Angeles, in pro. per.

G. P. Adams and Charles E. Beardsley, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DORAN, Justice.

The appeal herein involves a consideration of two actions; the first, an action by Mary A. Fritsche against Thomas F. McCue wherein plaintiff sued as executrix of the estate of her husband and in which action plaintiff recovered judgment. The second action is based upon the judgment obtained in the said first action, which judgment, it is alleged, was distributed to Mary A. Fritsche by administration. Thomas F. McCue is defendant in both actions.

The appeal herein is from a judgment for plaintiff in the second action.

The record reveals that the original action was on a promissory note executed by defendant in favor of A. E. Fritsche, whose estate Mary A. Fritsche was administering when the first action was filed and reduced to judgment.

In that first action defendant McCue defended on the grounds that there was no consideration for the note and that said note was delivered pursuant and according to an agreement between the maker and the payee which agreement was afterwards mutually rescinded; that the payee A. E. Fritsche had agreed to and intended to return said note to defendant but had died without having done so. At the trial of the first action the court found against defendant on all defenses and gave judgment for plaintiff. No appeal was taken and the judgment is final.

In the instant action, which, as above noted, is based on the first judgment, defendant seeks to defend on the same grounds set up in the answer to the first action. In addition and by cross-complaint defendant undertakes to set up an equitable defense in which, among other things, an effort to allege a fraudulent conspiracy appears. It is unnecessary to recite the details thereof, except to note that such purported conspiracy is based upon the alleged failure of plaintiff to reveal to defendant the fact that A. E. Fritsche had died and that plaintiff had concealed from the court at the first trial certain facts that, if revealed, would have established defendant's defenses.

At the trial of the present action, objections to any inquiry as to the matters above noted were sustained on the ground that the same were res adjudicata. The ruling is assailed as error, for it is contended by appellant that by reason thereof the so-called equitable defenses were foreclosed.

[1, 2] There is no merit to the contention. An examination of the so-called equitable defenses reveals them to be the same in substance as the defenses relied upon at the trial of the first action. With regard to the allegations setting forth respondent's failure to reveal certain facts at the first trial, it does not appear that any obligation so to do, moral or legal, existed. In the circumstances, no fraud results from such action.

There are no errors in the record and the judgment is affirmed.

4. Libel and slander ⇐16, 17, 18

A notice posted in defendant's theater requesting defendant's employees not to patronize plaintiff's place of business because plaintiff had shown himself disloyal to theater and did not merit employees' patronage and advising employees to discourage their friends from dealing with plaintiff was not "libelous per se", since plaintiff was not charged with anything that would expose him to hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy or which would cause him to be avoided, and language of sign did not tend to injure plaintiff in his occupation as operator of ice cream establishment. Civ.Code, § 45.

5. Libel and slander ⇐15

WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff has appealed from a judgment in favor of defendants rendered in an action for libel.

[1] From the pleadings and the findings of the trial court, which are supported by the evidence, it appears that defendant Warner Bros. Theatres, Inc., was the owner of the Granada Theatre in the city of Santa Barbara and defendant Ralston was employed as manager of the theatre. Plaintiff owned a lunch and ice cream establishment located directly across the street from the theatre, which he operated under the fictitious name of Starr's Ice Cream Store. Plaintiff placed a poster in the window of his store, which advertised performances at the Fox Arlington Theatre, a rival of the Granada. When Ralston became acquainted with this fact he approached plaintiff and requested that he remove the poster from his window, stating that the advertisement would cause people in the vicinity to go out of the neighborhood for their amusement, thus injuring plaintiff's business as well as that of the Granada. Upon plaintiff's refusal to remove the poster Ralston caused the following notice directed to "all employees" to be posted in four places in the Granada Theatre: "You are requested not to patronize Starr's Ice Cream Co., across the street from the theatre, from this date until further notice. They have shown themselves disloyal to the house and the neighborhood in no uncertain fashion, and do not merit our patronage. It would be well to discourage your friends from dealing with this merchant also. Kindly cooperate. Howard Ralston, Mgr." The court found that such notices were posted in places accessible to the employees of the theatre only and not to the general public; that Ralston's intention was that such notices should be seen by his employees only and should be understood by them as a request not to patronize plaintiff's place of business because the display by plaintiff of advertising of a rival theatre was, in Ralston's opinion, injurious to the business of the Granada Theatre; that Ralston's purpose in publishing such notice was to dissuade his employees and their friends from trading with plaintiff, thereby forcing plaintiff to remove the competitive advertising from his window. With the consent of plaintiff the allegations charging special damage were stricken from the complaint. The trial court concluded that the notice was not libelous per se and was not libelous under the circumstances shown by the evidence.

[2-5] Plaintiff's principal contention upon this appeal is that the court erred as a matter of law in concluding that the notice was not libelous per se. To be libelous per se it is necessary that the writing on its face fall within the definition of libel given in section 45 of the Civil Code. Rosenberg v. J. C. Penney Co., 30 Cal.App.2d 609, 86 P.2d 696. By section 45 libel is defined as "a false and unprivileged publication by writing * * * which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation". In determining whether the alleged defamatory matter is libelous per se it is the duty of the court to give the language used the natural and popular construction of the average reader, not the critical analysis of a mind trained in technicalities. Western Broadcast Co. v. Times-Mirror Co., 14 Cal.App. 2d 120, 57 P.2d 977. Considering the notice in such light, it amounts to nothing more than a request to the employees of the theatre to boycott Starr's Ice Cream Company because "they have shown themselves disloyal to the house (theatre) and the neighborhood * * * and (therefore) do not merit our patronage * * *". Contrary to the contention of plaintiff, the language of the notice may not be construed as charging plaintiff with lack of merit. The phrase "and do not merit our patronage" is clearly a conclusion based upon the phrase which immediately precedes it. There is nothing illegal in requesting the employees to refrain from patronizing plaintiff's store, for an employer may by any legal means induce his employees not to patronize a particular establishment. Union Labor Hospital Ass'n v. Vance Redwood Lumber Co., 158 Cal. 551, 112 P. 886, 33 L.R.A.,N.S., 1034; Katz v. Kapper, 7 Cal.App.2d 1, 44 P.2d 1060. The libel, if any, must therefore be found in the charge of disloyalty.

[6] Is the statement that "they have shown themselves disloyal to the house and the neighborhood" libelous per se? Construing such language in its natural and popular sense it fails to come within the meaning of section 45 of the Civil Code. The word "disloyal" is defined as "not loyal; not true to a sovereign or lawful superior, or to the government under which one lives; false where allegiance is due; faithless". Webster's New International Dictionary. Obviously the word was not used in the sense as above defined, for plaintiff owed no duty of allegiance, faithfulness or loyalty to the theatre or to any other establishment in the neighborhood. Placing ourselves in the position of the reader under the circumstances (Rosenberg v. J. C. Penney Co., supra), it is evident that the word "disloyal" was used as meaning uncooperative. Such a charge is not libelous. The case comes within the rule that one who is charged with doing that which he may legally and properly do is not liable. 16 Cal.Jur., p. 53; Stevens v. Snow, 191 Cal. 58, 214 P. 968; Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 140 P. 277, Ann.Cas.1915C, 766.

Manifestly the plaintiff was charged with nothing which would expose him to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which would cause him to be shunned or avoided. Nor did it tend to injure him in his occupation, for it cast no reflection on his business ability, his honesty, his integrity, or the manner in which his business was conducted. 16 Cal.Jur. 45, and cases there cited.

The remaining contentions advanced by plaintiff are based upon the assumption that the language of the notice is libelous per se. In view of our conclusion that the language is not libelous per se it is unnecessary to discuss them.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment in favor of the defendants predicated upon the sustaining of their demurrer without leave to amend to plaintiff's complaint in an action to recover the balance due on a note for which a deed of trust with power of sale had been given as security following an exercise of the power of sale, plaintiff appeals.

The material allegations of the complaint filed January 25, 1940, are:

Defendants, September 18, 1928, executed and delivered to plaintiff's assignor a promissory note maturing two years after September 12, 1928. The note was secured by a deed of trust covering certain real property, which deed of trust conferred a power of sale in case of a default. The maturity date of the note was extended by plaintiff's assignor until March 12, 1932. Thereafter, a default occurring by reason of the nonpayment of principal after maturity of the note, the beneficiary under the deed of trust delivered to the trustee a declaration of default and demanded a sale. The trustee, pursuant to the provisions of the deed of trust, sold the property described therein on June 15, 1933. The proceeds of the sale were applied to the note, leaving a deficiency, which is the basis of the present action.

* Subsequent opinion 115 P.2d 820.

Defendants demurred on the ground, among others, that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 337, subdivision 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

This is the sole question necessary for us to determine:

Did the Moratorium Act of 1935 (Act 5104a, Deering's 1935 Supplement to the Codes, Laws and Constitutional Amendments of the Constitution of the State of California, p. 1336), the 1937 Act (Chapter V, Statutes of 1937, p. 57), the 1937 Moratorium Act (Chapter 167, p. 460), and the 1939 Moratorium Act (Statutes of 1939, Chapter 86, p. 1045) extend the time provided in section 337, subdivision 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which prior to 1933 was four years after the obligation founded upon a writing arose, within which to commence an action to recover a deficiency judgment, when the sale of the property given as security for the payment of the promissory note, upon which the deficiency judgment is sought, was held prior to the enactment of any moratorium legislation, which permitted the trustor either directly or indirectly to obtain a delay in the sale of the security which he had given?

This question must be answered in the affirmative. Prior to 1933 section 337, subdivision 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided that a liability founded upon an instrument in writing must be commenced within four years after the obligation arose.

Section 19 of the 1935 Moratorium Act, supra, read as follows:

"19. Statutes of limitations. Whenever the time within which an action may be commenced upon any obligation founded upon a written instrument secured by mortgage, deed of trust or contract of purchase, or founded upon any guarantee of such obligation or any contract of suretyship therefor or any indorsement of such instrument, would expire by virtue by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or by virtue of the provisions of Chapter I, Statutes of Extra Session of 1934, or by virtue of the provisions of Chapter VII, Statutes of 1935, or any other provision of law, during the period commencing with the effective date of this act and ending on February 1, 1937, such time is hereby extended so as not to expire until the first day of July, 1937."

The first Moratorium Act of 1937, supra, amended section 19 of the 1935 act to extend the time within which an action could be commenced upon an obligation described in such section until October 1, 1937. The second Moratorium Act of 1937 amended section 19 of the 1935 and prior 1937 Moratorium Act to extend the time within which to bring an action upon an obligation described in such section until July 1, 1939, and the 1939 Moratorium Act, supra, by section 20 thereof extended the time within which to bring an action founded upon an obligation described in section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure until the first day of October, 1941.

[1, 2] The law in California is established that (1) an action to recover a deficiency judgment founded upon a trust deed after sale of the security is an action "founded" upon a deed of trust and that such action is included among those described in the various Moratorium Acts, supra (Everts v. Newhouse, Inc., Ltd., 28 Cal.App.2d 407, 409, 82 P.2d 703); and (2) if the time for commencing of an action for a deficiency judgment has not expired when the Moratorium Acts, supra, were adopted, such action may be commenced within the extended time stated in such acts (Bakersfield, etc., Co. v. McAlpine, etc., Co., 26 Cal.App.2d 444, 450, 79 P.2d 410).

[3] Applying to the facts of the instant case the Moratorium provisions and the rules of law above stated, we find that section 19 of the 1935 Moratorium Act applied to actions such as the one here involved founded upon a deed of trust and that the time within which plaintiff might originally have commenced his action was March 12, 1936. This time was extended by the various Moratorium Acts, supra, to October 1, 1941. Hence, since the present action was commenced on January 25, 1940, it was not barred by the provisions of section 337, subdivision 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[4, 5] There is no merit in defendants' contention that the act did not extend plaintiff's time, since he was the assignee of the original obligation, which obligation was for a deficiency judgment on the promissory note, in view of the second rule of law stated above; nor is there any merit in defendants' contention that the Moratorium Acts were not available to the obligor June 15, 1933, the date of the sale under the powers conferred by the trust deed. It was within the power of the legislature to extend the time within which an action might be filed without making it dependent upon a privilege extended to the obligor (Bakersfield, etc., Co. v. McAlpine, etc., Co., supra, 26 Cal.App.2d page 446, 79 P.2d 410.)

For the foregoing reasons the order is reversed with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer and allow defendants a reasonable time within which to file an answer if they be so advised.

WOOD, J., concurred.

MOORE, P. J., deeming himself disqualified, does not participate in the consideration or decision of this case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by Mike Coviello against the Moco Fruit Company, Incorporated, M. P. Mosesian and others, wherein plaintiff obtained a money judgment. The defendant Mosesian obtained an ex parte order crediting the amount of two drafts upon the money judgment in accordance with a written stipulation whereby the drafts were delivered to plaintiff's attorney for collection. The drafts were not collected, and the Superior Court upon plaintiff's motion set aside the ex parte order. Affirmed.

A. P. Coviello, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KLETTE, Justice pro tem.

A money judgment was obtained in this action by Mike Coviello, plaintiff and respondent, against defendant and appellant, M. P. Mosesian, and others. On January 5, 1940, the following written stipulation was entered into:

"It is hereby stipulated that A. P. Coviello, attorney for Mike Coviello, may take two drafts, Nos. 1057 and 1052, in the respective sums of $466.80 and $320.00, drawn against M. Antonellie on the California Bank, 16-161, for collection and the proceeds to be credited on account of the judgment against M. P. Mosesian in the case of Coviello v. P. M. (M. P.) Mosesian, et al., Superior Court, Tulare County No. 25754. Said drafts are to be collected for their amounts or in lieu thereof the full amounts of same will be credited against judgment. In the event said drafts are not collected within ten days from date hereof, they will be returned to M. P. Mosesian, 1301 Pacific Southwest Bldg., Fresno, or said drafts may be retained by A. P. Coviello provided they are credited at that time on the judgment as aforesaid. In the event that said drafts are collected no charges will be made for the collection of same."

The two drafts mentioned in the stipulation, not having been returned to appellant within ten days, he, on January 25, 1940, made an ex parte motion, to have the amount of these two drafts credited upon the judgment. This motion was granted by the court. Plaintiff and respondent thereupon made a motion, based upon affidavit, to set aside this order so made on January 25, 1940. The latter motion was heard on February 19, 1940, and granted. This appeal is taken by defendant Mosesian from that order.

[1] Where a trial court rules upon a motion, the Appellate Court can only pass upon the question as to whether it has abused its discretion. Wilder v. Wilder, 214 Cal. 783, 7 P.2d 1032; Lent v. H. C. Morris Co., 25 Cal.App.2d 305, 77 P.2d 301.

The only question, therefore, before this court is whether the trial court did abuse its discretion in granting the motion setting aside its order of January 25, 1940.

The stipulation was apparently intended to cover four contingencies. First, the drafts were turned over "for collection and the proceeds to be credited on account of the judgment". Collection not having been made, the court is not now concerned with this clause. Second, "Said drafts are to be collected for their amounts or in lieu thereof the full amounts of same will be credited against judgment". This clause appears to be inconsistent with the third clause, which provides, "In the event said drafts are not collected within ten days from date thereof, they will be returned". Does the second clause mean that in any event, whether the drafts were collected or not, their amounts were to be credited on the judgment? If so, why were they not credited at the time the stipulation was made? And were they to be returned under the third clause, even though credited on the judgment? Or did the second clause mean that if they were collected by discounting them, the full amount of the drafts was to be credited on the judgment?

[2] It will be noted that the third clause does not state when the drafts were to be returned. The courts of California have repeatedly held that where no time is specified for the doing of an act, it may be done within a reasonable time. No citation of authorities is necessary on this point. What is a reasonable time is dependent upon the surrounding circumstances.

The fourth clause provides, "Or said drafts may be retained by A. P. Coviello provided they are credited at that time on the judgment as aforesaid". Do the words "at that time" relate to the end of the ten-day period, or do they relate to the time when respondent might decide to retain them?

In interpreting the stipulation, and in passing upon the motion, the court had these facts before it: That one of the drafts was dated one month, and the other, five weeks before the date of the stipulation, and the endorsement thereon showed that they had been presented to the bank for payment, before the stipulation was made, and that payment had not been made; that after respondent received them, he had tried to collect them, and failed; that the drawer of the drafts had claims of approximately $6,000 pending against him in the agricultural commissioner's office of the state of California; that respondent, on January 18, 1940, attempted, through another attorney, to return the drafts to appellant, but failed, because of the sickness of the attorney; that when the affidavit was filed, on February 3, 1940, which was the basis of the motion appealed from, the two drafts were attached thereto, with a stipulation that they be released to appellant.

[3] All of these matters contained in the stipulation, called for construction and interpretation by the lower court, and it is a well-established principle of law, that when the construction given an instrument by the trial court appears to be reasonable, and consistent with the intent of the parties making it, courts of appellate jurisdiction will not substitute another interpretation, even though it seems equally tenable. Estate of Bourn, 25 Cal.App.2d 590, 78 P.2d 193; Estate of Mallon, 34 Cal.App.2d 147, 93 P.2d 245.

[4] The trial court being charged with the duty of construing this stipulation, and the construction given, appearing to this court to be reasonable, and consistent with the intent of the parties making it, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in granting the motion appealed from. To have permitted this credit to stand would have meant a credit on the judgment for money never received. No one has been prejudiced or injured, the parties have been restored to their original positions, and substantial justice has been done.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

3. Workmen's compensation ⇐1953

Where, on former appeal, District Court of Appeal determined that evidence supported finding of Industrial Accident Commission on merits that miner died as result of silicosis and also that the commission was without jurisdiction to annul award on ground that claim was barred by statute of limitations, and where no materially different evidence was produced at second hearing, conclusions reached by District Court of Appeal on first appeal were the "law of case" both on the merits and statute of limitations. St.1937, p. 294 et seq., § 5400 et seq.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇐52

The workmen's compensation law is to be liberally construed in favor of the employee and not the employer. St.1937, p. 294 et seq., § 5400 et seq.

5. Workmen's compensation ⇐1953

Where, under the law of case, question of liability in workmen's compensation proceeding could not be further litigated, award to which petitioners were entitled under the law of the case could not be denied because petitioners refused to permit an autopsy. St.1937, p. 300, § 5707.

6. Workmen's compensation ⇐1953

Where it was contended that workmen's compensation claimants were not entitled to recover because they refused to permit an autopsy, but under law of case question of liability could not be further litigated, it was to be presumed that, on first hearing, the Industrial Accident Commission was aware of statutory presumption, arising from refusal to permit an autopsy, that death was not due to causes entitling claimants to an award, and that the commission decided that there was sufficient evidence to rebut such presumption. St.1937, p. 300, § 5707.

Petitioners seek to amend the award of the Industrial Accident Commission that they take nothing by reason of their claim for benefits based on the death of Murdoch D. Morrison.

Proceeding by Charlotte S. Morrison and others to amend an award of the Industrial Accident Commission that petitioners take nothing by reason of their claim for benefits based on death of Murdoch D. Morrison.

Award annulled with directions to make another and further award for payment to petitioners of such benefits as are fixed by law.

TUTTLE, Justice.

This action has been pending either in the courts or before the Industrial Accident Commission for some five years. Three referees of the commission each heard a portion of the testimony. Petitioners now seek to annul the second award of the commission, which was to the effect that they take nothing by reason of their claim for benefits based on the death of Murdoch D. Morrison.

Petitioner Charlotte S. Morrison is the wife of, and the other three petitioners are the dependent minor children of Morrison. The latter was a miner who had, up to a year before he died, worked in the mine of respondent mining company, and was so employed for some seven years. His death was due to silicosis (miner's consumption), according to the first findings made by the commission and to the decision of this court which will hereafter be discussed. His widow, on May 22, 1936, filed a claim for benefits on behalf of herself and children. Respondent, State Compensation and Insurance Fund, refused to pay the benefits or any part thereof. A number of hearings were had, and numerous witnesses were examined on both sides. All the testimony bore upon the merits of the case which involved the cause of death. This necessarily involved the question as to when the injury occurred, in order to determine the issue of the statute of limitations. Petitioners contended that silicosis, contracted while working in the mine, led to the development of tuberculosis, from which, admittedly, death ensued. These respondents contended, and sought to prove, that while a certain amount of silicosis was present in the lungs of deceased, it was not the cause of death, and that the sole cause of death was tuberculosis, which did not arise from employment in respondent mine. They also contended that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Upon the denial of any relief to respondents, the latter filed a petition in this court seeking to annul the award. After a full consideration of all the evidence, we held that the finding of the commission on the merits, to the effect that Morrison died from an occupational disease which was incurred in the course of his employment, was based upon substantial evidence, and that we were bound thereby. Morrison v. Industrial Accident Commission, 29 Cal.App.2d 528-532, 85 P. 2d 186. As to the statute of limitations, we held that the commission was without jurisdiction to annul the award upon that ground.

[1] Silicosis is an occupational disease, and is thus briefly described in the case of Marsh v. Industrial Accident Commission, 217 Cal. 338, 340, 18 P.2d 933, 934, 86 A.L. R. 563: "From the evidence it appears that, by reason of conditions incident to their employment, the three men named became affected with an occupational disease, such as is frequently contracted by miners working in tunnels, and which is medically known as pneumonoconiosis silicosis, or more simply as pneumoconiosis silicosis, a term denoting a disease of the lungs due to silica dust, and sometimes called merely silicosis."

[2] It is contended by petitioners that the law of the case has been established by the opinion of this court in the prior review of the same case, mentioned above. We believe that such contention is sound, and that it should be upheld. In a very comprehensive note covering this question, found in 6 A. & E. Ann.Cas. page 793, the rule is thus stated: "While a decision upon the sufficiency of the evidence on a former appeal is the law of the case, it is the law of the case and conclusive upon a subsequent appeal only when the evidence disclosed by the record is substantially the same upon both appeals. When the evidence presented upon the second appeal is materially different from that previously passed upon, the decision upon the first appeal is not conclusive, the rule of the law of the case having no application. * * * But the evidence upon the second trial must have been substantially different and controlling, in its character. New evidence appearing in the record on the second appeal which does not change the substantial features or merits of the controversy, will not alter the rule, so that, under such circumstances, the conclusion reached by the court upon the first appeal will be regarded as conclusive of the question. * * * If the additional evidence is merely cumulative, the doctrine of the law of the case is applicable."

In the case of Sheets v. Southern Pac. Co., 1 Cal.2d 408, 35 P.2d 121, there were two trials and two appeals. In the first opinion the Supreme Court held that the evidence in respect to contributory negligence justified a submission of that issue to the jury. On the second appeal, defendant again attempted to have the same question adjudicated. The court held that the decision on the first appeal was the law of the case, and the only question was whether the evidence at the second trial was substantially different from that presented in the first. Defendant there pointed out some differences, but the court held that they were not substantial in character, and that the question could not be raised a second time. We come to that same question here, and it is urged by petitioners that the evidence as disclosed by the record is substantially the same on both appeals. Respondents, in answer to this contention, throw no light whatever upon it. They make no attempt whatever to point out any difference between the two records. However, we have gone over both records, and are satisfied that the second is not substantially different from the first. The following witnesses testified at the second hearing: Bennett, Finn, Dr. Pierson, Dr. Hardie, Charlotte S. Morrison (one of the petitioners), Dr. Padgett, and Mrs. Griffin. The first five gave their testimony upon the first hearing. There is much cumulative testimony given by some of them at the second trial, but the essential facts and ultimate conclusions given by each are substantially the same in each instance. We come now to the two witnesses who testified at the last hearing only. Dr. Padgett merely identified an X-ray negative, a matter concerning which there was no dispute. Mrs. Griffin testified concerning the manner in which the hospital of Dr. Peers was conducted. Her testimony sheds no light upon the question involved, while neither of the last two witnesses was called at the first hearing, their testimony upon the second trial is so inconsequential in respect to the issues, that it can be entirely disregarded.

In answer to the foregoing, respondents contend that the original adjudication by the commission was not upon the merits, but applied solely to the statute of limitations. We are unable to come to that conclusion, and are of the opinion that all the questions here involved were finally and definitely determined by the findings made at the conclusion of the first trial, which read as follows: "The employee became disabled in August, 1934, from a condition which he was advised by a physician was the result of his occupation as a miner. His application was not filed until October 18, 1935, more than six months thereafter, and the claim is barred, therefore, by the provisions of Chapter 2, Part 4, Division 4, § 5400 et seq., of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 294 et seq., formerly Section 11, of Chapter 586, page 841, of the Laws of 1917. The claim of the applicant herein filed May 22, 1936, is likewise barred by the foregoing provisions."

The question thus raised was considered and disposed of by this court in the former appeal. We there said; in 29 Cal.App.2d page 532, 85 P.2d page 189: "We are of the opinion there is substantial evidence that [Mr. Morrison] died as a result of silicosis, an occupational disease which was incurred in the course of his employment as a miner in The Original Sixteen to One Mine, and that, as a reasonable person, he possessed knowledge or information that he had a compensable disability on that account in February, 1935. We are, therefore, bound by the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission in that regard." (Italics ours.)

[3] We there analyzed all the evidence in order to reach the conclusion mentioned. The entire record of the first trial indicates clearly that the commission considered the merits of the case on trial, instead of the sole issue of the statute of limitations. Numerous witnesses were examined, all upon the merits, and their testimony is spread over some three hundred and twenty-one pages of the transcript. It would seem that respondents then took the view that in order to decide the question of the statute of limitations, it was also necessary to adjudicate the merits of the claim. This was practically admitted by them when, in their answer on the first hearing, they set forth a summary of all the evidence to sustain their contention that the claim was not filed in time. All of the foregoing facts should be considered in deciding the question of the extent of the first findings. In our opinion they should be construed to the effect that, while petitioners were entitled to compensation, their claim came too late. This would be entirely consistent. If petitioners had no valid claim, an adjudication of the question of the statute of limitations would be entirely unnecessary. It thus appears not only that the former decision of this court held that the merits of the case were tried and decided, but a reasonable construction of the prior findings, based upon the surrounding circumstances and the language used, indicates that respondent commission intended to, and did, decide the case on its merits. We are therefore of the opinion that no materially different evidence was produced at the second hearing, and that the conclusions reached by this court upon the first appeal are the law of the case upon both the merits and the statute of limitations.

Concluding, we might add that the evidence in favor of petitioners is of a very strong and convincing character. Dr. Hardie was a resident of the small town where the mine is situated, during the entire time that the deceased was working. He testified that in 1927, Morrison was a large man, in good health, weighing some two hundred pounds. Deceased worked in said mine practically the entire time, until he was compelled to cease. That was in 1935. Dr. Hardie was his personal physician during all of said time. He testified, in effect, that he saw the silicosis gradually developing until the man could no longer work. No doctor who testified for respondents ever saw or examined the deceased when he started work, nor examined him until he had ceased to work and was totally disabled. The chief witness for respondents, Dr. Pierson, never saw the deceased. The evidence bearing upon the presence of dust in the mine is conflicting. All doctors, however, agree that deceased had silicosis. The conflict is merely upon the question of the degree. There remains the undisputed fact that deceased was a well and strong man when he started to work in the mine; that he died of tuberculosis, and that there was evidence of some silicosis, which is commonly called "miner's consumption".

[4] If we are to construe the Workmen's Compensation law liberally, as we are enjoined by law to do, and as respondents frequently request us to do, this appears to be at least one situation where the rule should be invoked. The liberality should be extended to the employee, and not the employer.

[5, 6] It is finally contended that petitioners cannot recover because they refused to permit an autopsy. It is provided in section 5707 (19[e], St.1917, p. 849), of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 300, that if an autopsy is refused, "it shall be a disputable presumption that the injury or death was not due to causes entitling the claimants to benefits under this act". We have pointed out that under the law of the case the question of liability cannot be further litigated. This applies equally to the question thus raised. It must be presumed that the commission was aware of the presumption on the first hearing, and that they decided that there was sufficient evidence to rebut it.

It follows that the award under attack here must be annulled, and it is so ordered. Respondent Commission is ordered to make another and further award for the payment to petitioners of such benefits as are fixed by law.

PEOPLE v. JOHNSON.
No. Cr. A 1702.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

Jan. 30, 1941.

1. Master and servant ⇐69

Order of Industrial Welfare Commission relating to unclassified occupations was void because it showed on its face that the commission in making order disregarded the directions of the legislature by lumping together for consideration a miscellany of unspecified, unsegregated industries, whereas its statutory authority required it to hear and determine matters relating to each separate industry separately. St.1913, p. 633, §§ 3, 4, and page 634, §§ 5, 6, as amended by St. 1921, p. 379.

2. Master and servant ⇐69

Statute authorizing fixing by Industrial Welfare Commission of minimum wages for women and minors employed in industry intended that the wages to women and minors in all industries should be adequate to the specified purposes, but reposed no arbitrary discretion in the commission whose duty it is to see that all wages meet the statutory requirement. St.1913, p. 633, §§ 3, 4, and page 634, §§ 5, 6, as amended by St.1921, p. 379.

3. Master and servant ⇐69

Statute authorizing fixing by Industrial Welfare Commission of minimum wages for women and minors employed in industry, providing that notice of hearing by commission shall be given by advertisement in at least one newspaper published in 12 specified cities in the state, impliedly required that purpose of the hearing should be stated in the notice. St.1913, p. 634, § 6, as amended by St.1921, p. 379.

4. Master and servant ⇐69

Notice that purpose of hearing by welfare commission was to rescind, amend, or alter orders relating to "unclassified occupations" and that minimum wages paid to women and minors would be considered was too vague and uncertain to support any hearing or order, since "unclassified" merely means not classified and "classified" means grouped in classes, and the term "unclassified occupations" standing alone would have little, if any, significance as a means of giving notice. SCHAUER, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Leo Freund, Judge.

Sever A. Johnson was convicted on three counts of paying women employees a wage less than the minimum wage fixed by an order of the Industrial Welfare Commission, and he appeals.

SHAW, Presiding Judge.

[1] Defendant was charged in three counts with paying to women employees a wage less than the minimum wage fixed by an order of the Industrial Welfare Commission, was found guilty on all three counts, sentenced and appeals from the judgments. The complaint in each case alleged that he was "an employer of women in an unclassified occupation in the food packing industry". In support of the charges the People introduced in evidence order No. 10A, made by the Industrial Welfare Commission on the 8th day of June, 1923, relating to "unclassified occupations". We hold this order void because it shows on its face that the commission, in making it, disregarded the directions of the legislature by lumping together for consideration and decision a miscellany of unspecified, unsegregated industries whereas its statutory authority required it to hear and determine matters relating to each separate industry separately.

The order just referred to was made under the provisions of an act authorizing the fixing of minimum wages for women and minors employed in industry. Stats. 1913, p. 632, as amended. No question is raised as to the validity of this act, and as it is substantially like that involved in West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 1936, 300 U.S. 379, 57 S.Ct. 578, 81 L.Ed. 703, 108 A.L.R. 1330, it is undoubtedly valid. It has now been substantially embodied in sections 70–73 and 1171–1203 of the Labor Code enacted in 1937 (Stats.1937, pp. 185–329).

This statute, at the time the order above mentioned was made, provided for an Industrial Welfare Commission, imposed upon it a duty "to ascertain the wages paid, the hours and conditions of labor and employment in the various occupations, trades, and industries in which women and minors are employed in the State of California, and to make investigations into the comfort, health, safety and welfare of such women and minors", Section 3 as originally enacted, Stats.1913, p. 633, and directed that "If, after investigation, the commission is of the opinion that, in any occupation, trade, or industry, the wages paid to women and minors are inadequate to supply the cost of proper living, * * * the commission shall call a conference, hereinafter called 'wage board,' composed of an equal number of representatives of employers and employees in the occupation, trade, or industry in question", which board was to investigate the matter and make a report to the commission and whose proceedings and deliberations could be used as evidence in any proceedings before the commission. Section 5, as amended by Stats.1921, p. 379. At any hearing held by the commission, employers, employees and interested persons might appear and give testimony. Section 4 as originally enacted, Stats.1913, p. 633. The act also provided: "The commission shall have further power after a public hearing had upon its own motion or upon petition, to fix: 1. A minimum wage to be paid to women and minors engaged in any occupation, trade or industry in this state, which shall not be less than a wage adequate to supply to such women and minors the necessary cost of proper living and to maintain the health and welfare of such women and minors." Section 6, as amended by Stats.1921, p. 379. It also provided that the commission should give public notice by publication of the time, place and purpose of such hearing, and that after such hearing it might make an order "specifying the minimum wage for women or minors in the occupation in question", and directed the commission to mail "so far as practicable, to each employer in the occupation in question" a copy of the order so made. Section 6, as amended in 1921.

From all these provisions we conclude that by the statute the commission was required to consider and deal with each separate industry separately, and that a blanket order applicable to unspecified, unsegregated industries, linked together merely for the purposes of the order, was not authorized. The order must specify the minimum wage for "the occupation in question", and notice of it must be sent to each employer in "the occupation in question". Before making such order the commission must give notice of a hearing, the purpose of which hearing would be to fix a minimum wage "in any occupation, trade or industry". The wage board provided for in section 5 must contain representatives "in the occupation, trade or industry in question"; and without deciding that the appointment of such a board was a necessary prerequisite of an order fixing minimum wages we can see that at least the statute contemplated such board as a possibility in every case. Manifestly these provisions could not be complied with unless there were some particular occupation, etc. "in question", that is, under investigation, in each case. Of course, we do not mean to say that in making orders a separate document must be written for each industry. No doubt, after proper investigation and consideration separately of several industries the commission might write its orders in regard thereto in one document.

We do not intend by what we have just said to draw any hard and fast line setting limits on what might be regarded as a single industry or occupation and dealt with as such by the Industrial Welfare Commission. Undoubtedly that commission had a considerable discretion in that respect, and its acts in treating somewhat differing forms of business activity as in reality allied and constituting a single industry or occupation, or in segregating a general industry into smaller parts for separate consideration, must be upheld so long as a substantial and reasonable basis therefor appears; but it could not, under the law as written, yoke together for consideration industries belonging to entirely different genera. To illustrate by cases mentioned in argument, it would not be necessary for the commission, in dealing with the canning of fruit, to hold separate hearings for each kind of fruit that may be canned; but bootblacking and taxi dancing are obviously unrelated occupations, not to be considered conjointly in one hearing by the commission. Yet the two last mentioned are undoubtedly, as the argument suggests, embraced within the terms of the order here in question.

[2] We see nothing in our interpretation of the statute which would render it invalid, and hence there is no occasion to invoke the rule for construing a statute so as to make it valid rather than invalid. It seems to be feared by plaintiff that upon our construction of the statute the commission could make arbitrary discriminations, imposing minimum wage and other regulations on some industries or occupations and omitting them from others, according to the dictates of whim or caprice. This contention does not take into consideration the above mentioned parts of the statute which laid upon the commission the duty "to ascertain the wages paid * * * in the various occupations, trades, and industries in which women and minors are employed", provided that whenever, after investigation, it was of the opinion that in any occupation, trade or industry the wages paid to women and minors were inadequate for the purposes specified, it should appoint a wage board, and empowered it to fix a minimum wage adequate for those purposes. Undoubtedly the purpose of the legislature here was that the wages paid to women and minors in all industries should be adequate to the specified purposes. That result was to be accomplished by means of the industrial welfare commission. If wages paid in any industry already met the standard thus prescribed, nothing was to be or needed to be done about it; if they did not it was the duty of the commission to bring such wages up to standard by a proper order. Here was no arbitrary discretion reposed in the commission; its duty was to see that all wages should meet the statutory requirement. See Associated Industries v. Industrial Welfare Comm., 1939, 185 Okl. 177, 90 P.2d 899, 906, where a like construction was put upon a substantially identical statute.

Order No. 10A, on which this prosecution is based, manifestly is not such an order as is authorized by the statute. By its terms it purports to fix the minimum wage for women and minors "in any unclassified occupation" and defines the term "unclassified occupations" to mean "all employment not classified under the mercantile, manufacturing, millinery, hotel and restaurant, laundry and dry cleaning, fruit and vegetable canning, fruit and vegetable packing, fish canning, and telephone and telegraph industries, office or professional occupations, domestic labor, or the harvesting, curing or drying of any variety of fruit or vegetables, and the cracking and sorting of nuts." No particular industry is here "in question", or is affected by this order. It is plainly intended to be a catch-all for all sorts of industries not among those described, no matter how diverse in character or location such industries might be, or what different matters might be deserving of consideration in fixing the minimum wage. It is no better in principle than would be an omnibus order covering all industries. The above mentioned requirements of the statute could not be complied with in connection with such an order, and it must be regarded as beyond the power of the commission.

[3, 4] In addition to the defects in Order No. 10A itself, it appears that the notice given of the hearing required before the order could be made was insufficient. Besides a certified copy of the order, the people introduced in evidence certified copies of the affidavits of publication of a notice of hearing. Section 6 of the statute, as amended in 1921, required that notice of such a hearing be given "by advertisement in at least one newspaper published in each of the cities of" (enumerating 12 cities in the state). While the statute did not expressly require this notice to state the purpose of the hearing, it must be construed to have that effect by implication. Section 6 required the commission to mail "a copy of said notice" to any employer filing "a written request for such notice of such hearing and the purpose thereof". This mailing would not satisfy the request unless the purpose were stated in the notice, and such statement would also be necessary to satisfy constitutional requirements discussed in a later part of this opinion. The affidavits mentioned show publication of a notice in newspapers corresponding in number and location to this requirement, but its contents were insufficient. It stated the purpose of the hearing thus: "for the purpose of rescinding, amending or altering Orders [here follows a list of several orders by number, year and industry, covered, including] * * * Number 10, amended 1920, Unclassified Occupations". Other parts of the notice indicated that as to each industry listed "minimum wages to be paid to women and minors" would be considered. No further description of "Unclassified Occupations" appeared, but the list of other occupations set forth included many—not all—of those excluded from that category by the definition contained in Order No. 10A and above quoted. This notice, in so far as it related to "unclassified occupations" was too vague and uncertain to support any hearing or order. No attempt was made in the notice, as there was in the order, to fortify that term by any definition. According to Webster's New International Dictionary, "unclassified" means merely "not classified", and "classified" means "grouped in classes". By these definitions the term "unclassified occupations", standing alone, would have little, if any, significance as a means of giving notice. It leaves unanswered the questions, "by what rule of classification?", "when?" and "by whom?", as well as others. Nor is it helped by its context, whose only possible suggestion would be that the occupations specifically listed in the notice were "classified" and all others were "unclassified". If any reader of the notice conceived that idea he speedily discovered himself in error when he read the order, for at least two occupations listed in the notice were covered by the order as "unclassified" and several occupations not listed in the notice could not be regarded as "unclassified" according to the definition found in the order.

[5, 6] Without an opportunity for the interested parties to be heard, in a matter of this kind, where the legislature has committed to a special tribunal the fixing of wages, the resulting order would be invalid for want of due process of law. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Industrial Comm., D.C.1938, 24 F.Supp. 370 and cases there cited; McGrew v. Industrial Comm., 1938, 96 Utah 203, 85 P.2d 608, 617. The provision for the hearing and for notice thereof, being a part of the statutory embodiment of due process, must be regarded as mandatory, for, even though some other form of hearing or some different notice might have been regarded as sufficient, the statute has not so declared, and compliance must be had with what has been, not merely what might have been, provided. See O. T. Johnson Corp. v. City of Los Angeles, 1926, 198 Cal. 308, 316, 317, 245 P. 164; Beck v. Ransome-Crummey Co., 1919, 42 Cal.App. 674, 679, 681, 184 P. 431; Overell v. Overell, 1937, 18 Cal.App.2d 499, 502, 64 P.2d 483; Bandini Estate Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 1938, 28 Cal.App.2d 224, 229, 230, 82 P.2d 185.

The judgments are reversed and the cause is remanded to the Municipal Court for a new trial.

BISHOP, Judge.

I concur. Order numbered 10A is the only one claimed by the People to govern this case. That this order was intended to be what the presiding judge in the majority opinion has characterized it as being, that is, a "catch-all", appears to me to be plain from the fact that in its definition of what the commission meant order 10A to cover it excluded, seriatim, eight industries for which special orders were made in 1923, a ninth industry which had been covered by an order made in 1920, and four other industries for which, it is reasonable to assume, the commission intended at the time it adopted order 10A to make special orders after proceeding in the manner prescribed by the statute. Deliberately, the Industrial Welfare Commission in 1923 followed the statute in a number of cases, but instead of completing their task in the manner authorized attempted to discharge their duty by a blanket order. If this blanket leaves the women of some industries in the cold it is a condition which may readily be remedied by the present commission following the present statute or by the enactment of a different statute; it is not to be remedied by our ignoring the requirements of the statute.

The Legislature, in enacting Probate Code provision relating to rights of children and grandchildren of testator who does not mention them in his will, intended to change the pre-existing law and to provide that if surviving issue of testator's child, who predeceases testator, is not provided for by will, such issue shall succeed to a share of the estate by intestate succession the same as if no will had been made, regardless of whether the death of the testator's child occurs before or after execution of the will, and whether the issue of the child is born before or after execution of the will. Civ.Code, § 3542.

5. Descent and distribution ⇐47(3)

Where testator's will devised testator's separate property in equal shares to his wife and his son, or the survivor of them, and no provision was made for grandson who was born after execution of will which did not disclose an intentional omission of grandson, and testator's son predeceased the testator whose wife survived him, the grandson was entitled to one-half of the testator's estate by intestate succession the same as if no will had been made. Probate Code, §§ 90, 221.

6. Descent and distribution ⇐47(2)

Where will devised testator's property in equal shares to his wife and son or the survivor of them, the testator intended to substitute his wife as sole legatee in event of death of his son, which precluded the surviving child of the son who predeceased testator from taking any portion of the estate under provision of Probate Code relating to death of a devisee during lifetime of testator. Probate Code, § 92.

7. Descent and distribution ⇐47(1)

If surviving child of testator's son, who was a legatee under testator's will but predeceased testator, could under terms of will have succeeded to share of estate devised to the son, pursuant to Probate Code provision relating to death of a devisee during testator's lifetime, the child would be barred from sharing in the testator's estate as a pretermitted heir under Probate Code provision relating to rights of children and grandchildren who are not mentioned in testator's will. Probate Code, §§ 90, 92.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Hilliard Comstock, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Rush B. Todd, deceased, the Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association, executor. From a decree of final distribution which distributed the entire estate of deceased to his surviving wife, Inez Todd, Ridgeway Addison Todd, a minor, appeals.

Reversed, with direction to enter a decree in accordance with opinion.

For prior opinion, see 99 P.2d 690.

Henry E. Monroe and Julia M. Easley, both of San Francisco, and Geary & Geary and C. J. Trauzer, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Grove J. Fink and Garton D. Keyston, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CARTER, Justice.

This is an appeal from a decree of final distribution, which distributed the entire estate of Rush B. Todd, deceased, to his surviving wife, Inez Todd, one of respondents herein. The whole of said estate was decedent's separate property. The appellant is Ridgeway Addison Todd, a minor, the grandson of the decedent and being the son of Addison Todd, the son of decedent. Addison Todd died prior to the death of decedent. The other respondent is the executor of the estate.

The facts are undisputed. The decedent made his will on February 17, 1925, in which it was provided in part: "Paragraph Third: I hereby declare that I am married, that my wife's name is Inez Todd, and that I have one child living, to-wit, a son, Addison Todd. Paragraph Fifth: I hereby give, devise and bequeath all of my estate, * * * equally, share and share alike, to my said wife, Inez Todd, and my said son, Addison Todd, or to the survivor of them." No mention of appellant, decedent's grandson, was made in the will, he was not provided for by settlement or advancement; and it does not appear from the will that the omission was intentional.

Appellant, grandson of decedent, was born May 7, 1931. Addison Todd, decedent's son, died on September 28, 1935, and left appellant surviving him as his sole issue. Decedent died on May 16, 1936. The decree of distribution distributed the decedent's entire estate to Inez Todd, his surviving wife.

Appellant urges as grounds for reversal of the decree that appellant should take one-half of the estate by virtue of section 90 of the Probate Code, and that even if he cannot prevail on that basis he is entitled to one-half the estate by reason of the death of his father, one of the legatees in the will, prior to decedent's death, pursuant to section 92 of the Probate Code.

It is clear that if appellant comes within the terms of section 90 of the Probate Code, he is entitled to disregard the will and receive the portion of the estate allowed to him under the laws of intestate succession, which in the instant case is one-half of decedent's property inasmuch as it was separate property and decedent's wife survived him. Prob.Code, secs. 90 and 221.

Prior to the adoption of section 90 of the Probate Code in 1931, the law concerning pretermitted heirs was embodied in sections 1306, 1307, 1308 and 1309 of the Civil Code. Section 1306 provided for inheritance by a child born after the will and provided in part: "Whenever a testator has a child born after the making of his will, either in his lifetime or after his death, and dies leaving such child unprovided for by any settlement, and neither provided for nor in any way mentioned in his will, the child succeeds to the same portion of the testator's * * * property that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate." Section 1308 related to the sources from which a pretermitted heir's share should come. This is now stated in section 91 of the Probate Code. Section 1309 provided that the pretermitted heir take no share if he had an equal share by advancement. This is now embraced in section 90 of the Probate Code. The portion of section 1307 which is here particularly pertinent read: "When any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child, or the issue of such child, has the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate, and succeeds thereto as provided in the preceding section [1306]. * * *" Section 1307 was first construed in In re Barter's Estate, 86 Cal. 441, 25 P. 15, and it was there held that the failure of the testator to provide for his grandchild did not make such grandchild a pretermitted heir, where the grandchild's mother was alive at the time the will was made but died prior to the death of the testator. The decision was properly based on the ground that section 1307 made pretermitted heirs of only those grandchildren who were the issue of a child of the testator dead at the time the will was made. With section 1307 remaining unchanged, the Barter case was considered favorably in Estate of Ross, 140 Cal. 282, 73 P. 976, and Estate of Matthews, 176 Cal. 576, 169 P. 233, although the exact question involved in the Barter case was not in issue in either of those cases.

[1-5] However, in 1931 sections 1306, 1307, 1308 and 1309 of the Civil Code were repealed and section 90 of the Probate Code was adopted and contains additional clauses radically changing those sections in certain respects. Section 90, the law controlling in the instant case, provides in part: "When a testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, whether born before or after the making of the will or before or after the death of the testator, * * * unless it appears from the will that such omission was intentional, such child or such issue succeeds to the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate." The italicized portions are the clauses which did not appear in sections 1306 or 1307 of the Civil Code. We believe it is quite obvious that the legislature intended to change the law and the rule announced in the Barter case to provide that if the issue of a testator's child is not provided for by the will, such issue shall succeed to a share of the estate by intestate succession the same as if no will had been made regardless of whether the testator's child dies before or after the will is made, and whether the issue of the child is born before or after the making of the will, assuming, of course, the testator's child dies before the testator. To determine that no such change was accomplished as contended by respondents, and held by the trial court, would be to render ineffective and practically meaningless the words added by the adoption of section 90. To assume that the change accomplished was limited to grandchildren born after the will was executed but whose parent was dead when the will was made, would be a strained and unreasonable construction. At the best it would make the added words fit only extremely rare instances and would be manifestly unjust as it would confer a right as a pretermitted heir on the child of a testator's son but deny that right to a child of the testator's daughter. This limited application of the added words as interpreted in Estate of Childs, 21 Cal.App.2d 103, 68 P.2d 306, is relied upon by respondents in support of the holding of the trial court. This holding is contrary to the views above expressed. In Estate of Childs, supra, it is stated, at page 105 of 21 Cal. App.2d, at page 307 of 68 P.2d, that the only effect of the added words is: "These words might serve to give protection to a grandchild born after the execution of the will whose parent was dead at the time of its execution." Manifestly, such a child would have received protection even under section 1307 of the Civil Code. Therefore the added words would be meaningless. But assuming such protection did not exist prior to the adoption of section 90 and that the added words gave only such protection, then that protection could never be enjoyed by the issue of a daughter of the testator because if such issue were born after the death of the testator the daughter could not have predeceased the testator, whereas the issue of a testator's son would be protected, but even such issue to come within the protected class would be limited to those born not later than the normal period of gestation after a time just prior to the testator's death, assuming the son died just prior to such death. We cannot believe that the legislature intended to give such a limited effect or make such a discrimination by the added words which is patently unreasonable and unjust. To countenance such a construction would violate the well-settled rules of statutory construction. "Ordinarily, it would seem that any essential change in the phraseology of a statutory provision would indicate an intention on the part of the legislature to change the meaning of such provision rather than to interpret it." Young v. Three For One Oil Royalties, 1 Cal.2d 639, 646, 36 P.2d 1065, 1068. Section 3542 of the Civil Code provides: "Interpretation must be reasonable." It is said in 23 Cal. Jur. 722-3: "'Interpretation must be reasonable.' The code so provides. And it has been decided, not only that the language of a statute must be given a reasonable interpretation, but that every statute as a whole must be so construed, and thus, when opportunity arises, made compatible with common sense and the dictates of justice. In other words, it is the duty of courts not to be ingenious to find ambiguities in statutes because of extraneous matters, but to interpret them in such a manner that they may be free from ambiguity, and to give, if possible, a construction which not only renders them constitutional, but which is consistent with sound sense and wise policy, with a view to promoting justice."

For the foregoing reasons, that part of the decision in Estate of Childs, supra, apparently holding that the protection to pretermitted heirs does not extend to a grandchild where the testator's child did not die until after the execution of the will, is expressly disapproved.

Respondents contend that because section 1306 of the Civil Code did contain the words "Whenever a testator has a child born after the making of his will, either in his lifetime or after his death" the clauses above mentioned appearing in section 90 of the Probate Code were not in fact added. The obvious answer to that proposition is that whereas section 1306 was concerned solely with the protection of an after-born child, that is, a child born after a will is executed, section 90 of the Probate Code provides for not only after-born children, but also the protection of the issue of such children.

Appellant insists that if the above-mentioned proposition is determined adversely to him, he is nevertheless entitled to half the estate under section 92 of the Probate Code, in his capacity as successor of his deceased father who was a legatee under the will. The will devises the estate to respondent, Inez Todd, and the decedent's son, or the survivor of them.

[6, 7] In our opinion it was the testator's intention to substitute respondent Inez Todd as sole legatee under his will in the event of the death of his son, Addison Todd. This would preclude appellant from taking any portion of the estate under section 92 of the Probate Code. However, if appellant could under the terms of the will have succeeded to the share of the estate devised or bequeathed to his father under the provisions of said section 92, he would be barred from sharing in the estate as a pretermitted heir under the provisions of section 90 of said code.

The decree of distribution is reversed with direction to the court below to enter a decree in accordance with the views herein expressed.

We concur: GIBSON, C. J.; SHENK, J.; PETERS, Justice pro tem.; WARD, Justice pro tem.

TRAYNOR, Justice (concurring).

I concur.

Decedent, Rush Todd, disposed of his estate by will as follows: "I hereby give, devise and bequeath all of my estate, * * * equally, share and share alike, to my said wife Inez Todd, and my said son, Addison Todd, or to the survivor of them." In 1931, more than six years after the making of this will, Ridgeway Todd, son of Addison Todd and grandson of the testator, was born. No provision was made for him in the will. Addison Todd died in 1935 leaving his father and his son surviving him. Rush Todd, the testator, died in 1936. The decree of distribution gave the entire estate to Inez Todd, his surviving wife. Ridgeway Todd has appealed from this decree of distribution contending that (1) by virtue of Probate Code section 90 he is a pretermitted heir and therefore entitled to one-half of the estate as his intestate share and (2) Probate Code section 92 entitles him to succeed to his father's share of the estate under the will.

Section 90 of the Probate Code provides: "When a testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, whether born before or after the making of the will or before or after the death of the testator, and such child or issue are unprovided for by any settlement, and have not had an equal proportion of the testator's property bestowed on them by way of advancement, unless it appears from the will that such omission was intentional, such child or such issue succeeds to the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate".

Section 92 of the Probate Code provides: "If a devisee or legatee dies during the lifetime of the testator, the testamentary disposition to him fails, unless an intention appears to substitute another in his place; except that when any estate is devised or bequeathed to any kindred of the testator, and the devisee or legatee dies before the testator, leaving lineal descendants, or is dead at the time the will is executed, but leaves lineal descendants surviving the testator, such descendants take the estate so given by the will in the same manner as the devisee or legatee would have done had he survived the testator".

Section 90 cannot be properly interpreted without taking into account the effect of section 92. In the ordinary situation where a testator is predeceased by his child who leaves a surviving child, the grandchild will succeed to his parent's share under the will by virtue of section 92. If the grandchild has received no express mention in the will may he also be regarded as a pretermitted heir under section 90 with the right to claim his intestate share of the estate in addition to that portion which he takes by virtue of section 92? The majority opinion states that he may not but gives no reason for reaching that conclusion.

A grandchild who will take his predeceased parent's share under a will by virtue of section 92 cannot be a pretermitted heir under section 90. When a testator provides for his child by will with no alternate disposition in the event that the child predeceases him, he has by law also provided for any issue of the child, since the issue will take in the place of the parent under section 92. The testator has not, therefore, omitted to provide for the issue of any deceased child within the meaning of section 90. He has provided for such issue by operation of law; if the testator's child predeceases him, the grandchild will succeed to his parent's share under section 92 and hence cannot be a pretermitted heir under section 90. Thus, suppose a testator provides among other bequests one of $10,000 for his son but makes no mention of a grandson. Suppose further that the son predeceases the testator and that the grandson's intestate share under section 90 would be $100,000. The grandson by virtue of section 92 will take only the $10,000 in place of his father, and not the $100,000 under section 90.

In the present case the question of whether or not the grandson, Richard Todd, is a pretermitted heir under section 90, turns upon the determination of whether or not he succeeds to his parent's share under section 92. The import of section 92 is that if a testator makes a testamentary disposition in favor of his child which fails by virtue of the child's predeceasing the testator, no substitute legatee having been named, the issue of such child will take in place of his parent. If, however, the testator has provided that the property should go to an alternate legatee in such a situation, then such alternate will take the property by virtue of the terms of the will and, there being no lapse of the legacy, the issue of the predeceased child will be able to claim nothing under section 92.

In the present case the testator provided that his estate should go to his wife and his son, or to the survivor. Upon the death of the son therefore the right to receive the entire estate passed to the wife under the terms of the will and the grandson, Ridgeway Todd, cannot claim an interest in the estate under section 92.

The problem remains as to whether he is a pretermitted heir under section 90. If the grandchild of a testator is to take as a pretermitted heir under section 90, the grandchild's parent must have predeceased the testator. It is respondent's contention, however, that the grandchild can only take as a pretermitted heir if his parent was dead at the time the will was made; that if the parent was alive at the time the will was made, the testator's duty was to provide only for his then living child, and that if such child subsequently predeceases the testator, a surviving grandchild is not a pretermitted heir within the meaning of section 90. In re Barter's Estate, 86 Cal. 441, 25 P. 15, construing Civil Code section 1307, now replaced by section 90, held that a grandchild was not rendered pretermitted by the testator's failure to provide for him when his parent was alive at the time the will was made even though the parent predeceased the testator. Section 1307 then provided: "When any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child, or the issue of such child, has the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate * * *." Following the repeal of sections 1306, 1307, 1308 and 1309 of the Civil Code in 1931, however, section 90 of the Probate Code was adopted and the following italicized clause was added: "When a testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, whether born before or after the making of the will or before or after the death of the testator * * * unless it appears from the will that such omission was intentional, such child or such issue succeeds to the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate." Despite its ambiguity, the most reasonable construction to be placed upon this added clause is that the legislature thereby intended to change the rule of the Barter case under former section 1307 and to provide that a grandchild could be pretermitted even though his parent, who subsequently predeceased the testator, was alive at the time of the making of the will. Unless the added clause is so construed it must either be disregarded entirely with respect to grandchildren or limited to situations where the testator's son has died before the making of the will but the son's wife has given birth to a child thereafter. Estate of Childs, 21 Cal.App.2d 103, 68 P.2d 306. Since such a grandchild would have been protected under the old section 1307, it is more reasonable to hold that in permitting the issue of a predeceased child, born before or after the making of the will, to be regarded as pretermitted, the legislature intended to include any child born at any time after the making of the will even though his parent was alive when the will was made. This view is reinforced by the reference in the clause to issue born before or after the death of the testator, which, with respect to grandchildren, would seem designed to cover the situation where a testator's son has predeceased the testator after the making of the will but the son's wife has given birth to a child after the testator's death. The only other possible interpretation with respect to grandchildren would limit the application of this part of the clause to the unusual situation in which the testator's son dies, the testator makes his will, the testator dies, and the son's wife gives birth to a child, all in the order given, within a period of nine months.

In this light Ridgeway Todd must be considered a pretermitted heir under the provision of Probate Code, section 90, and he is therefore entitled to one-half of his grandfather's estate as his intestate share. Prob.Code, sec. 221.

OLIVE PRORATION PROGRAM COMMITTEE FOR OLIVE PRORATION ZONE NO. 1 et al. v. AGRICULTURAL PRORATE COMMISSION et al.

L. A. 17286.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 31, 1941.

1. Judgment ⇐547

Ordinarily, doctrine of "res judicata" cannot be applied to the exercise by administrative bodies of power to make orders.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Judicata".

2. Officers ⇐110

Whether an administrative agency can reverse a particular determination depends on kind of power exercised in making the order and terms of statute under which the power was exercised.

3. Officers ⇐110

The determination of an administrative agency as to existence of a fact or status which is based upon a present or past group of facts cannot thereafter be altered or modified.

4. Judgment ⇐547

Where it is clear that Legislature intended that an administrative agency should exercise a continuing jurisdiction with power to modify or alter its orders to conform to changed conditions, doctrine of "res judicata" is not applicable.

5. Officers ⇐103

Courts usually will deny administrative agency the right to change its determination, in absence of a statutory provision so providing, since all administrative actions must be grounded in statutory authority.

6. Agriculture ⇐2

An order of Agricultural Prorate Commission denying petition to terminate program for the prorated marketing of olives was conclusive under Agricultural Proration Act, and commission had no authority to thereafter rescind its prior order denying petition and enter a new order granting it. St.1933, p. 1969, as amended; St.1935, p. 1540, § 23.

7. Agriculture ⇐2

Where Agricultural Prorate Commission called a hearing on a petition to terminate the program for the prorated marketing of olives and thereafter entered an order denying the petition, a redetermination by the commission without notice to parties, based on a field survey and report of Department of Finance submitted after entry of order did not meet statutory requirement of a "hearing". St.1933, p. 1969, as amended; St.1935, p. 1540, § 23.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Hearing".

8. Officers ⇐110

Only evidence which opposite party has an opportunity to refute at a hearing can be relied upon as a basis of a finding of an administrative agency.

9. Agriculture ⇐2

Act of Agricultural Prorate Commission, in considering field survey and report of Department of Finance received after a hearing on petition to terminate program for the prorated marketing of olives, was not justified on ground that counsel for certain of parties stipulated as to use of field survey and report, where it did not appear that counsel were authorized to bind all parties appearing at the hearing, and further that stipulation did not purport to authorize a later field survey and report. St.1933, p. 1969, as amended; St.1935, p. 1540, § 23.

10. Agriculture ⇐2

Where proceedings before Agricultural Prorate Commission to terminate program for the prorated marketing of olives was initiated by certain producers-owners under Agricultural Proration Act, action of commission in secretly receiving evidence consisting of a field survey and report of Department of Finance, after conclusion of hearing on petition, could not be justified under provision of act authorizing commission to initiate an investigation on its own motion to determine whether facts warranting a proration program continued to exist. St.1933, p. 1969, as amended; St.1935, p. 1540, § 23.

11. Agriculture ⇐2

Under provision of Agricultural Proration Act authorizing producers and owners to file a petition with the Agricultural Prorate Commission for a termination of any proration program, only issue which commission could decide at a hearing on a petition was whether petition was signed by requisite number of producers and owners, and hence evidence offered for purpose of showing that there were no conditions justifying continuance of proration would not be relevant. St.1933, p. 1969, as amended; St.1935, p. 1540, § 23.

12. Agriculture ⇐2

An order of Agricultural Prorate Commission granting petition of owners and producers to terminate program for the prorated marketing of olives, which was based upon reports secretly received without knowledge of parties after conclusion of hearing on petition, contrary to provisions of Agricultural Proration Act, would not be sustained on ground that evidence upon which the order was based could be reviewed in the judicial proceeding authorized by the Act. St.1933, p. 1969, as amended; St.1935, pp. 1535, 1540, §§ 17, 23.

Original proceeding by Olive Proration Program Committee for Olive Proration Zone No. 1 and others, against the Agricultural Prorate Commission and others, for a writ of mandate directing respondent commission to annul orders purporting to terminate the olive proration program theretofore established.

Writ granted.

Hadsell, Sweet, Ingalls & Lamb and Dan Hadsell, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., W. R. Augustine and Lucas E. Kilkenny, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent Agricultural Prorate Commission.

L. A. MacNicol, of Merced, for respondents Harry Hughes and Jacob Isely.

Farnsworth, Burke & Maddox and James K. Abercrombie, all of Visalia, for respondents A. R. Wakefield, Stacy Gange, E. A. Reeves and W. E. Stevenson.

EDMONDS, Justice.

In this original proceeding, the petitioner, Olive Proration Program Committee for Olive Proration Zone No. 1, seeks a peremptory writ of mandate directing the Agricultural Prorate Advisory Commission and William B. Parker, director of agriculture, as successors of the Agricultural Prorate Commission, Stats.1939, ch. 894 p. 2485; Deering's General Laws, 1937 ed., Vol. 1, Act 143a, to annul two orders made by the latter body. These orders, dated July 26 and August 7, 1939, respectively, purport to terminate the olive proration program theretofore established.

Olive Proration Zone No. 1, embracing the entire state, was created in 1936 under the Agricultural Proration Act, Stats.1933, Ch. 754, p. 1969, as amended; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1937 Ed., Vol. 1, Act 143a. A program for the prorated marketing of olives was established in 1937, and, as subsequently modified, has since been in effect unless it was concluded by the two orders which have been mentioned.

In 1939, approximately two years after the institution of the program, several persons filed with the respondent commission a petition authorized by section 23 of the act. This section, as then in effect, provided that an application for the termination of any proration program could be filed "by not less than 40 per cent of the producers and by the owners of 40 per cent of the producing factors of the industry within the zone in which the program is effective." When such a petition was filed, the commission was required to hold a hearing to determine whether it was signed by persons representing the specified percentage of producers and factors. If, upon such hearing, it was established that the petition was sufficiently signed, it was the duty of the commission to terminate the program.

After notice given, on March 16, 1939, the commission held a hearing upon this petition. Many persons appeared, several of whom, as witnesses or otherwise, voiced their support of or their objections to the marketing program then in effect. There was also considerable testimony to the effect that the signers of the petition were owners of groves or producers of olives to the extent indicated after their respective names. At the conclusion of the evidence, the hearing was adjourned "subject to further call by the commission should it so decide."

No "further call" was ever made or other hearing had. Instead, and on June 27, 1939, more than three months after the conclusion of the hearing, the commission made and entered its findings and order denying the petition to terminate the program. It found that the petition was signed by less than 40 per cent of the olive producers and by less than 40 per cent of the owners of producing factors, and was insufficient in other respects to meet the requirements of the act. The findings recite in detail the grounds for the commission's conclusions and set forth methods employed in making its computations. In form they purport to be a complete and final determination concerning the sufficiency of the petition.

On July 27, 1939, and within the period prescribed in section 17 of the act, St.1935, p. 1535, for a judicial review of any order made by the commission, the respondents Hughes and Isely, two of the proponents of the petition to terminate the program, filed in the superior court of Tulare county a petition for writ of mandate to compel the commission to set aside this order and to terminate the program. This proceeding was dismissed when it was later ascertained that on the previous day the commission, by a three to two vote of its members, and without any further hearing or any request therefor, or notice to or consent of any of the interested parties made an order rescinding its prior order denying the petition to terminate and granted it "subject to a ruling by the attorney-general as to the legal power of the commission" so to do.

Following this order, the Attorney General advised the commission that it has the necessary power, under the circumstances shown in the present case, to vacate an order and to enter a new and different order. The commission then made the order of August 7, 1939, which in unqualified terms rescinded its order of June 27, 1939, denying the petition to terminate and granted it. This order was made without any notice to the parties, and was followed by a letter to them in which the commission stated: "This action is based in a large measure on an independent, impartial examination of the petition to terminate Olive Proration Zone No. 1 made by the division of budgets and accounts of the department of finance. We have authorized today this department to release this report to you and all other interested parties."

The petitioner then instituted the present proceeding, joining as respondents not only the commission but also the respondents Wakefield, Gange, Reeves and Stevenson who are proponents of the program, and the respondents Hughes and Isely who petitioned the commission for its termination. This court issued an alternative writ of mandate and thereafter made an order appointing the Honorable Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., as referee, to hear the issues and make findings thereon. After taking considerable evidence, the referee found and concluded, among other things, that the respondent commission had exceeded its authority when on August 7, 1939, it reversed its earlier action and terminated the program.

The first question for determination concerns the commission's jurisdiction to rescind and reverse its order of June 27, 1939, denying, as insufficient, the petition to terminate the program. This order, the referee found, was made "at a time when all evidence produced at the hearing of said petition to terminate said proration program was before said Agricultural Prorate Commission and at a time when said * * * commission was fully advised with regard to the law and the evidence relating to said petition; and that said findings and order purported to be and were complete, final and binding findings of the * * * commission with respect to said petition to terminate said proration program and purported to and did constitute a complete, final and binding order of said * * * commission denying said petition to terminate said proration program."

[1] Under legislation of recent years, administrative bodies are given authority to make orders which cover a wide field. Many of such orders determine facts which will put enactments into effect. Dominguez Land Corp. v. Daugherty, 196 Cal. 468, 238 P. 703; Brock v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.2d 291, 71 P.2d 209, 114 A.L.R. 127; Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 12 S.Ct. 495, 36 L.Ed. 294; Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 48 S.Ct. 348, 72 L.Ed. 624. Others promulgate rules and incidental regulations which are necessary to implement and make effective the more general powers conferred. United States v. Shreveport Grain & Elevator Co., 287 U.S. 77, 53 S.Ct. 42, 77 L.Ed. 175; United States v. Grimand, 220 U.S. 506, 31 S.Ct. 480, 55 L.Ed. 563. Ordinarily, the doctrine of res judicata may not appropriately be applied to the exercise of such power. Wilbur v. United States ex rel. Kadrie, 281 U.S. 206, 50 S.Ct. 320, 74 L.Ed. 809; see, 49 Yale L.J. 1250, 1253; 52 Harv.L. Rev. 259.

[2-4] Where orders which relate to what may be rather broadly defined as individual rights are concerned, the question whether the administrative agency may reverse a particular determination depends upon the kind of power exercised in making the order and the terms of the statute under which the power was exercised. As to the first factor, almost without exception, courts have held that the determination of an administrative agency as to the existence of a fact or status which is based upon a present or past group of facts, may not thereafter be altered or modified. Muncy v. Hughes, 265 Ky. 588, 97 S.W.2d 546; Little v. Board of Adjustment, 195 N.C. 793, 143 S.E. 827; Lilienthal v. Wyandotte, 286 Mich. 604, 282 N.W. 837. As concisely stated by the New York Court of Appeals, "officers of special and limited jurisdiction cannot sit in review of their own orders or vacate or annul them." People ex rel. Chase v. Wemple, 144 N.Y. 478, 39 N.E. 397, 398. But if it is clear that the legislature intended that the agency should exercise a continuing jurisdiction with power to modify or alter its orders to conform to changing conditions, the doctrine of res judicata is not applicable. The determination depends upon the provisions of the particular statute.

[5, 6] The orders here challenged were made in a proceeding authorized by the Agricultural Proration Act, supra, as a means whereby persons in an industry may exercise the rights given to them, as a group, to control the proration of their products. The statute contains no provision in express terms giving the commission authority to change its considered determination, made after a full hearing, and the fact that any order made by it may be reviewed in a judicial proceeding to be commenced within 30 days after its effective date is some evidence of legislative intention to the contrary. And since all administrative action must be grounded in statutory authority, in the absence of a provision allowing a commission to change its determination, courts have usually denied the right so to do.

That principle was recently followed by this court in deciding that the decision of a civil service commission upon the status of an employee was final and conclusive. "It had no jurisdiction to retry the question and make a different finding at a later time. The charter gives no such grant of power, and it may not be implied." Continuing, the court said: "If the power were admitted, what procedure would govern its exercise? Within what time would it have to be exercised; how many times could it be exercised? Could a subsequent commission reopen and reconsider an order of a prior commission? And if the commission could reconsider an order sustaining a discharge, could it reconsider an order having the opposite effect, thus retroactively holding a person unfit for his position? These and many other possible questions which might be raised demonstrate how unsafe and impracticable would be the view that a commission might upset its final orders at its pleasure, without limitations of time, or methods of procedure." Heap v. City of Los Angeles, 6 Cal.2d 405, 407, 57 P.2d 1323, 1324.

[7, 8] These conclusions make it unnecessary to consider the contention that the last two orders of the commission are void because not made upon a hearing, as contemplated by the statute. However, as has been stated, the order of August 7th, according to the commission, was based, "in a large measure," on a field survey and report requested by the commission and made by the department of finance after the hearing of March 16, 1939. The parties were not apprised that this survey was being made or the result of it until after the last order of the commission was promulgated. As a result they were denied all right of cross-examination with respect thereto and also of an opportunity to make a counter showing in rebuttal. Under such circumstances, the statutory requirement of a hearing was not met. Morgan v. United States, 304 U.S. 1, 58 S.Ct. 773, 999, 82 L.Ed. 1129; I. C. C. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 227 U.S. 88, 33 S.Ct. 185, 57 L.Ed. 431; see 52 Harv.L.Rev. 509, 12. Only evidence which the opposite party has an opportunity to refute at the hearing may be relied upon as the basis of a finding. United States v. Abilene & So. Ry. Co., 265 U.S. 274, 44 S. Ct. 565, 68 L.Ed. 1016.

The Attorney General defends the commission's use of the report of the department of finance upon the authority of Ray

v. Parker 15 Cal.2d 275, 101 P.2d 665, 683. In that decision, he insists, this court upheld an administrative order based upon hearsay evidence. But the evidence which is challenged in the present case was secretly received by the commission after it had determined the issues presented by the petition to terminate. In the Ray case, although the director of agriculture did not offer in evidence all of the documentary evidence he relied upon to support his order, "he did, in substance, place before each hearing the 'result' of his investigations and surveys, and the expert assistant * * * who had made the same was available and was in many instances subjected to examination by those present at the hearings."

[9] Also, the record does not support the contention that counsel for respondents Wakefield, Gange, Reeves and Stevenson stipulated at the hearing before the respondent commission on March 16, 1939, that such subsequent field survey and report might be made by the department and employed by the commission in determining the sufficiency of the petition to terminate. Aside from the fact that counsel for these respondents was neither authorized nor entitled to stipulate for and to bind all parties appearing at the hearing, it appears that, as the referee concluded, the stipulation covered merely a check of the sufficiency of the petition to terminate against the zone records. The stipulation did not purport to authorize a later field survey and report.

[10] Also, the investigation conducted by the department of finance was not one which may be said to have been made by the commission under the authority of section 23 of the Agricultural Proration Act, supra. That action allows the commission to "initiate an investigation on its own motion to determine whether or not the facts [warranting a proration program] * * * continue to exist." But the present proceeding to terminate proration, initiated by certain growers and producers, is an entirely different one from that contemplated by the quoted provision of section 23, and the action of the commission in secretly receiving and considering evidence after the conclusion of the hearing cannot be justified under it.

[11] After the referee filed his report, the respondents Hughes and Isely moved this court for leave to introduce additional evidence showing that there are now no conditions justifying the continuance of proration. They assert that because of the war abroad olives produced in the European and Mediterranean countries are not now reaching the United States, and California growers do not need the benefit of proration in order to receive maximum returns for their crops. But the only issue which the commission could decide in the proceeding before it was the sufficiency of the petition. If the petition was signed by the requisite number of producers and owners of producing factors, it was the duty of the commission, under the law as then in force, to terminate the program regardless of other facts. The evidence sought to be introduced by respondents Hughes and Isely would not be relevant to that issue even if it might be received at this late date.

[12] As another ground justifying its action, the commission asserts that its last order should be upheld because the evidence upon which it is based, although received after the conclusion of the hearing, may be reviewed in the judicial proceeding authorized by the act. To approve such a practice would mean that an administrative body could base a finding and order on information or reports secretly received without the knowledge of the parties, and successfully defend that action by answering that the remedy of the one aggrieved by the decision is to challenge the data or evidence in a later judicial proceeding. That is not the procedure provided for by the statute.

The motion to take additional evidence is denied. Let a writ of mandate issue requiring the respondent commission to annul its orders of July 26 and August 7, 1939.

In re RICHARDS' ESTATE.

BENNALLACK v. RECTOR.

Sac. 5263.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 3, 1941.

1. Executors and administrators ⇐87

The statute providing that if decedent's debtor is unable to pay all his debts, court may authorize compromise, is inapplicable to proceeding for settlement of executor's account. Probate Code, §§ 578, 920 et seq.

2. Executors and administrators ⇐510(8)

After lapse of time for appeal from order or judgment, such as order settling executor's account, appeal from subsequent order refusing to set aside original order is unavailing. Probate Code, §§ 920 et seq., 1240.

3. Executors and administrators ⇐508(2)

The probate court being authorized by statute to settle executor's account free from any control by parties to proceeding for such settlement, such court's order of settlement is valid on its face and cannot be rendered void, even if stipulation therefor between attorneys for administrator of estate with will annexed and administrator of estate of widow of assignee of residuary interest in testator's estate was not binding on administrator of widow's estate for any reason, such as his attorney's lack of authority, since probate court is not bound to exercise such authority in accordance with parties' or their attorneys' stipulations or agreements. Probate Code, § 920 et seq.

4. Executors and administrators ⇐510(8)

Where no appeal from probate court's order granting executor's petition for permission to exchange certain realty of estate for other realty and additional cash sum was filed until nearly four years after date of order, appellant's objection thereto on ground that estate had not been distributed cannot be successfully urged on appeal from decree settling final accounts of deceased executor's successor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; Raglan Tuttle and Arthur Coats, Judges pro tem.

In the matter of the estate of Philip Richards, deceased. From a decree settling the final and supplemental accounts of E. M. Rector, administrator with the will annexed of the estate, and ordering distribution thereof, Frank Bennallack, administrator of the estates of Mary Ann Bennallack and James Bennallack, deceased, appeals.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a "decree settling accounts and decree of distribution" in the matter of the estate of Philip Richards, deceased. The facts in this case are substantially as follows:

Philip Richards died in 1887, leaving a will in which William G. Richards, Francis Richards and James Bennallack were named as executors. The will, which was duly admitted to probate, designated certain legatees and provided that in the event of the death of any one or more of such legatees before receipt of the respective bequests, the amount or amounts thereof should be paid to the testator's brother, William S. Richards. The residue of the estate was left to the said brother, William S. Richards, and to another brother, Francis Richards (also known as Francis S. Richards), share and share alike.

Probate of the estate proceeded over a period of years and, on June 16, 1934, Wm. G. Richards, who since the death of the second coexecutor in 1900 had been the sole executor of the Philip Richards estate, rendered to the probate court an account which covered a period of twenty-two years, and which indicated a balance of cash on hand in the estate in the sum of $8,533.98. As against that amount, however, in the said account he requested that allowance be made to him for reasonable fees as executor. The amount shown as cash on hand included the sum of $3,000 which had been received as additional consideration in connection with certain real property which had been accepted in exchange for a parcel of real property that had belonged to Philip Richards' estate at the time of his death.

On August 21, 1934, Frank Bennallack, appellant herein, as administrator of the estate of Mary Ann Bennallack, deceased, who was the widow and heir of James Bennallack (to whom Francis Richards' residuary interest in the estate of Philip Richards had been assigned), filed objections to the account filed by Wm. G. Richards and, among other things, alleged that no vouchers accompanied the said account; that, according to the books which had been kept by Wm. G. Richards, all amounts of money which had been received by him as executor were not included in the account so filed; and that many items of disbursement therein itemized were not properly chargeable against the estate.

On September 24, 1934, a hearing on the matter was had in open court, at which time it was ordered submitted. At said hearing it was stipulated that the matter of the claim of Wm. G. Richards for executor's fees would be considered at the hearing on his final account.

On November 26, 1934, Wm. G. Richards filed a supplemental and final account, wherein it appeared that the residue of the estate consisted of cash on hand in the sum of $8,767.40, together with the real property which had been acquired by the estate as a result of the exchange hereinbefore mentioned. The said final account was accompanied by a petition for distribution, and a hearing on that petition was set for December 7, 1934. On behalf of the estates he represented, Frank Bennallack filed exceptions to the said final account. However, two days after his final account was filed, Wm. G. Richards died, and his widow, Mary E. Richards,—to whom he had deeded all his interest in Philip's estate, including the residuary interest of Wm. S. Richards which theretofore had been assigned to him,—was appointed administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Philip Richards. Shortly thereafter, and before qualifying as such administratrix, Mary E. Richards died. On April 5, 1935, E. M. Rector, respondent herein,—who is the husband of the daughter (and heir at law) of Wm. G. and Mary E. Richards,—was appointed to succeed Mary E. Richards as administrator with the will annexed of Philip's estate.

It perhaps at this point should be stated that for a period of forty-seven years preceding his death Wm. G. Richards had served as an executor of the will of Philip Richards, without having received therefor any fees as such executor,—and that during the last twenty-two years prior to his demise, as hereinbefore has been indicated, he had served as the sole executor thereof. The two accounts which were filed by Wm. G. Richards covered the said period of twenty-two years and contained several hundred items of receipt and disbursements, the dates, amounts and nature of which were clearly detailed. The items of receipt consisted principally of monthly rentals collected from tenants of the real property, and nearly all the items of disbursement represented payments of taxes and insurance, also for improvements and upkeep of the property. A considerable portion of the remaining disbursements represented expenses of litigation in which on each of many different occasions the estate had been engaged. The recapitulation set forth in the final account showed that during the preceding twenty-two years in which Wm. G. Richards was the sole executor he received for the estate the total sum of $18,447.42, and expended $9,680.02,—which left a balance on hand of $8,767.40. However, as hereinbefore has been stated, as against that balance the executor made a demand (which was supported by a complete statement of facts in relation thereto) for an allowance of fees in the following sums: $788.95 as statutory fees of the executor; $4,700 for extraordinary services performed by the executor during the preceding forty-seven years; and $1,000 for extraordinary services of the executor's attorneys. One of appellant's principal objections to the account and petition for final distribution which was filed by Wm. G. Richards was directed against the allowance of the amounts claimed therein as executor's fees.

From the record, it appears that, shortly after the death of Wm. G. Richards, it was ascertained that he did not, in fact, have on hand the entire amount of money with which, in his final account, he had charged himself as executor of the Philip Richards estate, i.e., the sum of $8,767.40. It also appears that all persons interested in the Philip Richards estate had knowledge of that fact—as well as the further fact that as against the amount shown in his final account as being on hand, Wm. G. Richards had asserted a claim for executor's fees in the sum of approximately $5,500.

Several hearings were had on the last account of Wm. G. Richards and finally, on February 5, 1936, the matter of the settlement thereof was taken up in court chambers. At that hearing the attorneys for E. M. Rector as administrator of the respective estates of Philip Richards, deceased, Wm. G. Richards, deceased, and Mary E. Richards, deceased, entered into a written stipulation with the attorneys for Frank Bennallack as the administrator of the respective estates of Mary Ann Bennallack, deceased, and James Bennallack, deceased, whereby it was provided that the account dated June 15, 1934, and the final account dated November 22, 1934, as filed by Wm. G. Richards, be settled and allowed,—and a proposed order to that effect was prepared and attached to the stipulation. However, in view of the fact that the hearing was had in chambers there is no record of the discussion which took place among the several attorneys at or immediately preceding the time they entered into the said stipulation. But from the testimony which was given at subsequent hearings it appears that the question of the allowance of executor's fees was there discussed; that it was understood and agreed between the parties to the stipulation that the claim for the entire sum of money asserted by Wm. G. Richards as due him for executor's fees would be waived,—and that the amount of cash on hand which belonged to the Philip Richards estate was the sum of $3,002.76.

On February 7, 1936, the court signed the said order. It was therein recited that the amount of cash on hand in the estate of Philip Richards was the sum of $3,002.76, from which the court directed the payment of certain items of expense which had been settled and allowed; and by the terms of that order E. M. Rector, as administrator of Philip's estate, was charged with the amount of cash remaining on hand after those deductions had been made, i.e., the sum of $2,194.63. It also was provided therein that such order was to be "a final adjudication of the accounts presented and all moneys received and disbursed by the said Wm. G. Richards as Executor of the said Estate, and a final settlement of all cash money due said Estate from said Wm. G. Richards, * * *". (Emphasis added.) No appeal was taken from that order. However, a day or so after the stipulation was entered into, and after the order had been signed, appellant herein assertedly for the first time learned of the execution of the stipulation, and he thereupon discharged his then attorney for the asserted reason that the stipulation had been entered into on appellant's behalf without his knowledge or consent.

Thereafter, on February 14, 1936, E. M. Rector as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Philip Richards filed his first and final account, which included a petition for distribution of all the estate remaining in his hands. On February 29, 1936, Frank Bennallack, individually, and as administrator of the estates he represented, filed objections to settling the accounts of administrator E. M. Rector, to the petition for distribution and to the closing of Philip Richards' estate. As a part of those objections he sought a nullification of the stipulation and order of February 7, 1936, settling the accounts of Wm. G. Richards, and requested that a complete hearing be had on both of the Richards accounts.

On January 4, 1937, a hearing was had on E. M. Rector's accounts, and from the record it appears that, in part, the court treated appellant's said objections as an application filed under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to have set aside and declared void the said stipulation, together with the order which had been signed by the court on February 7, 1936. At that hearing the court stated that the application for relief under section 473 would be denied; and thereafter, and some time between January 4th and the end of that month, a minute order appeared on the records of the court, which in part was as follows: "It is ordered that relief under section 473 [Code Civ. Proc.] be denied. It is further ordered that judgment be that residue of the estate will be divided equally between the heirs and successors of William S. Richards and Francis Richards." Subsequently, administrator Rector filed supplemental accounts, and thereafter a hearing was had on September 3, 1937, with respect to those accounts. On September 16, 1937, the final and supplemental accounts of administrator Rector were settled, allowed and approved; and on September 20, 1937, a final decree of distribution was entered. By its judgment the court denied the relief asked for by administrator Bennallack as set forth in his several objections. The decree also contained a formal ruling by which appellant's request for nullification of the order of February 7, 1936, was denied. The present appeal was taken from that decree.

Although the appeal was taken from the decree settling the final account and granting the petition for final distribution filed by E. M. Rector, the real controversy on this appeal is grounded on the asserted invalidity of two separate orders which theretofore had been made by the probate court. The first of the orders which appellant sought to have annulled (which hereinafter will be more fully discussed) was made on November 6, 1933, during the administration of the estate by E. M. Rector's predecessor, Wm. G. Richards, which order authorized the exchange of real property heretofore mentioned. The second order was the one made on February 7, 1936, by which were settled the said two accounts filed by the executor Wm. G. Richards.

With regard to the second order,—against the validity of which appellant has directed most of his argument,—as hereinbefore has been stated, on February 29, 1936, at the time appellant filed his objections to settling the Rector accounts, he also sought an annulment of the said order of February 7, 1936 (based on the assertion that as to appellant the stipulation was invalid, for the reason that, allegedly, he had not authorized his then attorney to so stipulate); and at the same time he asked that a complete hearing be had on the two Wm. G. Richards accounts. In the latter connection appellant charged the executor with being indebted to the Philip Richards estate to the extent of large sums of money, and asked "That no allowance be made to said Wm. G. Richards for any item of expenditure alleged to have been made in said accounts in excess of $20.00 for which no voucher is produced or filed" or "for any item of expenditure alleged to have been made in said accounts for any item of $20.00 or less for which no voucher is produced, unless such item of expenditure shall be supported by the uncontradicted oath of the said Wm. G. Richards, positive to the fact of payment, specifying when, where, and to whom it was made; provided, however, that there shall not in any event be any allowance made for items of expenditure of $20.00 or less, where no vouchers are produced, for any sum in excess of $500.00". With respect to the absence of vouchers, it may be stated that at the hearing of Wm. G. Richards' first account testimony was adduced showing that during the management of the estate as sole executor he had kept a "time book" in which he had entered all receipts and disbursements as the respective transactions had taken place, and that the items of receipt and disbursement set forth in said account were copied from that book, which was produced at the hearing and introduced in evidence. Furthermore, Wm. G. Richards testified in support of his account that the amounts of all payments set forth therein had actually been made by him on the dates, to the persons, and for the purposes stated in the account. No testimony to the contrary was produced.

Appellant does not claim that the order settling said accounts was made or entered as the result of mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect. Sec. 473, Code Civ.Proc. Nor does he intimate that any fraud was practiced by any one in connection with the making of the stipulation therein referred to, or with the obtaining of said order. Moreover, he concedes that upon its face the order is valid. However, appellant contends that the order should be declared void for the following reasons: (1) that the final proceedings which resulted in the making of the order of settlement took place in court chambers; (2) that the items of expenditure set forth in said account which exceeded $20 in amount were not supported by vouchers; (3) that said order is based on a void stipulation in that the stipulation in question was in effect a "compromise" of a claim against "a debtor of the decedent" as those terms are used in section 578 of the Probate Code, and that no petition was filed nor court order obtained for such "compromise", as required by that section; and (4) that in any event appellant was not bound by said stipulation —which was ineffectual for any purpose, for the reason that appellant's attorney entered into the stipulation without being authorized so to do.

[1] It would appear that if those contentions were to be upheld the effect would be to nullify the order of February 7, 1936, to reopen for examination the accounts of the executor Wm. G. Richards which had covered his administration of the Philip Richards estate over a period of some twenty-two years, and to declare as a matter of law that a probate court is without jurisdiction to settle an account of an executor or administrator for less than the amount of the balance set forth in the account unless a court order for "compromise" is previously petitioned for and granted, pursuant to the proceedings provided for in section 578 of the Probate Code. Respondent, however, contends that the requirements of section 578 were never intended to apply to proceedings involving the settlement of an account of an executor. The latter contention must be sustained. By the provisions of article III, chapter XV, division III, of the Probate Code there is outlined the complete procedure to be followed in the matter of settlement of accounts of an executor or administrator, and no reference is therein made to the provisions of section 578 of that code. Moreover, from a consideration of the language of the said section it would appear to be impracticable to apply the provisions thereof to the settlement of an executor's account. In part, the section provides as follows: "If a debtor of the decedent is unable to pay all his debts, the executor or administrator, with the approval of the court, may give him a discharge, upon such terms as may appear to the court to be for the best interest of the estate. A compromise may also be authorized by the court when it appears to be just and for the best interest of the estate."

It is clear that until the probate court has made and entered an order settling an executor's account, there can be no determination of the amount due the estate from the executor, and until the amount thereof has been so determined there could be no basis for a petition or an order for compromise. Section 578 provides for the procedure which may be invoked where a "debtor" of a decedent is unable to pay all his debts.

[2] Moreover, under section 1240 of the Probate Code, a right of appeal from the order objected to was afforded appellant, and he failed to exercise that right. When the time has elapsed within which an appeal may be taken from an order or judgment, an appeal is unavailing where, as here, it is taken from a subsequent order which refused to set aside the original order. Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 318, 86 P. 183, 90 P. 711, 121 Am.St.Rep. 105; Estate of Devincenzi, 119 Cal. 498, 51 P. 845; 2 Cal.Jur. p. 164. It is clear that appellant herein could have appealed from the order of February 7, 1936, and thereby have presented for review on appeal the questions with regard to the asserted irregularities which he now presents as his first three points, as hereinbefore mentioned.

However, appellant argues that—on an appeal from the order of February 7, 1936, —he could not have embodied in a bill of exceptions the facts relied on by him to prove that his attorney had entered into the stipulation without having been authorized by appellant so to do, for the reason that such issue did not arise and the evidence pertaining thereto was not adduced until after said order had been made and entered. In connection with the stipulation, appellant's principal complaint is that—with regard to the settlement of Wm. G. Richards' final account—his attorney had no authority to stipulate for any sum less than the sum of $8,767.40, the amount of cash which was indicated in said account as having been on hand. However, as hereinbefore has been indicated, in entering into the stipulation the court and the attorneys took into consideration the executor's demand for fees, and in that regard the record shows the following facts: At the time of the executor's appointment in 1887, the estate consisted of several pieces of real property and considerable personal property, including mining stock. Twenty-two cash legacies were created by the will, some seven bequests of personal property, together with five specific devises of real property, and the residue was bequeathed in equal shares to the decedent's brothers. Several of the legatees resided outside this country. By the terms of the will, the executors were authorized—without order of court—to pay the cash legacies, deliver the bequeathed personal property, convey the real property to the beneficiaries entitled thereto, and to rent, sell or otherwise dispose of the remaining real property which belonged to the estate. Following the death of the two coexecutors, Wm. G. Richards managed the entire estate. He performed innumerable services in that regard, such as securing tenants for the real property, collecting the monthly rentals therefrom, keeping the property in repair and improving the same. Furthermore, during the forty-seven years of its pendency in probate, the estate was engaged as a party litigant in eight separate legal actions and several distinct appeals to this court. At the time the executor filed his petition for final distribution he had paid all claims against the estate and had carried out all the terms of the will with respect to payment of the cash legacies, delivery of the bequests, and conveyance of the several pieces of real property. In addition thereto he had sold or exchanged various other pieces of the real property belonging to the estate, so that the residue of the estate consisted only of money and one parcel of real property, which by the provisions of the final decree of distribution—from which this appeal was taken—was apportioned in equal shares to the estates of Mary Elizabeth Richards, the deceased wife of the said executor, and James Bennallack, deceased, the father of appellant. Up to the time of the filing of his final account, no allowance for executor's fees had been made to Wm. G. Richards, and he thereupon asked for an allowance of approximately $100 a year for the extraordinary services thus rendered by him during the preceding forty-seven years. Therefore, it would seem that if the question of the reasonableness of such demand were a matter that could be properly reviewed on this appeal, this court would not be warranted in ruling that the amount claimed for executor's fees was disproportionate to the value of the services that he had rendered.

[3] However, aside from other considerations, the validity of the final order of settlement of the Wm. G. Richards accounts cannot be made to depend on the question whether appellant was bound by the stipulation, for the reason that by virtue of the Code sections embodied in article III, chapter XV, division III, of the Probate Code the authority to settle the accounts of an executor or administrator is vested in the probate court, free from any control by the parties. And although the court may exercise such authority in accordance with stipulations or agreements of the parties or their attorneys, it is not bound to do so. Therefore, even assuming that the stipulation which was entered into by the attorneys in the present case was for any reason not binding on appellant, the court's order of settlement, being valid on its face, could not in any event be rendered void. Church v. Church, Cal.App., 105 P.2d 643; Security-First Nat. Bank of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, 1 Cal.2d 749, 37 P.2d 69.

[4] The other order which appellant attacks on this appeal was made on November 6, 1933. In that order the probate court granted the petition of Wm. G. Richards as executor of the estate of Philip Richards, by which he sought to effect the exchange of a certain parcel of real property belonging to the Philip Richards estate for another piece of property, plus the sum of $3,000 in cash. Appellant filed a protest against such proposed exchange, on the ground that the estate had not been distributed. However, the said petition was granted on the ground that the exchange of the respective properties was for the best interests of the estate. The order recited that notice of hearing had been duly given and that evidence both oral and documentary had been introduced. The court had jurisdiction to entertain the petition as presented, and there is no showing that the order was void on its face. No appeal from such order was filed until September 27, 1937. The order had become final long prior to the last-mentioned date, and the present attack comes too late to be of any avail to appellant.

It therefore follows that appellant's present objections to the two orders herein attacked may not be successfully urged on this appeal which was taken from the decree settling the final accounts of Wm. G. Richards' successor. To entertain those objections at this time would be to put the stamp of approval on an action which amounts to no more than a collateral attack on the said two orders.

From the foregoing it follows that the decree settling accounts and ordering distribution should be, and it hereby is, affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; A. R. Cotton and Maxwell McNutt, Judges.

Action by Oscar E. Sivertsen against the City of Menlo Park and others to enjoin enforcement of an ordinance requiring that painting contractors pay an annual license fee. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Rodgers & Costello, of Palo Alto, for appellant.

James T. O'Keefe, Jr., of Redwood City, for respondents.

CURTIS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal after the sustaining of a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, without leave to amend.

It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff was a painting contractor, duly licensed by the state of California, with his principal place of business in the city of Palo Alto; that he had contracted to do certain painting in the city of Menlo Park; and that while performing such work he was threatened with arrest by defendant Carroll, as chief of police of Menlo Park, for nonpayment of a license fee as provided by city ordinance No. 76. The pertinent part of the ordinance referred to provides that painting contractors having a fixed place of business in the city of Menlo Park shall pay an annual license fee of $10, and further that "Where such person has no fixed place of business in said city such fee shall be increased by 100%." It is also provided that any person violating any of the provisions of the ordinance is guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to fine or imprisonment in the county jail and that each day of violation would be considered a separate offense.

The plaintiff, having no fixed place of business in Menlo Park, fell within the above-quoted provision and, not having paid the required fee, was liable under the penal provision.

The complaint further alleged that, as a result of threats of arrest or actual arrest under the ordinance, the plaintiff would suffer great loss and irreparable injury and asked that defendants be enjoined and restrained from enforcing that part of the ordinance referred to and that the said ordinance be declared unconstitutional as in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution and sections 13 and 21 of article I of the Constitution of California in that it denied to the plaintiff equal protection of the laws, and granted privileges to one class of citizens which are not accorded to all citizens similarly situated.

It cannot be denied that the ordinance discriminates against those painting contractors who have no fixed places of business within the city of Menlo Park. The question, therefore, is whether such discrimination violates the equal protection clause of the Federal Constitution and the privilege and immunities provision of the state Constitution.

[1-3] It is not denied by the appellant and it is well established by the authorities that there may be discrimination between businesses of the same character located within and those located without the boundaries of a municipality in regard to license fees. Bueneman v. City of Santa Barbara, 8 Cal.2d 405, 65 P.2d 884; Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 P. 725, 32 L.R.A. 527; Continental Baking Co. v. City of Escondido, 21 Cal.App.2d 388, 69 P.2d 181; E. A. Hoffman Candy Company v. City of Newport Beach, 120 Cal.App. 525, 8 P.2d 235; Singer Sewing Machine Co. v. Brickell, 233 U.S. 304, 34 S.Ct. 493, 58 L.Ed. 974; Campbell Baking Co. v. City of Maryville, D.C., 31 F.2d 466; Richmond Linen Co. v. Lynchburg, 160 Va. 644, 169 S.E. 554. However, it is equally well established that if discriminatory legislation is arbitrary, unreasonable and passed for the sole purpose of creating a protective tariff for the benefit of business located in the particular municipality, it is unlawful and violative of the constitutional provisions above mentioned. Bueneman v. City of Santa Barbara, supra; Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am.Rep. 642; In re Hines, 33 Cal.App. 45, 164 P. 339; In re Hart, 36 Cal.App. 627, 172 P. 610; In re Riley, 39 Cal.App. 58, 177 P. 854; In re Robinson, 68 Cal.App. 744, 230 P. 175; Campbell Baking Co. v. City of Maryville, supra. These principles are well stated in the case of Continental Baking Co. v. City of Escondido, supra [21 Cal.App.2d 388, 69 P.2d 183], wherein the following appears: "* * * the rule in this state must now be taken to be settled that for the purpose of fixing and imposing license taxes merchants having fixed places of business within a city and other merchants may be separately classified and license taxes in different amounts may be laid upon those in the two classifications, so long as a tax is actually imposed upon both classes, and provided that the tax on one class is not so disproportionately heavy as to demonstrate that the classification is 'a mere subterfuge for legislation directed against a particular group of taxpayers.'" The rule and the test to be applied are also well stated in the case of Campbell Baking Co. v. City of Maryville, supra [31 F.2d 468], in the following language: "A city, having the power to impose license taxes on, for example, bakers, undoubtedly may classify them, if the classification has some reasonable basis. To put those having a regularly established place of business in one class, and those having no such regularly established place of business in another, is not ipso facto an unreasonable classification. [Citing case.] Such a classification, even with substantial differences in taxes, is not unconstitutional. Where, however, it appears from gross disparities, from extraordinarily large exactions (as compared with others), and from all the facts, that the real intent and purpose is, not to raise revenue, but to destroy the business of nonresidents, in the interests of resident dealers and business men, when that appears, then nonresidents are denied that equal protection of the laws which the Constitution guarantees to all."

[4, 5] Applying the above rules to the ordinance here under consideration and keeping in mind the well-established principle that in considering the validity of such an ordinance, we must indulge every intendment in favor of its validity and that all doubts must be resolved in a way to uphold the law-making power (Ex parte Haskell, supra), we are of the opinion that the ordinance does not run counter to any of the constitutional inhibitions. It cannot be said that the requirement of a 100 per cent increase in the license fee for a painting contractor who has no fixed place of business in Menlo Park is an unreasonable or arbitrary discrimination or is an attempt to destroy out of town business. The annual license fee paid by local contractors is $10. A 100 per cent increase of that sum, or $20, required from out of town contractors surely is not such an exorbitant sum, the payment of which would drive such contractors out of business or prevent them from seeking business within the city.

[6] There can be no hard and fast rule or test set down which will determine the legality or illegality of an ordinance such as the one before us. The question is simply one of degree. A brief reference to some of the cases holding ordinances unconstitutional because of illegal discrimination will illustrate that, as a matter of degree, the instant ordinance cannot be classified with that group. The ordinance declared unconstitutional in the early case of Ex parte Frank, supra, required a merchant whose goods were located within the city to pay a quarterly license fee of $100, whereas a merchant whose goods were located without the city was required to pay a quarterly license fee of $2,000, or twenty times as great. In Re Hines, supra, the ordinance fixed a flat fee of $12 per annum for the operation of local laundries and a $130 fee for every wagon used for pickup or delivery by an outside laundry, or at least eleven times as great. The statute invalidated in In re Robinson, supra, imposed a license fee of $200 per quarter upon a solicitor if he drew his supplies and filled his orders from a business house located outside the city but if located within, then no license fee was required.

Appellant strongly relies on the case of Bueneman v. City of Santa Barbara, supra. Reference to the ordinance there involved shows clearly why it was placed in that class of ordinances previously declared to be unconstitutional. The ordinance there provided that laundry or dry cleaning businesses whose establishments were located outside the city were to pay an annual license fee of $200 for soliciting or delivering within the city. No tax was imposed upon a person conducting a similar business whose establishment was located within the city. An ordinance completely exempting local businesses and impressing a $200 fee on outside businesses is far different from the ordinance here under consideration, which provides for a $10 fee from local contractors and a $20 fee from outside contractors.

The disparity here is not even so great as that in the ordinance reviewed in the case of Continental Baking Co. v. City of Escondido, supra, which was determined to be not arbitrary or unreasonable. The ordinance there required a $50 annual license fee from every person, firm or corporation owning, operating and conducting a bakery within the city and a $150 license fee and $25 semi-annually for every vehicle over one used in the business, from all operating from without the city. The appellant attempts to distinguish this case on the ground that the statute expressly stated that the local businesses, to pay only the lower fee, were to be on the tax rolls of the city and that no such requirement is made in the instant ordinance. This cannot be said to be a distinction because all property within a city, with certain exceptions not relevant here, is taxable and any such provision may be considered mere surplusage. It is true that the court referred to the provision but such reference was made only as further evidence in support of its conclusion that the taxing authorities were not using the increased license fee as a subterfuge for oppression, but only as an attempt to balance the tax burden.

Appellant further relies on a statement in the case of E. A. Hoffman Candy Co. v. City of Newport Beach, supra, to the effect that a municipality is without any power to classify persons engaged in precisely the same business or placing a license fee on some and not others, or a charge not operating uniformly upon all engaged in precisely the same business. If, by such statement, the court there meant that no discrimination under any circumstances was permissible, then we cannot agree with such statement. However, a review and analysis of the facts and conclusions of that case clearly show that the court did not intend to lay down any such principle. The ordinance there made three different classifications, viz., (1) local merchants paying a flat license fee of $10 for operation of business; (2) out of town merchants who delivered by motor vehicles within the city paying a $10 license fee on every vehicle; and (3) out of town merchants who delivered by common carrier apparently paying no license fee. The court concluded that such ordinance was valid, even though there clearly was classification. Therefore, it cannot be said that the court in its opinion established or approved of a rule of no discrimination. Furthermore, the court there cites as authority for the statement made the line of cases beginning with Ex parte Frank, supra, which cases, as we have already pointed out, declared the ordinances involved unconstitutional because they were unreasonable.

[7-9] It being well established that there may be discrimination or classification in this type of legislation, it is not incumbent upon an appellate court, in determining the constitutionality of a license fee ordinance, to do more than inquire into the reasonableness of such legislation. Each locality has its own individual tax problems and there can never be an absolute equality of taxation. Because of the familiarity of the local legislative bodies with such local problems, their ultimate decisions as expressed by the taxing ordinances should not be easily disturbed. It is the duty of this court only to guard against attempts on the part of such local authorities to create a tariff barrier in favor of local businesses. If such attempt is shown by gross disparities, extraordinarily large exactions, or from other surrounding circumstances then, and only then, will such an ordinance be declared unconstitutional. We do not find such elements present in the ordinance here being considered. We are therefore of the opinion that the ordinance does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution or sections 13 and 21 of the State Constitution.

The action of the trial court in dismissing the action after sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, without leave to amend, was, in our opinion, proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

GANTNER & MATTERN CO. v. CALIFORNIA EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION et al.

Sac. 5406.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 7, 1941.

1. Mandamus ⇐4(5)

Under provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act that any party to a decision by a referee may appeal to employment commission from such decision, and commission may, on its own motion, affirm, modify, or set aside any decision of referee on basis of evidence previously submitted or direct taking of additional evidence, party aggrieved by a decision of referee must first exhaust his statutory remedies of appeal before he can maintain mandamus to prevent employment commission from paying unemployment benefits to employees who left their work because of strike and picket line. St.1939, pp. 8, 3013, §§ 56, 72.

2. Mandamus ⇐4(5)

An employer dissatisfied with the decision of a referee of the employment commission recommending that benefits be paid to employees who left their work because of strike and picket line could not maintain mandamus to prevent payment of unemployment benefits to such employees without first exhausting the statutory remedy of appeal from referee's decision on ground that employment commission by a long line of decisions had made plain its views as to law applicable to the situation and that it would have been idle act to have asked for a review by commission. St.1939, pp. 8, 3013, §§ 56, 72.

PER CURIAM.

This case was ordered transferred to this court on our own motion, after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, 101 P.2d 173, in order that it might be considered together with the case of Abelleira v. District Court of Appeal, S.F. 16357, then pending before us. Our decision in the Abelleira case, supra, this day filed, 109 P.2d 942, reaches the same conclusion as did the District Court of Appeal in the instant case. Accordingly, we hereby adopt its opinion, with minor changes, as the opinion of this court. It reads as follows:

"Petitioner herein is a corporation engaged as a manufacturer and wholesaler of knit goods. Among its many employees were janitors, who were members of the Building Service Employees' International Union, Local No. 87; some 150 others were engaged as employees in the manufacturing, packing and shipping of knit goods and were members of Knitgoods Workers' Union, Local No. 191, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union; still other employees, according to their particular craft or occupation, were members of Office Employees' Union, Local No. 21320, Machinists' Lodge No. 68, Warehousemen's Union, Local No. 860, and Building Service Employees' International Union, Local No. 87.

"On October 10, 1939, petitioner discharged a janitor then in its employment, who was a member of the Building Service Employees' International Union heretofore referred to. Thereafter the union demanded of petitioner that it re-employ and reinstate the janitor, which demand was, by petitioner, refused. On October 16, 1939, the Building Service Employees' Union declared a strike against said petitioner, and established a picket line at the factory of the Gantner & Mattern Company, in which picket line the several unions, except the Knitgoods Workers, joined and participated.

"Upon the declaration of the strike and the establishment of the picket line the members of the Knitgoods Workers' Union left their work at the establishment of petitioner and refused and still refuse to return to their work at the plant of petitioner.

"Thereafter these employees, members of the Knitgoods Union, made application to the respondent commission for the payment to them of unemployment benefits, and pursuant to an order of respondent commission, petitioner filed a list of its employees, members of the Knitgoods Union who were in its employment at the time the strike was declared, and who had left their work because of the strike and picket line. Subsequent to the filing of such list of employees, respondent commission, through its adjustment unit, ordered and directed the payment of unemployment benefits to the employees of petitioner, members of the Knitgoods Workers' Union. Thereafter, and within the time fixed by the Unemployment Insurance Act, Stats. 1935, chap. 352, p. 1226, petitioner filed with respondent commission an appeal in writing from the decision of the adjustment unit of the respondent commission, setting forth that the jobs of said employees were then and there at all times open to said employees, and that these employees had left their work because of a strike and the maintenance of a picket line and were disqualified to receive benefits under the provisions of the act, and particularly section 56 thereof, St.1939, p. 8.

"Upon the filing of this appeal with respondent commission, it was referred to a referee who, after a hearing, recommended that unemployment benefits be paid to said employees, members of Knitgoods Workers' Union, Local No. 191.

"To prevent such payments, petitioner, by this writ of mandate, seeks to prevent respondents from paying any unemployment benefits to the members of the Knitgoods Workers' Union, to recover back all benefits already paid to them, and to enforce the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

"The main point urged in this proceeding is that petitioner has failed, without justifiable excuse, to exhaust its statutory remedies, and for that reason this court should refuse to issue its writ of mandate.

[1] "Section 72 of the Unemployment Act as amended in 1939, St.1939, p. 3013, provides that any party to a decision by a referee may appeal to the commission from such decision, and the commission may, on its own motion, affirm, modify or set aside any decision of the referee on the basis of the evidence previously submitted in such case or direct the taking of additional evidence.

"We are of the opinion that where a procedure is provided, as here, that a party must first exhaust his statutory remedies before this court can intervene.

"San Joaquin, etc., Company v. County of Stanislaus et al., 155 Cal. 21, 99 P. 365, holds that a water company engaged in the business of furnishing water for irrigation cannot maintain an action to have declared void orders of the board of supervisors establishing the maximum rates for water, and to enjoin the enforcement of such rates, on the ground that the same were unfair and unreasonable, if the company had made no attempt within a year to secure a readjustment of the rates by petition to the supervisors.

"In re Kehr, 190 Cal. 401, 212 P. 913, in which a writ of mandate to compel a superior court to hear a petition for distribution, where money had been paid to the state treasurer under the provisions of section 1737 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was denied on the ground that the remedy of petitioner was first by proceedings found in section 1272a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

"Teeter v. Los Angeles, 209 Cal. 685, 290 P. 11. Here a property owner attempted to enjoin a city from carrying out the terms of a contract to improve certain streets. He failed, however, to first file his protest before the city council, as required by the Street Improvement Act of 1911, and a writ was denied.

"Collier v. Astor, 9 Cal.2d 202, 70 P.2d 171. 'Any action involving a controversy arising under the Private Employment Agency Act [Stats.1913, p. 515] brought in the superior court, without first referring the controversy to, and securing the determination of, the labor commissioner, is prematurely brought, and cannot be maintained.' (Syllabus.)

[2] "It is here argued by petitioner that by a long line of decisions the commission has made plain its views as to the law applicable to a situation similar to the one now before us, and that it would have been an idle act to have asked for a review by the commission. But be that as it may, we cannot presume that the commission, having adopted a particular rule or policy in like cases in the past, would necessarily have applied the same rule in the case at bar. The exhaustion of remedial procedure as laid down by the statute is required unless the petitioner can positively state that the commission has declared what its ruling will be in the particular case, and that, petitioner is unable to do.

"For that reason, and upon that ground, the writ of mandate is denied."

SHENK, Justice.

I dissent.

This proceeding in mandamus was decided on the merits by the District Court of Appeal, is here pursuant to an order of transfer, and is now decided by this court likewise on the merits. The principal question, as I see it, is whether the statutory remedy of appeal to the commission after decision by the referee is an adequate remedy on behalf of petitioner in the light of the admitted facts and the proper construction of the statute. That the administrative remedy afforded by statute must be an adequate remedy is not disputed.

The rule of exhaustion of remedies does not require blind enforcement. It is an outgrowth of the rule that a petitioner may not invoke the extraordinary redress of the courts if he has another adequate legal remedy, exemplified in the rules governing the issuance of the writ of mandamus (Sec. 1086, Code of Civ.Proc.) and the writ of review (Sec. 1067, Code of Civ.Proc.). The basis of the rule excluding the petitioner from the redress sought is that his legal remedy is adequate. In contemplating the question of adequacy, realities as well as theories must be considered. This is the point at which I depart from the opinion of the majority.

In the petition for the writ of mandamus it is alleged that the commission has adopted a rule binding upon all the officers, referees, and employees of the commission charged with the administration of the act and the payment of benefits thereunder. The alleged rule is to the effect that notwithstanding the provisions of section 56 (a) of the act, the commission will order and direct that unemployment benefits "be paid to employees belonging to one union who leave their work by reason of a trade dispute actually in existence at the establishment at which they are employed, where such trade dispute is evidenced by a strike and picket line declared, established and maintained by another union representing employees in the same establishment, and where the employees seeking benefits under the act have left their work and refused to return thereto, although their employment is available to them, by reason of sympathy with the striking and picketing union and with the union objectives of the trade dispute evidenced thereby". It is also alleged that "Said rule has been kept in force and effect since June 29, 1939, and has been complied with by all officers, employees, deputies and referees, and said Commission and its officers, employes, deputies and referees have publicly and officially declared that said rule will be enforced in all cases submitted to them, or any of them, notwithstanding the express provisions of the Act, and particularly section 56 thereof."

The commission denied that on or about June 29, 1939, or at any other time it had

"adopted" such a rule, but admitted that, through its adjustment unit, it had directed the payment of benefits to the members of Knitgoods Workers' Union Local No. 191, who refused to cross the picket line established by another union in the same establishment, but denied that the direction was pursuant to any rule "adopted" by the commission. The denial is captious in the light of the admission in the answer and the language of the opinion and decision of the referee in this very matter, a copy of which is attached to and made a part of the return to the alternative writ. The opinion so adopted contains the following statement: "Opinion: The principle is settled by a long line of Commission decisions that the refusal of members of a union which is not engaged in any labor dispute with an employer to cross a picket line established by another union representing a different class of workers which is engaged in a trade dispute with an employer, is not sufficient to invoke the disqualification provided by Section 56(a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act." The opinion then cites twelve commission cases to that effect and follows with this positive announcement: "These decisions are binding upon the Referee in this case." It should here be noted that in the Bodinson case the commission adhered to the same rule.

In the face of these admissions and allegations, it is certain that the commission would affirm the referee's order. To admit and allege that it had uniformly ruled in favor of the allowance of benefits under the facts here disclosed is tantamount to an admission that the commission had adopted a rule on the subject. As stated by the referee, the rule was binding on him. He, therefore, had no discretion in the matter and must decide in accordance with what the commission had announced it would hold on any appeal from the referee's decision. To conclude that an appeal under these circumstances would be an adequate remedy on behalf of petitioner, and that relief should be denied on that ground, would be to ignore the substance of the controversy.

Of course, the Bodinson case had not been decided by this court at the time the respondents filed their answer and return. As the matter then stood, the petition was, in my opinion, entitled to the relief sought. However, in the light of our decision in the Bodinson case, Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California Employment Comm., 109 P.2d 935, the commission has no discretion or alternative except to set aside the referee's order and deny payments which this court has decided would be illegal, if made.

Inasmuch as the official duty of the commission is thus so clearly indicated, the peremptory writ should in my opinion be granted.

I concur: WARD, J., pro tem.

BODINSON MFG. CO. v. CALIFORNIA EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION, et al.

Sac. 5407.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 7, 1941.

Rehearing Denied March 7, 1941.

1. Constitutional law ⇐70(3)

It is not the province of the Supreme Court, in construing the Unemployment Insurance Act, to consider arguments of social policy, but such matters are for the Legislature. St.1935, p. 1226, as amended.

2. Constitutional law ⇐70(3)

The Supreme Court has no authority to question the wisdom of the scheme set up by the Unemployment Insurance Act, and cannot deliberate upon the social desirability of making benefit payments to groups which are excluded by the statute. St.1935, p. 1226, as amended.

3. Master and servant ⇐78

The fact that the Unemployment Insurance Act does not provide its own procedure for testing whether a particular decision of the Employment Commission awarding benefits is authorized, and that only express provision in the act for court review is one authorizing employer to sue to recover contributions paid under protest, does not establish that courts are without power to review a decision of the commission awarding unemployment benefits in violation of the statute. If the Unemployment Insurance Act were construed to vest final authority in the Employment Commission to pass on questions of law, it would be unconstitutional as a delegation of "judicial power". St.1935, p. 1226, as amended; Const. art. 6, § 1.

10. Constitutional law ⇐48

Any construction of a statute which renders it unconstitutional is to be avoided if possible.

11. Constitutional law ⇐67

Despite procedural omissions in statutes creating administrative agencies, such as the Unemployment Insurance Act which creates the Employment Commission, the Supreme Court must continue to exercise its constitutional authority to render final decisions on questions of law properly raised in connection with the acts of such agencies. St.1935, p. 1226, as amended; Const. art. 6, § 1.

Under the proper construction of the Unemployment Insurance Act, an employee who is prevented from working, through no act of his own, is entitled to unemployment compensation. St.1935, p. 1226, as amended; St.1939, p. 8, § 56.

13. Master and servant ⇐78

Where strike was called by welders' union, machinists in the same plant who did not go on strike, but who refused to pass through picket line which striking welders had established around the plant, left work because of a "trade dispute", within statute providing that individual is not eligible for unemployment benefits if he leaves his work because of a "trade dispute", the choice causing them to refrain from working not being involuntary. St.1939, p. 8, § 56.

16. Mandamus ⇐3(1), 63

In California, "mandamus" is the remedial writ used to correct those acts and decisions of administrative agencies which are in violation of law, where no other adequate remedy is provided. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1084–1097.

17. Mandamus ⇐1

A writ of "mandamus" is used, not only to compel administrative action which is refused in violation of law, but also to annul or restrain administrative action already taken in violation of law. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1084–1097.

18. Mandamus ⇐70

The writ of "mandamus" may be used, not only to compel the performance of a ministerial act, but also, in a proper case, for the purpose of reviewing the final acts and decisions of statewide administrative agencies which do not exercise judicial power. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1084–1097.

19. Mandamus ⇐73(1)

Mandamus was the proper proceeding for employer to bring to compel the Employment Commission to set aside a decision awarding unemployment compensation to employees who were members of a union which was not on strike against employer but who refused to pass through picket lines established by other striking employees, where employer alleged that such award violated law. St.1935, p. 1226, as amended; St.1939, p. 8, § 56; Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1084–1097.

Petitioner sought a writ of mandamus in the District Court of Appeal, Third District, to compel the respondent Commission to set aside its decision awarding unemployment compensation to two of the corespondents, to compel it to deny such compensation to the other corespondents, and to compel it to correct petitioner's merit rating under the Unemployment Insurance Act, Stats.1935, p. 1226, chap. 352, as amended, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1939 Supp., Act 8780d. The writ issued as prayed. 101 P.2d 165. Thereafter a petition by respondents and corespondents for hearing in this court was granted.

There is no conflict as to the material facts. The California Employment Commission is charged by law with the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The petitioner, Bodinson Manufacturing Company, is an employer subject to the terms of the act, and both the company and its employees have contributed as required by law to the fund from which benefit payments are made from time to time to unemployed workers pursuant to the provisions of the statute. The five named corespondents are machinists who, for some time prior to May 24, 1939, had been employed by petitioner at its plant in San Francisco.

On the morning of May 24, 1939, a strike was called by certain of the petitioner's employees who were members of the Welders' Union, Local 1330. The corespondent machinists were not members of the Welders' Union, Local 1330, and did not go on strike against petitioner, but from May 24, 1939, to July 10, 1939, corespondents were unemployed solely because they refused to pass through the picket line which the striking welders had established around petitioner's plant. Corespondents applied for unemployment benefit payments and an initial determination was made under section 67 of the act, St.1939, p. 3010, denying their application. Two of the employees, Cailteaux and Harvey, appealed as permitted by section 67, and the decision was reversed as to them by the referee. The petitioner, Bodinson Manufacturing Company, thereupon appealed to the full Commission, see sec. 72, St.1939, p. 3013, which rendered its decision holding that the two employees were entitled to unemployment compensation under the act, and further indicated that it would award benefits to all others similarly situated. Having exhausted its remedies under the act (see Abelleira v. District Court of Appeal, 109 P.2d 942, this day decided), petitioner sought this writ of mandate on the theory that the Commission's order was in violation of the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Petitioner contends that the statute, properly interpreted, makes corespondents ineligible to receive benefit payments. The applicable provision is section 56, St.1939, p. 8, reading as follows: "An individual is not eligible for benefits for unemployment, and no such benefit shall be payable to him under any of the following conditions: (a) If he left his work because of a trade dispute and for the period during which he continues out of work by reason of the fact that the trade dispute is still in active progress in the establishment in which he was employed." The respondent Commission and the corespondent machinists contend that this clause was intended to disqualify only those workers who voluntarily leave their work because of a trade dispute, and that corespondents did not leave their work voluntarily. They further assert that the petitioner is not a proper party to raise the question by this proceeding in mandamus.

The main issue is one of statutory interpretation. It is necessary to determine the meaning of the legislative declaration that a workman is disqualified if he left his work because of a trade dispute. The fundamental rights of organized labor are not involved in this controversy. No one has challenged the right of labor to strike or to maintain picket lines for the purposes sanctioned by law. Cf. McKay v. Retail Automobile Salesmen's Local Union No. 1067, Cal.Sup., 106 P.2d 373; E. H. Renzel Co. v. Warehousemen's Union I. L. A. 38-44, Cal.Sup., 106 P.2d 1; C. S. Smith Metropolitan Market Co., Ltd., v. Lyons, Cal.Sup., 106 P.2d 414; Shafer v. Registered Pharmacists Union, Local 1172, Cal.Sup., 106 P. 2d 403; Lund v. Auto Mechanics' Union No. 1414, Cal.Sup., 106 P.2d 408.

[1, 2] It is not the province of this court to consider the arguments of social policy which have been urged upon it by each side; these are matters which must be, and no doubt were, addressed to the legislature. We have no authority to question the wisdom or unwisdom of the scheme set up by the statute, and we cannot deliberate upon the social desirability of making benefit payments to groups which are excluded by the statute. The conditions under which benefits are to be paid have been provided by the legislature. Thus, the sole question is whether the five employees in the present case meet the conditions which the statute prescribes.

[3] The statute does not provide its own procedure for testing whether a particular decision of the Commission awarding benefits is consistent with the authority delegated to the Commission under the act. The only express provision for court review is made by section 45.10, St.1939, p. 2058, which permits an employer to contest the legality of the contribution sought to be enforced against him by paying it under protest and then suing to recover the amount so paid. It does not follow from this, however, that the courts are without power to review a decision awarding unemployment benefits when it is alleged that the Commission has violated the plain provisions of the statute under which it functions.

[4-11] The question presented is one of law. We are not concerned here with the degree of finality which the legislature may have intended to confer upon the Commission's determinations of fact. The failure of the legislative body to provide a specific means of judicial review might well be held to indicate an intention that the Commission's decisions were to be final in so far as the legislature could make them final. Respondents would have us deduce from this, however, that the legislature intended decisions awarding benefits to be final, not only as to findings of fact, but also on matters of statutory interpretation and other questions of law. We recognize, of course, that an administrative agency charged with carrying out a particular statute must adopt some preliminary construction of the statute as a basis upon which to proceed. It is likewise true that the administrative interpretation of a statute will be accorded great respect by the courts and will be followed if not clearly erroneous. People v. Southern Pacific Co., 209 Cal. 578, 594, 595, 290 P. 25; Riley v. Thompson, 193 Cal. 773, 778, 227 P. 772; Colonial Mut. C. Ins. Co., Ltd., v. Mitchell, 140 Cal.App. 651, 657, 36 P.2d 127; 23 Cal.Jur. 776. See, also, United States v. Philbrick, 120 U.S. 52, 59, 7 S. Ct. 413, 30 L.Ed. 559; McCaughn v. Hershey Chocolate Co., 283 U.S. 488, 51 S.Ct. 510, 75 L.Ed. 1183; 40 Harv.L.Rev. 469. But such a tentative administrative interpretation makes no pretense at finality and it is the duty of this court, when a question of law is properly presented, to state the true meaning of the statute finally and conclusively, even though this requires the overthrow of an earlier erroneous administrative construction. Riley v. Forbes, 193 Cal. 740, 745, 227 P. 768; Hodge v. McCall, 185 Cal. 330, 334, 197 P. 86; 23 Cal. Jur. 776; see Federal Trade Comm. v. Payne, 194 U.S. 88, 99, 100, 24 S.Ct. 590, 48 L.Ed. 888; Koshland v. Helvering, 298 U.S. 441, 56 S.Ct. 767, 80 L.Ed. 1268, 105 A.L.R. 756; Iselin v. United States, 270 U.S. 245, 46 S.Ct. 248, 70 L.Ed. 566; 59 C.J. 1028; 29 Mich.L.Rev. 840, 844; Landis, Administrative Process [1938], pp. 150-152; Blachly & Oatman, Administrative Legislation & Adjudication [1934], p. 184. The ultimate interpretation of a statute is an exercise of the judicial power. Code Civ.Proc., sec. 2102; Sierra County v. Nevada County, 155 Cal. 1, 14, 99 P. 371; Signal Hill v. Los Angeles County, 196 Cal. 161, 236 P. 304; 23 Cal.Jur. 719. Also, Federal Trade Comm. v. Gratz, supra; Dismuke v. United States, 297 U.S. 167, 172, 173, 56 S.Ct. 400, 80 L.Ed. 561; 59 C.J. 944, sec. 564. The judicial power is conferred upon the courts by the Constitution and, in the absence of a constitutional provision, cannot be exercised by any other body. Calif.Const., Art. VI, sec. 1; Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 413, 156 P. 491, Ann.Cas.1917 E, 390; Standard Oil Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 6 Cal.2d 557, 59 P.2d 119; cf. Agricultural Prorate Comm. v. Superior Court, 5 Cal.2d 550, 571, 55 P.2d 495; Globe Cotton Oil Mills v. Zellerbach, 200 Cal. 276, 277, 252 P. 1038; 5 Cal.Jur. 683. Thus, if it were held that the statute was intended to vest final authority in the California Employment Commission to pass upon questions of law, the act would clearly be unconstitutional. Any such construction is to be avoided, if possible. People v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, 209 Cal. at page 594, 290 P. 25; County of Los Angeles v. Legg, 5 Cal.2d 349, 353, 55 P.2d 206; County of Los Angeles v. Riley, 6 Cal.2d 625, 629, 59 P.2d 139, 106 A.L.R. 903; 6 Cal.Jur. 615. Furthermore, the finality of decision which is contended for by corespondents in this case where the particular decision happens to be favorable to them might, in a future case, operate to prevent a workman whose just claim was denied by the Commission from applying to the courts for redress. Thus, despite procedural omissions in statutes creating administrative agencies, this court must, under well-settled principles, continue to exercise its constitutional authority to render final decisions on questions of law which are properly raised in connection with the acts of such agencies.

We are therefore required, for the first time, to construe the disqualification clause of the Unemployment Insurance Act which makes a workman ineligible for benefits if he has "left his work because of a trade dispute". It is a question upon which no authority exists in this state. Respondents contend that the language of the California statute, which says "left his work", implies that the laborer is disqualified for unemployment benefits only if he leaves his work voluntarily. See Fierst & Spector, "Unemployment Compensation in Labor Disputes", [1940] 49 Yale L.J. 461, 462. Reasoning from this premise, respondents contend that the corespondent machinists in this case did not leave their work voluntarily, but were prevented from going there by reason of the picket line of the striking welders. It is argued that if they did not leave voluntarily, the disqualification clause does not apply, and that benefits should be paid to them.

[12, 13] The weakness of this argument is not in the underlying premise upon which respondents rely, but in its application to the present case based upon the assumption that the employees who refused to pass the picket line did not act of their own volition. It is true that under the proper construction of the statute an employee who is prevented from working through no act of his own is entitled to compensation as, for example, where he is barred by force from the premises where he has been working. But that is not the situation here. If the picket line was maintained within the limits permitted by law, as this one presumably was, no physical compulsion was exerted to prevent corespondents from working. They were unemployed solely because, in accordance with their union principles, they did not choose to work in a plant where certain of their fellow employees were on strike. Their own consciences and faith in their union principles dictated their action. This choice is one which members of organized labor are frequently called upon to make, and in the eyes of the law this kind of choice has never been deemed involuntary. This very point was considered by us in a recent case dealing with the right of labor unions to picket, wherein the employer sought an injunction on the ground that the picket line operated as an unlawful compulsion upon other union men. We said "* * * it is obviously untrue that when truck drivers employed by other firms refuse to go through the picket line, they do so involuntarily. Such refusal is undoubtedly based upon the freely adopted rules of the local union to which they belong." C. S. Smith Metropolitan Market Co., Ltd., v. Lyons, Cal.Sup., 106 P.2d 414, 418.

[14] In brief, disqualification under the act depends upon the fact of voluntary action, and not the motives which led to it. The legislature did not seek to interfere with union principles or practices. The act merely sets up certain conditions as a prerequisite to the right to receive compensation, and declares that in certain situations the worker shall be ineligible to receive compensation. Fairly interpreted, it was intended to disqualify those workers who voluntarily leave their work because of a trade dispute. Corespondents in this proceeding in fact "left their work because of a trade dispute" and are consequently ineligible to receive benefit payments. It follows that the Commission's decision was erroneous as a matter of law and should be annulled.

Respondents have raised two further issues of a procedural nature. It is contended that the right to receive benefits cannot properly be raised by this proceeding in mandamus, and, in any event, that the employer is not a proper person to challenge a decision awarding benefits under the act. In our opinion neither contention is sound.

[15-19] The writ of mandamus is provided for in the Code of Civil Procedure, sections 1084–1097. It may be sought by a "party beneficially interested", sec. 1086, against "any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person, to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins". Sec. 1085. Historically the writ has been used for far narrower purposes than those for which it is used in this state today. Mandamus has traditionally been merely a proceeding to compel the performance of ministerial duties and has not been widely used as a method for reviewing the decisions of administrative agencies. United States ex rel. McLennan v. Wilbur, 283 U.S. 414, 51 S.Ct. 502, 75 L.Ed. 1148; United States ex rel. Riverside Oil Co. v. Hitchcock, 190 U.S. 316, 23 S.Ct. 698, 47 L. Ed. 1074; Cousens, "Legal Doubt or Determination as a Ground for Refusing Mandamus" [1936], 24 Georgetown L.Jour. 269, 272; U. of Pa.L.Rev. [1930], 407. In jurisdictions where other means exist for reviewing the acts and decisions of administrative bodies, either by specific statutory procedure or by writ of certiorari, there has been no necessity for enlarging the writ of mandamus beyond its conventional sphere. In this state, however, the law is now established that mandamus is the remedial writ which will be used to correct those acts and decisions of administrative agencies which are in violation of law, where no other adequate remedy is provided. Drummey v. State Board, 13 Cal.2d 75, 82, 87 P.2d 848; McDonough v. Goodcell, 13 Cal.2d 741, 91 P.2d 1035, 123 A.L.R. 1205; Whitten v. State Board, 8 Cal.2d 444, 447, 65 P.2d 1296, 115 A.L.R. 1; cf. 16 Cal.Jur. 765, 823; 27 Cal.L.Rev. [1939], 738. Our late decisions have recognized that the use of mandamus to review acts of administrative agencies is a departure from the traditional purpose of the writ, and that many historical theories concerning mandamus (as, for example, the technicalities of the rule that discretion in the inferior officer will bar the issuance of the writ) will not always be applicable where the writ is used to review the acts of administrative bodies. Drummey v. State Board of Funeral Directors, supra, 13 Cal.2d page 84, 87 P.2d 848; McDonough v. Goodcell, supra, 13 Cal.2d page 752, 91 P.2d 1035, 123 A.L.R. 1205. Thus, the writ has been used not only to compel administrative action which was refused in violation of law (Wahl v. Waters, 11 Cal.2d 81, 77 P.2d 1072; Anglo California National Bank v. Leland, 9 Cal. 2d 347, 70 P.2d 937; Peters v. Sacramento City Employees' Retirement System, 27 Cal. App.2d 10, 80 P.2d 179; Hartsock v. Merritt, 94 Cal.App. 431, 271 P. 381), but also to annul or restrain administrative action already taken which is in violation of law. Drummey v. State Board, supra; Clancy v. Stockburger, 10 Cal.2d 651, 76 P.2d 678; Rodgers v. Board of Pub. Works, 208 Cal. 291, 281 P. 64; Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 P. 582; Lotts v. Board of Park Com'rs, 13 Cal.App.2d 625, 57 P.2d 215. The writ of mandamus may therefore be used in this state, not only to compel the performance of a ministerial act, but also in a proper case for the purpose of reviewing the final acts and decisions of statewide administrative agencies which do not exercise judicial power. That being so, mandamus was the proper proceeding to bring in the present instance.

[20, 21] It is finally contended that the employer is not a proper party to challenge the decision of the Commission awarding benefits under the act. In providing for mandamus proceedings the Code of Civil Procedure, section 1086, requires only that the petitioner be a party "beneficially interested". The act provides in section 67, St.1939, p. 3010, that "any employer whose reserve account may be affected by the payment of benefits to any individual formerly in his employ may become an interested party to any proceeding under this article * * *". It is conceded that the petitioner took the required steps to become an interested party under the statute in the present case and, indeed, was the moving party in appealing to the full Commission from the decision awarding benefits to the corespondents. We are aware of no authority which holds that a person permitted by statute to participate as an interested party in the administrative hearings and to take appeals at the administrative level is, nevertheless, without a sufficient interest in the result to test the legality of the final decision before a court of law. Indeed, it seems to us that elemental principles of justice require that parties to the administrative proceeding be permitted to retain their status as such throughout the final judicial review by a court of law, for the fundamental issues in litigation remain essentially the same. Cf. L. Singer & Sons v. Union Pac. R. Co., 61 S.Ct. 254, 85 L.Ed. 198, Frankfurter, J., concurring at page 259, of 61 S.Ct., 85 L.Ed. 204. Furthermore, it seems apparent that the employer whose reserve account is affected is the only person having sufficient incentive to challenge a decision awarding benefits. Action by this employer provides the only procedural guarantee that the Commission can be held by legal process to comply with the requirements of the statute under which it operates.

Respondents suggest that the rules governing a taxpayer's suit to restrain a governmental agency from spending public money should by analogy control the result here. Cases are cited to the effect that a member of the public, whose only interest in the particular administrative act is that of a general taxpayer, should not in the absence of statute be permitted to interfere with the processes of government by bringing a court proceeding against the agency. See Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 43 S.Ct. 597, 67 L.Ed. 1078. The situations are not analogous. A more accurate parallel is furnished by the various administrative agencies created in this state and elsewhere with limited powers for the purpose of dealing with particular phases of the relationship between employers and employees. Hearings before such agencies are treated as adversary proceedings in which interested parties on each side of the question are permitted to appear. This is the procedure adopted in workmen's compensation acts and labor relation statutes, and we do not think the legislature intended to depart from it in creating the California Employment Commission. The adversary parties to these proceedings are entitled to such appeals as are permitted under the statute, and further, are entitled to appear in court to test the Commission's final decision, thus insuring compliance with the requirements of the law. Our conclusion is, therefore, that the petitioner was a proper party to test the legality of the Commission's decision awarding unemployment benefits by this proceeding in mandamus.

[22] It would of course be highly improper for this court to substitute its opinion for that of an administrative agency on matters which were properly entrusted to the agency to decide. In the present case, however, accepting the facts exactly as found by the Commission, it is clear that there was no statutory authority for the award of benefits to corespondents, and the peremptory writ of mandate should issue to annul the award.

The demurrers are overruled and the motions to quash the alternative writ are denied. The Commission is directed to disallow benefits to the corespondents, Haydock, Almeida and Martinez and to credit to petitioner's account all benefits heretofore paid to the other corespondents and to disregard the claims of corespondents in determining the petitioner's merit rating under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

We concur: EDMONDS, J.; TRAYNOR, J.; PETERS, J. pro tem.

SHENK, Justice, and WARD, Justice pro tem. (concurring).

We concur in the judgment on the ground that on the undisputed facts and the interpretation placed upon the statute the petitioner is entitled to the relief sought and granted.

ABELLEIRA et al. v. DISTRICT COURT OF APPEAL, THIRD DISTRICT et al.

S. F. 16357.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 7, 1941.

1. Master and servant ⇐78

Until Employment Commission determines facts upon which right to unemployment benefits depends, it is improper for a reviewing court to consider claims for benefits on their merits. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d; Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 67–72.

2. Prohibition ⇐11

"Prohibition" never issues to restrain a lower tribunal from committing more error by deciding a question properly before it, since, if lower court has power to make a correct determination of a particular issue, it clearly has power to make an incorrect decision subject only to appellate review and not to restraint by prohibition.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Prohibition".

3. Prohibition ⇐10(1)

"Prohibition" is not confined in its operation to restraining trial courts from acting in original proceedings, but the writ lies also to prevent a lower appellate court from reviewing on appeal a matter over which it has no jurisdiction.

4. Prohibition ⇐10(1)

As respects right to issue prohibition for "lack of jurisdiction", quoted phrase in its most fundamental and strict sense means an entire absence of power to hear or determine the case and absence of authority over the subject matter or the parties, but in its ordinary sense for purpose of determining right to review by certiorari restraint by prohibition or dismissal of an action, a much broader meaning is recognized and may be applied to a case where, though court has jurisdiction over subject matter and parties in fundamental sense, it has no "jurisdiction" or power to act except in particular manner or to give certain kinds of relief or to act without occurrence of certain procedural prerequisites.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Jurisdiction" and "Lack of Jurisdiction".

5. Prohibition ⇐10(1)

The concept of "jurisdiction" as respects issuance of prohibition for lack thereof embraces a large number of ideas of similar character, some fundamental to nature of any judicial system, some derived from requirement of due process, some determined by constitutional or statutory structure of a particular court, and some based upon mere procedural rules originally devised for convenience and efficiency, and by precedent made mandatory and jurisdictional.

6. Certiorari ⇐28(2)
Prohibition ⇐10(1)

Generally, any acts which exceed the defined power of a court in any instance, whether that power be defined by constitutional provision, express statutory declaration, or rules developed by courts and followed under doctrine of stare decisis, are in "excess of jurisdiction" in so far as that term is used to indicate that those acts may be restrained by prohibition or annulled on certiorari.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Excess of Jurisdiction".

7. Constitutional law ⇐275(2)
Master and servant ⇐11

The Unemployment Insurance Act, which contains a complete administrative procedure with provisions for one original determination and two appeals, fulfills every requisite of "due process of law." Gen. Laws 1937, Act 8780d; Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 67–72.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Due Process of Law".

8. Mandamus ⇐3(8)
Prohibition ⇐10(2)

The District Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to issue writ of mandate to Employment Commission restraining payment of unemployment benefits, and hence prohibition would issue from Supreme Court to restrain District Court of Appeal from enforcement of writ of mandate where employers had not exhausted the remedies provided by Unemployment Insurance Act, employers not having appealed to Employment Commission. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d; Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 67–72.

9. Action ⇐10

The doctrine of "exhaustion of administrative remedies" is that, where an administrative remedy is provided by statute, relief must be sought from administrative body and such remedy exhausted before courts will act.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Exhaustion of Administrative Remedies".

10. Courts ⇐90(1)

The doctrine of "exhaustion of administrative remedies" is not a matter of judicial discretion, but is a fundamental rule of procedure laid down by courts of last resort, followed under doctrine of stare decisis and binding upon all courts.

11. Master and servant ⇐78

The exhaustion of administrative remedies provided by Unemployment Insurance Act is a jurisdictional prerequisite to resort to courts. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d; Gen. Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 67–72.

12. Mandamus ⇐3(8)

The filing of appeal with Employment Commission by employers did not comply with rule of "exhaustion of administrative remedies" so as to authorize District Court of Appeal to issue writ of mandate to commission to restrain payment of unemployment benefits, where appeal was filed after mandate and stay order had issued and appeal was merely a formal step, not intended to have any substantial effect, and commission was then under restraint of court's order and unable to act upon merits of the case. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d; Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 67–72.

13. Mandamus ⇐3(8)

Employers who failed to exhaust administrative remedies under Unemployment Insurance Act were not entitled to writ of mandate to restrain Employment Commission from paying unemployment benefits on ground that employers would suffer "irreparable injury" because employers would ultimately be required to pay contributions at an increased rate, where employers' contention was purely speculative, it did not appear that contributions would be increased by the payments, and under act payments were required to be made regardless of any appeal. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 40; Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 1, 2, 39, 41, 45.10, 67.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Irreparable Injury".

14. Master and servant ⇐78

The provision of Unemployment Insurance Act that, if referee affirms an initial determination allowing benefits, such benefits shall be paid regardless of any appeal thereafter taken, was designed to carry out policy of act of alleviating evils of unemployment, as part of a national plan of social security in which federal and state legislation is coupled; very essence of act being its provision for prompt payment of benefits to those unemployed. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d; Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 1, 2, 67.

15. Mandamus ⇐3(8)

Employers who failed to exhaust administrative remedies under Unemployment Insurance Act were not entitled to writ of mandate to restrain Employment Commission from paying unemployment benefits on theory that term "appeal" within statutory provision that, if referee affirms initial determination allowing benefits, such benefits shall be paid regardless of any appeal thereafter taken, referred only to appeal to commission, and did not purport to prohibit stay pending review by court, where there was no review proceeding properly pending in a court, since District Court of Appeal which issued mandate had no jurisdiction to take over the proceeding. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, § 67.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Appeal".

16. Mandamus ⇐3(8)

Employers who failed to exhaust administrative remedies provided by Unemployment Insurance Act in failing to appeal to Employment Commission were not entitled to writ of mandate restraining payment of unemployment benefits on ground that appeal would be futile in that commission had already decided cases on similar facts against employers' position, since to countenance such view would break down the rule requiring exhaustion of administrative remedies before seeking protection of court. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d; Gen.Laws Supp. 1939, Act 8780d, §§ 67–72.

17. Prohibition ⇐10(1)

As respects right to prohibition, a tribunal generally has jurisdiction to determine its own jurisdiction, but once a tribunal, judicial or administrative, has made such determination of issue and has acted to assume jurisdiction of the cause, the rule no longer has any meaning, since jurisdiction to determine has been fully exercised by determination in favor of jurisdiction over cause and the question is no longer of jurisdiction to determine but of jurisdiction to act, and jurisdiction to act is always a subject of inquiry by a higher court.

18. Prohibition ⇐18

The writ of prohibition is not refused nor held in abeyance because lower tribunal may ultimately realize the error of its assumption of jurisdiction, but the writ is granted at the time act in excess of jurisdiction occurs.

SHENK and WARD, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Petition for writ of prohibition by Frank Abelleira and others against the District Court of Appeal of the State of California, Third Appellate District, the Honorable John F. Pullen and others, Justices thereof, to restrain the respondents from enforcing a writ of mandate and temporary restraining order issued against the California Employment Commission.

Writ issued.

Prior opinion, 102 P.2d 329.

Gladstein, Grossman & Margolis and George Olshausen, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Robert W. Kenny, of Los Angeles, amici curiae for petitioner California State Federation of Labor.

Maurice P. McCaffrey, of San Francisco, and Glenn V. Walls, of Sacramento, for California Employment Commission.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., John J. Dailey, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, Gregory A. Harrison, and Richard H. Ernst, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

Webster V. Clark and Rogers & Clark, all of San Francisco, amici curiae for respondent Associated Farmers of California, Inc.

Milton Marks, of San Francisco, for Gantner & Mattern Co.

J. M. Mannon, Jr., Edwin S. Pillsbury, George O. Bahrs, and McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, all of San Francisco, for Bodinson Mfg. Co.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

Upon rehearing of this case, we adopt our prior opinion with certain minor modifications, as follows:

"This is a petition for a writ of prohibition, to restrain the respondent District Court of Appeal from taking any steps toward the enforcement of a writ of mandate and temporary restraining order heretofore issued by that court and directed against the California Employment Commission. For convenience, the term "petitioners" will be used to refer to those who seek the writ of prohibition in the present proceeding; the term "respondent" will refer to the District Court of Appeal; and the term "employers" will be used to refer to those employers who sought and obtained the writ of mandate and restraining order from the District Court of Appeal, as well as to other employers represented by counsel participating in the argument as amici curiae.

"Petitioners are individual longshoremen ordinarily employed in the harbor of San Francisco and numbering about five thousand persons. As such workmen they are subject to the provisions of the California

Unemployment Insurance Act. Stats.1935, Chap. 352, p. 1226, as amended; Deering's General Laws 1937, Act 8780d; Deering's 1939 Supplement, p. 1697. Under the act a percentage of their earnings is deducted and paid into the unemployment fund, and this money, together with contributions from employers, is used to pay benefits to unemployed workers. The act is administered by a board known as the California Employment Commission, with powers usual to such commissions, including authority to adopt rules and regulations. Sec. 90, St. 1939, p. 3006. The procedure established by the act as it read at the time of this controversy is as follows: Application is made by an unemployed workman and notice thereof is sent to the employer. An initial determination is made by the adjustment unit, which is the lower tribunal. Notice of this determination and its reasons is sent to the applicant and the employers. If payment is ordered, any employer whose reserve account is affected by the payment may intervene and appeal, and payment will be stayed pending said appeal. Sec. 67. A referee is appointed by the commission to hear the appeal, which is conducted in the manner usual to such commission hearings, full opportunity being accorded to produce evidence and examine witnesses. Secs. 67–71. St.1939, pp. 3010–3013. The referee makes written findings and a decision which, unless further appeal is taken, becomes final; but appeal lies to the commission. Secs. 67, 68, 72. This appeal is heard on the record and on any additional evidence produced; oral or written argument may be permitted; and the commission thereafter makes its findings of fact and decision. The commission may also transfer to itself proceedings on any claim pending before the referee, thus affording in some cases an opportunity to expedite a decision by the commission itself. Sec. 72. Section 67 contains a provision reading as follows: 'If a referee affirms an initial determination allowing benefits, such benefits shall be paid regardless of any appeal which may thereafter be taken, but if such determination is finally reversed no employer's account shall be charged with benefits so paid as to each such determination so reversed.' The importance of this provision will hereinafter appear.

"During October and November, 1939, widespread unemployment occurred among petitioners. On or about November 10, 1939, they registered for work and made claim for unemployment benefits in accordance with the requirements of the statute. An initial determination was made by the adjustment unit that they were entitled to the benefits, and the employers, intervening, appealed from this determination. A hearing was had before a referee; considerable evidence was introduced and argument heard, following which, written briefs were filed. On December 15, 1939, the referee made his decision affirming the initial determination.

"On December 16, 1939, the employers applied to the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, for a writ of mandate and other incidental relief, in a proceeding entitled 'Matson Navigation Company v. California Employment Commission.' The employers objected to payment of the benefits on the ground that petitioners left work 'because of a trade dispute', which, under section 56 of the act, St.1939, p. 8, disqualifies employees from receiving unemployment benefits. In their application for mandate the employers also alleged that they intend to and will appeal to the commission; that they have not further exhausted their remedies before the commission because the proposed payment of benefits would violate the act; that in prior decisions the commission has indicated its position against the employers on the issue raised and would decide against them; and that the unemployment fund would be seriously damaged by the allegedly unlawful payments contemplated in this case.

"The District Court of Appeal issued an alternative writ of mandate and a temporary restraining order directed to the commission to withhold payment of unemployment benefits. The writ states that 'any such payments which may be made * * * are in violation of the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act', and orders the commission to refuse to pay as long as the asserted trade dispute is in progress, or to appear and show cause before the court why it has not done so. The restraining order was issued to enforce compliance with the mandate pending a final hearing on the alternative writ. The writ and restraining order having been issued ex parte, petitioners on December 18, 1939, made a motion to dissolve. The motion was argued, but the court submitted it without making any decision thereon at that time.

"Subsequently, on December 22, 1939, the employers filed an appeal from the decision of the referee to the commission itself which appeal is now pending.

"On or about December 26, 1939, petitioners applied to this court for a writ of prohibition. On January 5, 1940, we issued an alternative writ. The matter was heard and is here on briefs of counsel, together with a number of additional briefs of amici curiae representing the commission, other employers and parties interested generally in the issues of the case.

"The theory upon which the District Court of Appeal acted in issuing the writ of mandate clearly appears from the petition, the writ, and the briefs of counsel. The court, in ordering the commission to cease paying benefits, was undoubtedly of the belief that the commission was acting beyond its statutory powers, and consequently was without jurisdiction to make the payments in question. This is expressly asserted by certain amici curiae appearing for the employers.

"The theory upon which the writ of prohibition was sought is that the District Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to issue the writ of mandate prior to completion of the administrative proceedings, and that petitioners had no plain, speedy or adequate remedy otherwise. See Code Civ.Proc. sec. 1103, and authorities discussed infra.

[1] "It must be understood at the outset that the merits of the controversy between the original parties, involving the interpretation of the 'labor dispute' proviso in the Unemployment Insurance Act are not before us. The important question is not what should be the decision on that point, but rather how the decision should be made. In the normal course the commission would make it, and thereafter judicial review, if appropriate, might be sought by either employers or employees. See Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California Employment Commission, Cal.Sup., 109 P.2d 935, this day decided. The employers, in departing from this normal procedure, and asking for a judicial review before completion of the administrative proceeding, rely upon assumptions of fact not supported by any record in this court. They seek to justify their action by charging that the determination in favor of petitioners is in violation of the law. But there has not, as yet, been any such final determination by the commission. That body has power to review the evidence previously presented before the referee, and also to take new evidence and make new findings, approving or disapproving those of the referee. It has not yet determined the facts upon which the right to benefits depends, and until it does so, it is improper for a reviewing court to consider the claims on their merits. The issue actually before us does not concern the rights of petitioners or their employers, nor the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act. These matters were properly before the court and were decided in the Bodinson Mfg. Co. case, supra. The question here is whether boards and commissions, charged with the administration of a statute, may carry on their administrative proceedings to completion before being subjected to judicial review. The importance of that issue can hardly be over-estimated, since a curtailment of administrative jurisdiction usually means an enlargement of the duties of the courts in a field in which the courts traditionally are reluctant to enter.

"1. 'Lack of jurisdiction' as a basis for writ of prohibition.

"The first inquiry in this case must, of course, be as to the nature and meaning of 'jurisdiction'; and here three possible sources of confusion must be eliminated.

"First is the argument of the employers that the District Court of Appeal has general original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandate. This is not disputed, nor is the power of the court to review a final decision of the commission in issue. Whether the commission's decision as to the payment of benefits is subject to any judicial review, or whether it can be reviewed by mandate, are questions beyond the scope of this proceeding. They are considered and decided in the Bodinson Mfg. Co. case, supra. The writ herein was issued before any final decision of the commission was rendered, and the question before us now is whether the court could properly interfere with the uncompleted administrative proceeding.

[2] "Second is the nature of a writ of prohibition, which never issues to restrain a lower tribunal from committing mere error in deciding a question properly before it. If the lower court has power to make a correct determination of a particular issue, it clearly has power to make an incorrect decision, subject only to appellate review and not to restraint by prohibition. Hence, in examining the authorities, we must conclude that in those situations in which a writ of prohibition was issued, the particular action restrained was one beyond the jurisdiction of the court to take.

[3] "Third is the question whether this court has power to restrain or otherwise control the action of the District Court of Appeal. There can no longer be any doubt on this point. The writ of prohibition is not confined in its operation to restraining trial courts from acting in original proceedings; it lies also to prevent a lower appellate court from reviewing on appeal a matter over which it has no jurisdiction. Shriver v. Superior Court, 48 Cal.App. 576, 582, 192 P. 124; Commonwealth v. Yungblut, 159 Ky. 87, 166 S.W. 808; 50 C.J. 668, sec. 25. This court has in fact issued prohibition directed against the District Court of Appeal in two comparatively recent cases. Fay v. District Court of Appeal, 200 Cal. 522, 254 P. 896; People v. District Court of Appeal, 193 Cal. 19, 222 P. 353; see, also, Stout v. Farwell, 111 Cal. App. 31, 32, 295 P. 47.

"We now proceed to a consideration of the meaning of the term 'jurisdiction' in its relation to the granting of a writ of prohibition. The term, used continuously in a variety of situations, has so many different meanings that no single statement can be entirely satisfactory as a definition. At best it is possible to give the principal illustrations of the situations in which it may be applied, and then to consider whether the present case falls within one of the classifications.

[4] "Lack of jurisdiction in its most fundamental or strict sense means an entire absence of power to hear or determine the case, an absence of authority over the subject matter or the parties. See generally, 14 Am.Jur. 363, sec. 160. Familiar to all lawyers are such examples as these: A state court has no jurisdiction to determine title to land located outside its territorial borders, for the subject matter is entirely beyond its authority or power. See Taylor v. Taylor, 192 Cal. 71, 218 P. 756, 51 A.L.R. 1074. A court has no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the marital status of persons when neither is domiciled within the state. See Restatement, Conflict of Laws, sec. 111; Ryder v. Ryder, 2 Cal.App.2d 426, 37 P.2d 1069. A court has no jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against one not personally served with process within its territorial borders, under the rule of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714, 24 L.Ed. 565. See Doherty & Co. v. Goodman, 294 U.S. 623, 55 S.Ct. 553, 79 L.Ed. 1097, discussing modern exceptions to the rule. A court has no jurisdiction to hear or determine a case where the type of proceeding or the amount in controversy is beyond the jurisdiction defined for that particular court by statute or constitutional provision. See Cambra v. Justice's Court, 4 Cal.2d 445, 49 P.2d 1121. Other examples of lack of jurisdiction in this fundamental sense will readily occur.

"But in its ordinary usage the phrase 'lack of jurisdiction' is not limited to these fundamental situations. For the purpose of determining the right to review by certiorari, restraint by prohibition, or dismissal of an action, a much broader meaning is recognized. Here it may be applied to a case where, though the court has jurisdiction over the subject matter and the parties in the fundamental sense, it has no 'jurisdiction' (or power) to act except in a particular manner, or to give certain kinds of relief, or to act without the occurrence of certain procedural prerequisites. Thus, a probate court, with jurisdiction of an estate, and therefore over the appointment of an administrator, nevertheless acts in excess of jurisdiction if it fails to follow the statutory provisions governing such appointment. Texas Co. v. Bank of America, 5 Cal.2d 35, 39, 53 P.2d 127. The Superior Court may have jurisdiction over a cause of action and the parties to a suit for libel, but in the case of non-residents, a bond for costs is required by statute, and unless such bond is filed, it is without jurisdiction to proceed, and will be restrained by writ of prohibition. Shell Oil Company v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.App.2d 348, 37 P.2d 1078; see, also, Carter v. Superior Court, 176 Cal. 752, 757, 169 P. 667. A court with jurisdiction over a cause may hear and determine it and give judgment, but it cannot award costs in a situation not provided by statute. Michel v. Williams, 13 Cal.App.2d 198, 56 P.2d 546. The Superior Court may have jurisdiction over a particular cause, but a disqualified judge may not sit and hear it if objection to his qualifications is raised, and prohibition will lie to prevent him from trying it. Hall v. Superior Court, 198 Cal. 373, 387, 245 P. 814. Where an injunction is sought against enforcement of a public statute, the court, despite its general equitable powers, has no jurisdiction to issue it. Loftis v. Superior Court, 25 Cal. App.2d 346, 352, 77 P.2d 491; Reclamation District v. Superior Court, 171 Cal.

672, 154 P. 845. A court may have jurisdiction to grant a new trial after motion based upon proper statutory grounds, but has no jurisdiction to make the order unless the moving party has given his notice of intention within the prescribed statutory time. See Peters v. Anderson, 113 Cal.App. 158, 298 P. 76. The court has power under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure to set aside its judgment or order on motion where it was entered against a party through inadvertence, excusable neglect, or mistake; but that power is wholly lost at the end of the six months' period prescribed by statute. Estate of Hunter, 99 Cal.App. 191, 196, 278 P. 485. An appellate court may have power to hear and determine a particular case on appeal, but is without jurisdiction to do so unless the procedural step of notice of appeal within the prescribed statutory time is taken. Aregood v. Traeger, 94 Cal.App. 227, 270 P. 1002. And if the notice is given before judgment is actually rendered, the premature appeal will be dismissed (Aspegren & Co. v. Sherwood, Swan & Co., 199 Cal. 532, 250 P. 400), or a lower appellate court may be prevented from hearing it by writ of prohibition. Shriver v. Superior Court, 48 Cal.App. 576, 582, 192 P. 124. After reversal of a judgment with directions to the lower court, it has jurisdiction to enter judgment, but is limited by the directions of the appellate court and is without jurisdiction to permit amended pleadings to raise new issues; hence prohibition will lie to prevent it from retrying the case. Lial v. Superior Court, 133 Cal.App. 31, 23 P.2d 795. The same is true where the superior court, in an appeal from a justice's court on questions of law alone, attempts to try the cause de novo. Sour v. Superior Court, 1 Cal.2d 542, 36 P.2d 373.

"On a number of occasions the courts of this state have recognized the conflicting senses in which the term 'jurisdiction' is used, and have emphasized the point that in applications for prohibition or certiorari, the broader meaning is involved. In our own recent decision, Rodman v. Superior Court, 13 Cal.2d 262, 89 P.2d 109, 112, we said: '* * * some confusion exists with reference to what constitutes an excess, and what constitutes an error, in the exercise of jurisdiction. However, it seems well settled (and there appears to be no case holding to the contrary) that when a statute authorizes prescribed procedure, and the court acts contrary to the authority thus conferred, it has exceeded its jurisdiction, and certiorari will lie to correct such excess.' In Spreckels S. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 186 Cal. 256, 260, 199 P. 8, 9, where the commission made an award larger than the statute authorized and certiorari was sought, the court said: 'The difficulty arises from the different shades of meaning which the word "jurisdiction" has. As sometimes used, it means simply authority over the subject-matter or question presented. In this sense the Commission undoubtedly had jurisdiction in this case, and its award was not without jurisdiction on its part. But the word is frequently used as meaning authority to do the particular thing done, or, putting it conversely, a want of jurisdiction frequently means a want of authority to exercise in a particular manner a power which the board or tribunal has, the doing of something in excess of the authority possessed.' See also, Weintraub v. Superior Court, 91 Cal.App. 763, 769, 267 P. 733; State ex rel. Sullivan v. Reynolds, 209 Mo. 161, 107 S.W. 487, 491, 15 L.R.A., N.S., 963, 123 Am.St.Rep. 468, 14 Ann. Cas. 198, reviewing authorities on prohibition and quoting from Appo v. People, 20 N.Y. 531: '* * * The writ lies to prevent the exercise of any unauthorized power, in a cause or proceeding of which the subordinate tribunal has jurisdiction, no less than when the entire cause is without its jurisdiction.'

[5, 6] "The foregoing observations while by no means a complete description of the term, nevertheless, serve as a warning against a too restricted meaning. The concept of jurisdiction embraces a large number of ideas of similar character, some fundamental to the nature of any judicial system, some derived from the requirement of due process, some determined by the constitutional or statutory structure of a particular court, and some based upon mere procedural rules originally devised for convenience and efficiency, and by precedent made mandatory and jurisdictional. Speaking generally, any acts which exceed the defined power of a court in any instance, whether that power be defined by constitutional provision, express statutory declaration, or rules developed by the courts and followed under the doctrine of stare decisis, are in excess of jurisdiction, in so far as that term is used to indicate that those acts may be restrained by prohibition or annulled on certiorari. And, as a practical matter, accuracy in definition is neither common nor necessary. Though confusion and uncertainty in statement are frequent, there is a surprising uniformity in the application of the doctrine by the courts, so that sound principles may be deduced from the established law by marshalling the cases and their holdings in this field.

[7, 8] "2. The requirement of exhaustion of administrative remedies.

"Lack of jurisdiction in the District Court of Appeal to issue its writ of mandate is clearly established when the foregoing principles are considered in connection with a settled doctrine of administrative law. The Unemployment Insurance Act, summarized above, contains a complete administrative procedure, with provision for one original determination and two appeals, fulfilling every requisite of due process of law. Until that administrative procedure has been invoked and completed, there is nothing that the District Court of Appeal or any other court may review; it cannot interfere in the intermediate stages of the proceeding. The employers have no standing to ask for judicial relief because they have not yet exhausted the remedies given them by the statute. They still have their appeal to the commission, which appeal has not yet been decided adversely to them, and prior to the prosecution of this appeal they have no right to demand an extraordinary writ from a court.

[9] "This is the doctrine of 'exhaustion of administrative remedies.' In brief, the rule is that where an administrative remedy is provided by statute, relief must be sought from the administrative body and this remedy exhausted before the courts will act. The authorities to this effect are so numerous that only the more important ones need be cited here as illustrations. See Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303 U.S. 41, 58 S.Ct. 459, 82 L.Ed. 638 (National Labor Relations Board); Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line, 211 U.S. 210, 29 S.Ct. 67, 53 L.Ed. 150 [rate orders]; Porter v. Investors' Syndicate, 286 U.S. 461, 468, 52 S.Ct. 617, 76 L.Ed. 1226 [investment commissioners and permit of investment company]; United States v. Sing Tuck, 194 U.S. 161, 24 S.Ct. 621, 48 L.Ed. 917 [immigration and the powers of the Secretary of Labor]; Gorham Manufacturing Company v. State Tax Commission, 266 U.S. 265, 45 S.Ct. 80, 69 L.Ed. 279 [tax board]; Red River Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 69 App.D.C. 1, 98 F.2d 282, 284; Western Powder Mfg. Co. v. Interstate Coal Co. D.C., 5 F.Supp. 619, 621; Hegeman Farms Corporation v. Baldwin, 293 U.S. 163, 172, 55 S.Ct. 7, 79 L.Ed. 259 [liquor control board]; United States Navigation Co. v. Cunard S. S. Company, 284 U.S. 474, 52 S.Ct. 247, 76 L.Ed 408 [shipping board]; De Pauw University v. Brunk, D.C., 53 F.2d 647, 652; Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, D.C., 227 F. 708; Hammerstrom v. Toy Nat. Bank, 8 Cir., 81 F.2d 628 [tax board]; American Bond, etc., Co. v. United States, 7 Cir., 52 F.2d 318; Monocacy Broadcasting Co. v. Prall, 67 App.D.C. 176, 90 F.2d 421; Federal Trade Commission v. Claire Furnace Co., 274 U.S. 160, 174, 47 S.Ct. 553, 71 L.Ed. 978; St. Clair Borough v. Tamaqua, etc., Ry. Co., 259 Pa. 462, 103 A. 287, 289, 5 A.L.R. 20; Corstvet v. Bank of Deerfield, 220 Wis. 209, 263 N.W. 687, 697; Earl Carroll Realty Corp. v. New York Edison Co., 141 Misc. 266, 252 N.Y.S. 538, 543; 48 Yale L.J. 981; 51 Harv.L.Rev. 1251; 35 Columb.L.Rev. 230; 12 N.Y.Univ.L.Q.Rev. 393; 28 Mich.L.Rev. 637; 28 Cal. L.Rev. 129, 151, 154, 162. The California cases have consistently applied this settled rule. See Teeter v. Los Angeles, 209 Cal. 685, 290 P. 11; Collier & Wallis v. Astor, 9 Cal.2d 202, 70 P.2d 171; San Joaquin, etc., Co. v. Stanislaus County, 155 Cal. 21, 27, 99 P. 365; Dawson v. Los Angeles County, Cal.Sup., 98 P.2d 495.

[10, 11] "The rule itself is settled with scarcely any conflict. It is not a matter of judicial discretion, but is a fundamental rule of procedure laid down by courts of last resort, followed under the doctrine of stare decisis, and binding upon all courts. We are here asked to sanction its violation, either on the ground that a valid exception to the rule is applicable, or that despite the uniformity with which the rule has been applied, it may be disregarded by lower tribunals without fear of prevention by the higher courts. This last point cannot be too strongly emphasized, for the rule will disappear unless this court is prepared to enforce it. To review such action of a lower court only on appeal or petition for hearing would permit interference with the administrative proceeding pending the appeal or hearing, with the effect of completely destroying the effectiveness of the administrative body. The writ of prohibition can alone operate surely and swiftly enough to prevent this unfortunate result; and only if we recognize that the rule is jurisdictional will it be uniformly enforced. Bearing in mind the analysis of jurisdiction which has heretofore been made, and examining the authorities dealing with the rule, we are necessarily led to the conclusion that exhaustion of the administrative remedy is a jurisdictional prerequisite to resort to the courts.

"In Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, supra, an application was made to the federal district court to enjoin the National Labor Relations Board from holding a hearing, but the employer applicant did not comply with the board's procedure. The United States Supreme Court annulled a preliminary injunction despite the employer's contention that the board had no authority over it because it was engaged in interstate commerce. The court declared that to uphold the employer's contention would be in effect to 'substitute the District Court for the Board as the tribunal to hear and determine what Congress declared the Board exclusively should hear and determine in the first instance'. [303 U.S. 41, 58 S.Ct. 463, 82 L.Ed. 638.] The Court then went on to say: 'The contention is at war with the long-settled rule of judicial administration that no one is entitled to judicial relief for a supposed or threatened injury until the prescribed administrative remedy has been exhausted. That rule has been repeatedly acted on in cases where, as here, the contention is made that the administrative body lacked power over the subject matter.' The opinion of the court exhaustively cites the controlling authorities, and a footnote points out that 'the rule is one of judicial administration—not merely a rule governing the exercise of discretion.'

"In United States v. Sing Tuck, supra, petitioner alleged that he was a citizen seeking to return to the United States. An immigration inspector decided against his claim of citizenship, and he failed to follow the statutory provision for appeal to the Secretary of Labor, seeking instead a writ of habeas corpus. The court denied relief, declaring (page 167 of 194 U.S., 24 S.Ct. page 622, 48 L.Ed. 917) that the act 'points out a mode of procedure which must be followed before there can be a resort to the courts'. The opinion then states that even though it be contended that the administrative officers are acting without jurisdiction, 'it is one of the necessities of the administration of justice that even fundamental questions should be determined in an orderly way.'

"In Gorham Manufacturing Company v. State Tax Commission, supra, it was held that a suit against the New York Tax Commission to enjoin collection of a tax alleged to be invalid and levied under an unconstitutional statute was properly dismissed for failure of plaintiff to avail itself of the administrative remedy provided by the statute for revision and correction of the tax. The court said (page 269 of 266 U.S., 45 S.Ct. page 81, 69 L.Ed. 279): 'A taxpayer who does not exhaust the remedy provided before an administrative board to secure the correct assessment of a tax, cannot thereafter be heard by a judicial tribunal to assert its invalidity.'

"In Red River Broadcasting Company v. Federal Communications Commission, supra, a broadcasting company appealed to the courts from a decision of the commission granting a permit for the construction of another station. The appeal was dismissed on the ground that appellant had failed to exhaust its administrative remedies and hence could not invoke the jurisdiction of the courts. The opinion, citing numerous cases, states (69 App.D.C. 1, 98 F.2d page 284): 'It is a well-settled rule of judicial administration that no one is entitled to judicial relief until he has exhausted all prescribed, applicable, administrative remedies. Generally, the rule is stated as being conclusive of the rights of one who prematurely seeks judicial review, without intimation or suggestion that any judicial discretion is involved in its application.'

"In Porter v. Investors Syndicate, supra, [286 U.S. 461, 52 S.Ct. 620, 76 L.Ed. 1226], it was said that 'the legislative process remains incomplete' until the administrative remedy is exhausted.

"In Western Powder Manufacturing Company v. Interstate Coal Company, supra [5 F.Supp. 621], the court declared that it 'has no jurisdiction of such controversies until the administrative remedies have been exhausted'.

"This court recently gave the rule its full force in Collier & Wallis v. Astor, supra. In that case the Private Employment Agency law required that certain controversies be submitted to the labor commissioner subject to later appeal to the superior court. Plaintiff sued on a contract coming within the scope of the statute, and defendant objected that no determination by the commissioner had been made prior to commencement of the action. We sustained the objection, saying (page 206 of 9 Cal.2d, 70 P.2d page 174): 'The provision of section 19 of the Private Employment Agency Law providing for a reference to the labor commissioner of controversies arising under said act for hearing and determination by such official being a valid legislative enactment, any action brought in the Superior Court without first making said reference and securing said determination is prematurely brought and cannot be maintained.'

[12] "The mere filing of the appeal with the commission, after the mandate and stay order had issued, was not a fulfillment of the requirements of the rule. It was purely a formal step, not intended to have any substantial effect, for the commission was then under the restraint of the court's order, and unable to act upon the merits of the case. The courts have considered this type of evasion and have held that the rule of exhaustion of remedies is not complied with by the mere filing of an appeal; the remedies are not exhausted until the appeal is fully prosecuted. Consequently the filing of the appeal with the commission is no more a compliance with the rule than the participation in the original hearing before the Adjustment Unit, or the first appeal before the referee. See Southland Industries v. Federal Communications Commission, 69 App.D.C. 82, 99 F.2d 117; Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. Basham, 249 U. S. 164, 167, 39 S.Ct. 213, 63 L.Ed. 534. Thus, in Southland Industries v. Federal Communications Commission, supra, where the petitioner applied to the court while his petition for rehearing before the commission was pending and undecided, the court said [99 F.2d 120]: 'Upon the filing of its appeal in this court—its petition for rehearing being then undisposed of—appellant occupied the anomalous position of asking the Commission for administrative relief, and at the same time asking the court for judicial relief from the anticipated decision of the Commission. See Vincent v. Vincent, 3 Mackey 320, 322, 14 D.C. 320, 322; Chicago Great Western R. Co. v. Basham, 249 U.S. 164, 167, 39 S.Ct. 213, 63 L.Ed. 534; Doyle v. District of Columbia, 45 App.D.C. 90; Burnet v. Lexington Ice & Coal Co., 4 Cir., 62 F.2d 906. "Two courts cannot have jurisdiction in the same case at the same time." Lasier v. Lasier, 47 App.D.C. 80, 83. See Andrews v. Virginian Ry. Co., 248 U.S. 272, 39 S.Ct. 101, 63 L.Ed. 236. As appellant elected to petition for a rehearing, the Commission retained jurisdiction; and as it failed to act on the petition its decision has never become a final one from which an appeal could be taken. See Voorhees v. John T. Noye Mfg. Co., 151 U.S. 135, 14 S.Ct. 295, 38 L.Ed. 101; Kingman & Co. v. Western Mfg. Co., 170 U.S. 675, 18 S.Ct. 786, 42 L.Ed. 1192; Northern Pacific R. Co. v. Holmes, 155 U.S. 137, 138, 15 S.Ct. 28, 39 L.Ed. 99; Harrison v. Magoon, 205 U.S. 501, 27 S.Ct. 577, 51 L.Ed. 900. Consequently, this court is without jurisdiction.'

[13, 14] "3. The employer's assertion of irreparable injury.

"The employers seek to avoid the operation of the rule, however, by the contention that they would suffer irreparable injury if the administrative hearing were permitted to proceed and its orders made effective without judicial interference at this time. The cases they cite are those dealing with rate orders of regulatory commissions, where the administrative body imposes a confiscatory rate on a public utility. Continued operation of the business at the rate imposed pending the appeal may in some instances be so unprofitable as to amount to a destruction of the business, and therefore a taking of property without due process of law. The courts in these cases issue injunctions to stay the enforcement of the new rate until a final determination of its validity, in order to protect the constitutional rights of the petitioning utilities. In brief, these decisions establish the right to equitable relief to protect the property rights of a petitioner from irreparable injury immediately threatened by a void administrative act. The soundness of this proposition cannot be questioned, but it has no relevancy here.

"What injury do the employers show? They say that they will suffer in the event unauthorized payments are made to unemployed workers, because their accounts will be charged with such payments, and their reserve under section 39 of the act will be thereby decreased, with the ultimate result that they may in 1941 pay contributions at an increased rate. In examining this contention, we must remember just what the employers are trying to do. They are attempting to prevent payment of public funds in which they have no direct interest, by a body specially charged with the duty of making such payment. We held, in the Bodinson Mfg. Co. case, supra, that they are aggrieved parties entitled to demand judicial review. But the question here is not whether they are aggrieved to the extent necessary to gain standing on appeal or review. The question is whether the payment of benefits at this time constitutes such an immediate and irreparable injury as to warrant the drastic step of interfering with an uncompleted administrative proceeding, in defiance of an established rule of jurisdiction. To this question there are several decisive answers.

"In the first place, their whole contention is purely speculative. The maximum contribution which they can be required to pay under the statute is 2.07 per cent. This cannot be increased, and the extent of their possible injury would therefore be the loss of a hoped for lower rate under the so-called merit rating provision of the statute. This provision enables employers with a favorable employment experience to obtain a slightly lower rate of contribution, when their account on the commission books shows an excess of contributions over benefits paid. See secs. 39, 40, 41, St.1935, p. 1233, St.1939, p. 2147. But the narrow range in which the contribution rate fluctuates can be affected by a variety of circumstances and by numerous instances of unemployment. It cannot be determined at the present time whether this particular order of payment would, in the light of all the occurrences of the past year and any other period involved, actually result in a changed rate. See 88 Univ.Pa.L.Rev. 137, 142.

"Second, it is provided in section 67 of the act that in the event that any payments of benefits are found to be erroneous the particular employer's account shall not be charged with them. This being so, it is not clear how his contributions can be increased by the payments, since the factor determining the rate is made inapplicable in such event.

"The third answer is more fundamental; the mandate contravenes the express provision of section 67 that 'if a referee affirms an initial determination allowing benefits, such benefits shall be paid regardless of any appeal which may thereafter be taken * * *.' This is one of the most significant statements in the act. In substance it provides that when the initial determination has been reviewed and approved by the intermediate appellate authority (the referee), no further delay in payment shall be permitted even though the issues may be still further considered in a subsequent appeal. It was designed to carry out the policy declared in section 1, St.1939, p. 1968, of alleviating the evils of unemployment, as part of a national plan of social security in which federal and state legislation is coupled. Sec. 2. The very essence of the act is its provision for the prompt payment of benefits to those unemployed. See 88 Univ.Pa.L.Rev. 137, 139. Any substantial delay would defeat this purpose and would bring back the very evil sought to be avoided. The legislature recognizing the importance on the one hand of avoiding improvident payments without due consideration of the right thereto, and the danger on the other hand of withholding the payments for long periods through the slow processes of appeal to the commission and perhaps eventually to the courts, took a middle course. It provided for a preliminary appeal or review of the first determination where payments were ordered. This appeal, ordinarily decided in a short period of time, carries with it a stay. But when this second decision has also been made in favor of the applicants, the benefits begin, with protection, as already noted, for the employer in the event of later reversal.

"The proceeding instituted by the employers ignores this statutory objective, and attempts to do precisely what the statute forbids. Their position is that the challenge in a court of law of any of the numerous factual and legal determinations which the referee must make in any decision to pay benefits is sufficient cause for the statute to cease operating. They believe that to continue payments where the propriety thereof has not yet been settled by the courts is an invasion of their legal rights. But in truth there is nothing unusual in the provision, which is in force in some thirty-six of the states. The legislature has concluded on the basis of normal experience that the large majority of the administrative orders will be proper, and that to permit these justifiable and necessary payments to be postponed for long periods would defeat the objectives of the act. The courts have upheld similar provisions in workmen's compensation acts, where the statutes required payments of compensation after stay orders of limited duration, despite the pendency of proceedings on appeal or review. In Employers' Mutual Insurance Company v. Industrial Commission, 65 Colo. 283, 176 P. 314, an employer's insurance company sought to enjoin enforcement of a commission award until the court could pass upon the legal questions. This was denied, and on appeal the court said (page 316 of 176 P.): '* * * the judgment of the Commission in favor of a claimant is prima facie evidence of his right to recover. Procedure under the act is summary in character in order to furnish immediate aid to injured employees, and a careful reading of the statute as a whole leads to the conclusion that it was the intention of the legislature that payment of these weekly allowances should not be stayed. Indeed, to hold that such payments can be enjoined pending judicial review would in effect practically nullify one of the prime objects and purposes of the law.' And in Bannister v. Shepherd, 191 S.C. 165, 4 S.E.2d 7, 12, the South Carolina Industrial Commission made an award of compensation, from which the insurance carrier gave notice of appeal to the Supreme Court, meanwhile refusing to make the payments ordered. The statute provided that an appeal from an award of the commission should operate as a supersedeas for thirty days only, and thereafter the employer should be required to make payments until the issue was finally determined. The insurance carrier contended that if it were forced to pay and ultimately obtained a reversal, there would be no way to recover the payments erroneously made, and therefore the statute violated its constitutional rights. The court called attention to the rule that there is no right to supersedeas pending an appeal except where expressly authorized by statute; pointed out that the legislative purpose was to prevent the long delays incident to an appeal by an insurance carrier seeking to escape payment; and observed further that the Workmen's Compensation Act 'is a form of social legislation passed primarily for the benefit of the employee, and to prevent the burden of injured employees becoming charges upon society'. The opinion finally concludes: 'The Legislature has in clear and convincing language provided that an appeal shall only act as a supersedeas for a period of thirty days, whether or not this was a wise decision * * * it is not the province of this court to say.'

"The foregoing cases demonstrate the weakness of the argument that because a commission may make an occasional error in ordering some payment out of a public or semipublic fund, the courts must have the power to stay any and all payments during the lengthy period of judicial review. The legislature has concluded that it is wiser to have a system of unemployment compensation operating with a possible small percentage of error, than to have a system not operating at all. The legislative power to make such provision is unquestioned; the statutory language cannot be misunderstood; and for the courts that is the end of the matter.

[15] "To these arguments the employers answer that the statute does not in terms apply to the present case. Their theory is that the term 'appeal' in section 67 must be given a restricted interpretation, to refer only to an appeal to the commission, and that it therefore does not purport to prohibit a stay pending a review by a court. Parenthetically it may be pointed out that the employers have already appealed to the commission, and while that appeal is pending the order to cease payments violates the statute. But this inconsistency need hardly be stressed, for the entire argument begs the question. The issue is whether there is a review proceeding properly pending in a court. As we have already shown, the District Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to take over the proceeding, unless some valid exception to the rule of exhaustion of remedies could be established; and the employers, by way of proving such an exception, assume the very point in issue, namely, the pendency of a valid proceeding before the District Court of Appeal to review the merits of the administrative determination. It is impossible to explain away section 67 by such reasoning as this.

[16] "4. The assertion that appeal would be futile.

"One final argument of the employers to justify disregard of the administrative remedy may be noticed. They assert that the commission has already decided cases on similar facts against their present position, and therefore that an appeal in the instant case would be fruitless. This is, indeed, the slender thread upon which their entire case hangs. But again their position is unsound in principle and unsupported by the better authorities, for it was early perceived that to countenance this view would break down the rule of exhaustion of remedies. In substance the contention is that if they learn upon hearsay or by analogy that the administrative board may take a certain action, the board may be ignored and its ac tion treated as already taken. We should all be very much surprised, no doubt, to find such an assertion made in the judicial field. One might attempt, for example, to bring an original suit in the Supreme Court on the theory that the local superior judge was possessed of a particular opinion opposed to the views of the plaintiff, but he would receive scant consideration. The whole argument rests upon an illogical and impractical basis, since it permits the party applying to the court to assert without any conclusive proof, and without any possibility of successful challenge, the outcome of an appeal which the administrative body has not even been permitted to decide. This argument, though successful in a few cases, has been rejected by the weight of authority. In Gilchrist v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co., 279 U.S. 159, 209, 49 S.Ct. 282, 289, 73 L.Ed. 652, the court said that orderly action could not be defeated 'by alleging an intent to deny the relief sought.' And in Red River Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, supra, the opinion states: 'Appellant seeks further to excuse its failure, affirmatively to seek administrative relief, by contending that, even if it had attempted to do so, its request would have been denied; consequently, that its attempt would have been a futile and useless gesture. We cannot assume that consequence. If under such circumstances relief had been sought and denied, then there would have been a basis for appeal. * * * It cannot be heard to complain in this court that there was danger of refusal when it made no effort to do so.' See, also, United States Nav. Co. v. Cunard S. S. Co., 284 U.S. 474, 488, 52 S. Ct. 247, 76 L.Ed. 408; United States v. Felt & Tarrant Mfg. Co., 283 U.S. 269, 272, 51 S.Ct. 376, 75 L.Ed. 1025.

"It should be observed also that this argument is completely answered by those cases which apply the rule of exhaustion of remedies to rehearings. Since the board has already made a decision, if the argument of futility of further application were sound, then surely this is the instance in which it would be accepted. But it has been held that where the administrative procedure prescribes a rehearing, the rule of exhaustion of remedies will apply in order that the board may be given an opportunity to correct any errors that it may have made. See Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, supra; Carlson v. Railroad Commission, 216 Cal. 653, 655, 15 P.2d 859; Red River Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, supra; McCardle v. Board of Commissioners, 195 Ind. 281, 144 N.E. 877, 878.

"5. Jurisdiction to determine jurisdiction.

"The final contention is advanced that though all of the above conclusions may be entirely correct, and that in consequence the District Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to hear and determine the merits of the case, nevertheless it has power to hear and determine the question of whether it has jurisdiction. If by this statement it is meant that the court had jurisdiction to determine whether the employers had exhausted their remedies before the commission, the record itself is a conclusive answer. The employers have affirmatively alleged their failure to exhaust their remedies before the commission, and their entire argument is devoted to an attempt to excuse such failure. On this point there is no issue presented, but only an admitted fact. If, on the other hand, the statement means that the court had jurisdiction to determine whether it had jurisdiction of the merits of the cause, it is indeed a strange argument. Stated plainly, the proposition is that a court may temporarily interrupt any pending proceeding, administrative or judicial, and hold that proceeding in abeyance while it decides whether it had any power to interfere in the first place; and during all this time it is immune from any restraint by a higher court. If that is true as applied to this case, then there is no control over unauthorized, arbitrary assumptions of judicial power except the slow process of appeal or petition for hearing. We cannot, of course, lightly accept such a destructive doctrine, and it must be rejected unless compelled by the strongest logic and precedent. But upon careful study and examination of the authorities cited, we find neither.

[17] "The proposition, stated simply, is that a tribunal has jurisdiction to determine its own jurisdiction. This is a truism, and, subject to certain implicit limitations, is ordinarily a correct statement of law. It has its origin mainly in the cases holding that a court has inherent power to inquire into jurisdiction of its own motion, regardless of whether the question is raised by the litigants. See 15 C.J. 851, 852, §§ 170, 171; 14 Am.Jur. 368, sec. 168; Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U.S. 315, 325, 9 S.Ct. 289, 32 L. Ed. 690. It rests also upon the theory that until the court determines that it has jurisdiction and does some act in consequence, there can be no injury to the party who denies its jurisdiction. See Noland v. Superior Court, 26 Cal.App.2d 708, 80 P. 2d 76. It means only that the trial court or lower tribunal or body to which the question is submitted has such jurisdiction to make the first preliminary determination—not a final one; and no interference is permitted until it does decide the matter one way or the other. Until it acts to assume or refuse jurisdiction over the merits no one is entitled to complain.

"But once the tribunal, judicial or administrative, has made this determination of the issue, and has acted to assume jurisdiction of the cause, the rule no longer has any meaning. The jurisdiction to determine jurisdiction has been fully exercised by a determination in favor of jurisdiction over the cause; the question is no longer of jurisdiction to determine, but of jurisdiction to act. And jurisdiction to act is always a subject of inquiry by a higher court. The cases cited by the employers declare well-established law and are in accord with this basic distinction. For example, in Noland v. Superior Court, supra, the superior court made an order to show cause in a custody proceeding. Petitioner appeared at the hearing and moved to dismiss the order for lack of jurisdiction. The motion was submitted, and while pending and undecided, petitioner sought a writ of prohibition from the District Court of Appeal. The writ was denied. Chester v. Colby, 52 Cal. 516, in which a demurrer raising the jurisdictional point was pending and undetermined, is to the same effect. In neither case had the lower court taken any action in the cause at the time prohibition was sought; it was simply considering whether or not it had jurisdiction to act.

[18] "The situation presented in the instant case is entirely different. If the District Court of Appeal, in response to the employers' application and petitioners' objection thereto, had taken under consideration the question whether it had jurisdiction to issue the writ of mandate, we would have no reason to interfere pending its determination thereof. But the District Court of Appeal did more than this; it acted. It did not merely deliberate upon the question whether it should intervene in the administrative proceeding; it did intervene. The issuance of the writ of mandate with its stay was a positive assumption of jurisdiction, for it displaced the prior jurisdiction of the commission, and rendered that body powerless to proceed. To say that the District Court of Appeal, left alone, may ultimately reach the same conclusion as we do here, and therefore should not be restrained, is no longer an answer. The writ of prohibition is not refused nor held in abeyance because the lower tribunal may ultimately realize the error of its assumption of jurisdiction; it is granted at the time the act in excess of jurisdiction occurs. This very point was cogently stated by the court in Kilburn v. Law, 111 Cal. 237, 242, 43 P. 615, 617: 'It is said that the objection that the complaint does not state a case of which the court has jurisdiction is in the nature of a demurrer, and that the superior court has jurisdiction to consider all such questions, and they cannot be made the ground for a writ of prohibition. This point cuts too deep, and, if sustained so broadly, would deprive this court of all power to issue writs of prohibition in cases where a lower tribunal is exceeding its jurisdiction.' And in Brougham v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co., 2 Cir., 205 F. 857, 859, the court spoke in similar vein: 'It is sometimes said that every court has jurisdiction to determine its own jurisdiction. This is partly true and partly untrue. A court must as an incident to its general power to administer justice have authority to consider its own right to hear a cause. But the mere decision by a court that it has such right when it does not exist does not give it authority. A court by moving in a cause assumes authority but the assumption does not confer it.'

"The controlling test of the correctness of the employers' theory must necessarily be found in its practical operation. We have already referred to the cases which correctly apply it during the court's deliberation, and up to the time it acts. If it goes further, as the employers contend, we should expect to find some suggestion to that effect in the authorities. But all the California cases dealing with this situation have reached exactly the opposite result. In each case a commission or administrative officer assumed jurisdiction of a cause, and a superior court thereafter sought to take jurisdiction of the same cause. Under the theory urged here, if the court had jurisdiction to determine its jurisdiction, no higher court could stop this interference by prohibition, and the question whether the interference was proper would have to await an appeal. But in every instance the appellate court issued a writ of prohibition to restrain the lower court from interfering with the administrative proceeding.

"Thus, in Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. v. Hanby, 111 Cal.App. 382, 295 P. 562, an employee received an award from the Industrial Accident Commission and later sued in the superior court to enforce compliance therewith. It was held that the cause was within the jurisdiction of the commission, that therefore the court had no jurisdiction, and that a writ of prohibition should issue to prevent the trial. In Vallejo Bus Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal.App.2d 201, 65 P.2d 86, the Railroad Commission made an order permitting a utility to sell stock. The superior court gave a preliminary injunction. It was held that the court acted beyond its jurisdiction in thus interfering with the commission by such restraining order, and a writ of prohibition was issued to prevent the court from doing so. In Lee v. Superior Court, 191 Cal. 46, 214 P. 972 the Industrial Accident Commission, in a proceeding involving a nonresident minor, appointed a guardian ad litem to handle the award. The probate court sought to appoint a guardian of the estate. It was held that the commission's prior jurisdiction could not be usurped by the probate court, and that prohibition should issue to prevent its interference. Finally, in the recent decision in Evans v. Superior Court, 14 Cal.2d 563, 96 P.2d 107, the lower court sought to interfere by injunction with an administrative proceeding commenced by the Building and Loan Commissioner. This court issued a writ of prohibition to prevent such interference, saying (page 579 of 14 Cal.2d, page 116 of 96 P.2d): 'We believe that the trial court in the present case has acted and is acting in excess of its jurisdiction * * *. We have heretofore held that the statute authorizes the commissioner to appoint necessary assistants and it appears that the proceedings of the trial court are preventing the exercise of the authority thus conferred upon him.'

"It thus appears that under established principles of legal procedure the District Court of Appeal was without jurisdiction to issue its writ of mandate, and that petitioners are entitled to a peremptory writ of prohibition. The employers' application was founded upon an asserted right to judicial interference with an administrative proceeding before it became final, and hence impliedly claimed a right to interfere in the middle or the beginning, or even before any such proceeding was commenced. This attitude challenges judicial practices of long standing. The courts have repeatedly recognized the necessity of placing the numerous and complex problems arising under statutes of the type involved herein in the hands of expert bodies, familiar with the subject-matter through long experience. They have pointed out that to permit the initial consideration of these matters by the courts would not only preclude the efficient operation of the acts, but would overwhelm the courts with cases of a technical, specialized character, and seriously impair their capacity to handle their normal work. See Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., supra; United States v. Sing Tuck, supra; United States Nav. Co. v. Cunard S. S. Co., supra; Federal Communications Commission v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U. S. 134, 60 S.Ct. 437, 440, 443, 84 L.Ed. 656; Armstrong v. United States, 8 Cir., 16 F.2d 387, 389. The observation of the United States Supreme Court in Federal Communications Commission v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., supra [309 U.S. 134, 60 S.Ct. 443, 84 L.Ed. 656], is a timely reminder: 'It is always easy to conjure up extreme and even oppressive possibilities in the exertion of authority. But courts are not charged with general guardianship against all potential mischief in the complicated tasks of government.' We can with safety and assurance follow the traditional policy of the courts in this respect, remaining ready to review any final improper action (see the Bodinson Mfg. Co. case, supra), but permitting the administrative body initially to decide its myriad problems unhindered.

"Let a peremptory writ of prohibition issue restraining the respondent District Court of Appeal from taking any steps toward the enforcement of its writ of mandate and temporary restraining order heretofore issued and directed against the California Employment Commission."

I dissent.

The majority opinion and decision, when considered in connection with the decisions filed concurrently herewith in Gantner & Mattern Co. v. California Employment Commission, Cal.Sup., 109 P.2d 932, commenced December 5, 1939, and in Bodinson Manufacturing Co. v. California Employment Commission, Cal.Sup., 109 P.2d 935 commenced December 5, 1939, demonstrates the incongruity of the results which flow from the decisions in this group of cases.

In the Gantner & Mattern Company case, the District Court of Appeal regularly assumed jurisdiction to determine the right of the petitioner to the relief sought. That court issued an alternative writ of mandamus pursuant to its constitutional power, Const., Art. VI, Sec. 4b, and to sections 1084 to 1097 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No proceeding was commenced in this court or elsewhere to prohibit the District Court of Appeal from exercising its constitutional and statutory power in that proceeding. That court heard the matter on the merits on the petition and the return to the alternate writ and denied the peremptory writ, with opinion, and on the ground that the petitioner therein had not exhausted its statutory remedy. In due course the cause, transferred to this court for hearing and determination, has been decided by the majority on the same record presented to the District Court of Appeal and likewise on the merits and with the same result. For the purposes of this dissenting opinion, it matters not whether the District Court of Appeal denied or granted the peremptory writ. The fact is that this court has recognized the power of the District Court of Appeal to render a decision in that proceeding on the merits, and to have that proceeding pursue its constitutional course to this court and, in turn, this court has disposed of the proceeding on its merits.

In the present proceeding in prohibition, it appears that on December 16, 1939, the Matson Navigation Company and others commenced a mandamus proceeding in the same District Court of Appeal, wherein that court likewise issued an alternative writ and was proceeding to hear and determine the matter on a return to that writ and on a set of facts raising the identical issues on the merits as were involved in the Gantner & Mattern Company case. Yet this court in the present proceeding halted the prompt determination of the Matson Navigation Company case and is now denying power in the District Court of Appeal to dispose of that case in like manner as this court has now disposed of the Gantner & Mattern Co. case.

Furthermore, in the Bodinson Mfg. Co. case, this day filed, this court by a ruling on the merits, and to the same effect as determined by the District Court of Appeal, has decided that the petitioner therein had exhausted the statutory remedies and was entitled to an order of this court compelling the commission to deny the claims for benefits therein involved on the ground that the claimants were ineligible under the act to receive them.

Yet, in the present proceeding, this court has declared that the District Court of Appeal is without jurisdiction to decide whether the Matson Navigation Company had exhausted its statutory remedies and, if so, to decide whether the claimants for benefits in that proceeding were eligible to receive the same, or if not to deny the relief sought, as it had done in the Gantner & Mattern Co. case.

From the foregoing the conclusion is unavoidable that if the District Court of Appeal in the first instance and this court on transfer had jurisdiction to pass upon the merits of the Gantner & Mattern Co. case, as conclusively appears by the course taken in that case, then the District Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to decide, on identical issues, the Matson Navigation Co. case. On the other hand, if the District Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction in the Matson Navigation Co. case (as has been decided), then it would necessarily follow that this court has no such jurisdiction, the petitioners in the mandamus proceeding are without remedy in the courts, and the commission allowed to proceed without the restraint universally recognized to be necessary in the proper application of administrative law.

The sole question presented in the present proceeding in prohibition is whether the District Court of Appeal has the power to decide a certain controversy pending before it. That question here is not whether the employees affected are or are not entitled to unemployment benefits, but whether the petitioners in the mandamus proceeding pending before the District Court of Appeal have stated a case which that court has jurisdiction to entertain and determine. In my opinion, that court has that power and to deny it by the issuance of a peremptory writ of prohibition is to deny to parties interested the right to seek redress in our courts against threatened unlawful action on the part of a state administrative board.

The case presented to the District Court of Appeal is one calling for a judicial determination of the powers of the board under the statute of its creation. Particularly in that proceeding the problem is whether on the admitted facts the legislative remedy of appeal to the commission from the decision of the referee is adequate and, if not, whether it is not the legal duty of the California Employment Commission of its own motion, if need be, and contrary to its alleged intention, to set aside, pursuant to section 72 of the act, the decision of the referee affirming the initial determination allowing benefits, and in any event to disallow such benefits, and thus prevent the alleged illegal payments from the unemployment fund.

In the mandamus proceeding, the District Court of Appeal was called upon to decide two principal questions:

First, whether under the undisputed facts found by or under the authority of the commission, the claimants for payments from the unemployment fund were eligible to receive the benefits. Section 56 (a) of the act provides:

"An individual is not eligible for benefits for unemployment, and no such benefits shall be payable to him under any of the following conditions: (a) If he left his work because of a trade dispute and for the period during which he continues out of work by reason of the fact that the trade dispute is still in active progress in the establishment in which he was employed."

It is contended in the mandamus proceeding that the claimants, petitioners here, are not eligible for benefits under the foregoing section and under the facts found by, as distinguished from the conclusions of, the commission's referee. The question of the legal duty of the commission under the law and the facts was there squarely presented for that court's determination. The claimants have taken the position that the decisions of the commission allowing and directing the payment of benefits are beyond judicial review. Indeed, on oral argument counsel for the commission expressed this view. It cannot be true that this is the attitude of the members of the commission, who are public officers acting as trustees of a public fund which now contains an enormous amount of money collected from the employers and employees of the state for a specific purpose, namely, for the relief of employees who have been subjected to involuntary unemployment and who are eligible under the law to receive benefits. If the commission persists in payment to those who are ineligible to receive benefits, as is alleged in the pending mandamus proceeding, approximately a half million dollars will be unlawfully paid out of a fund whose beneficial and lawful administration was mistakenly anticipated in the litigation which resulted in declaring the constitutionality of the act under which the commission was created and is functioning. Gillum v. Johnson, 7 Cal.2d 744, 62 P.2d 1037, 63 P.2d 810, 108 A.L.R. 595.

To hold that a commission set up by a statute of this state with the highly important and responsible duties of the Employment Commission is not amenable to judicial process in the pending mandamus proceeding would be to constitute the commission an autocratic body whose functioning is uncontrolled by any consideration except its own whim and caprice. Such of course is not the law of this state, nor of any other jurisdiction, state or federal. In this state the District Court of Appeal has constitutional and statutory authority to direct public officers to perform their duties under the law. Const., Art. VI, sec. 4b; secs. 1084-1097, Code of Civ. Proc. That power is coextensive with the same power reposed in this court except that the decision of that court is subject to review by this court by appropriate order of transfer. It is contended that not only under section 56 (a) of this act are the petitioners herein ineligible to receive the claimed benefits, but that section 67 also prescribes that benefits shall be paid only to claimants who are eligible to receive them. To deny to the District Court of Appeal the right and power to decide whether the petitioners herein are or are not eligible under the statute and the admitted facts would be deliberately to shut our eyes to an alleged arbitrary, flagrant and unlawful assumption of power by the Employment Commission.

In my opinion there is not the slightest doubt that a justiciable controversy within its jurisdiction has been presented to the District Court of Appeal and that the issues there tendered present for determination also the question whether the petitioners before that court had exhausted their statutory remedies before the commission. This is the second principal question on the merits involved in the pending mandamus proceeding.

The majority opinion holds that the District Court of Appeal is without jurisdiction because the mandamus proceeding was prematurely brought in that the petitioners therein had not exhausted their remedies before the commission. It is noted that the Adjustment Unit of the Division of Unemployment Compensation in the department of the commission granted the application of the employees, petitioners herein, for the payment of benefits. Certain of their employers appealed from the determination of the Adjustment Unit under section 67 of the act. The commission designated a referee to hear the appeal pursuant to section 69. On that appeal the referee found the facts. The petitioners in the District Court of Appeal claim that those facts showed conclusively and as a matter of law that the claimants were ineligible to receive the benefits. But the referee concluded that the claimants were eligible to receive benefits and affirmed the initial determination of the Adjustment Unit. Section 72 of the act provides:

"Any party to a decision by a referee may appeal to the commission from such decision. The commission may on its own motion affirm, modify, or set aside any decision of a referee on the basis of the evidence previously submitted in such case, or direct the taking of additional evidence. * * *"

The majority say the District Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction in the mandamus proceeding because the petitioners had not taken and prosecuted to a final conclusion an appeal from the decision of the referee to the commission under section 72 of the act. Section 67 of the act provides for an appeal from an initial determination and then provides:

"If an appeal is duly filed benefits with respect to the period prior to the final decision on appeal, shall be paid only after such decision, except as hereinafter provided." Then follows the exception which is the crux of this phase of the present controversy. It reads: "If a referee affirms an initial determination allowing benefits, such benefits shall be paid regardless of any appeal which may thereafter be taken, but if such determination is finally reversed no employer's account shall be charged with benefits so paid as to each such determination so reversed."

The main opinion decides as a matter of law that an employer must take and pursue to conclusion this last appeal to the commission before he may seek redress from the courts, notwithstanding the presence of an immediately enforceable order for alleged illegal expenditures from the unemployment trust fund. It is clear to me that a bona fide controversy is presented in the mandamus proceeding on the question whether the remedy provided by the statute for an appeal to the commission is an adequate statutory remedy as required by law, inasmuch as the benefits must be immediately paid notwithstanding the pendency of such appeal. It is of course well established that when the legislative department has set up an administrative board to ascertain the facts and to take action thereon and has provided in the statute for hearings, rehearings, appeals and other proceedings before the board prior to its final decision, an interested party must exhaust his administrative remedies before he may resort to the courts for a redress of his grievances. But it is equally well settled that the statutory remedies before the board must be both appropriate and adequate. See Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, 303 U.S. 41, 58 S.Ct. 459, 82 L.Ed. 638; National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 57 S.Ct. 615, 81 L.Ed. 893, 108 A.L.R. 1352. To provide for an appeal to the commission from a decision of the referee would certainly appear to be appropriate. But whether the appeal to the commission provided for by this particular statute is adequate, under the circumstances presented to the District Court of Appeal, is a judicial question. The argument against the adequacy of the remedy provided by the final appeal to the commission is that since the benefits must be paid immediately upon affirmance by the referee and notwithstanding the pendency of such appeal to the commission from the order of affirmance, the subject matter of the court controversy, namely, the alleged illegality of the payments by reason of powers usurped by the commission expressly prohibited by the act, has evaporated and the question has become moot; that is, unless the court may intervene to prevent the alleged illegal payments from the trust fund, the express mandate of the statute will be violated and the unlawful action of the board placed beyond judicial scrutiny and control; that power reposed in an administrative board does not constitute it an autocratic body to the extent that it may, uncontrolled and with impunity, exercise its power contrary to the provisions of the act which created it; that it is well settled that "whether the commission applies the legislative standards validly set up * * * whether its proceedings satisfy the pertinent demands of due process, whether, in short, there is compliance with the legal requirements which fix the province of the commission and govern its action, are appropriate questions for judicial decision" Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros Co., 289 U.S. 266, 276, 53 S.Ct. 627, 632, 77 L.Ed. 1166, 89 A.L.R. 406; Federal Communications Commission v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 60 S.Ct. 437, 440, 84 L.Ed. 656; that prima facie the petition for the writ of mandamus before the District Court of Appeal presents a case of a threatened enforcement of an order on the part of the commission which will violate the express legislative mandate which is a prerequisite to valid payments within the rule repeatedly announced by the Supreme Court of the United States; that the so-called remedy by appeal to the commission from the order of affirmance of the referee is just as inadequate and futile as would be a statutory right of appeal from a judgment for money where a stay pending appeal is expressly denied the appellant and with a further statutory mandate that notwithstanding the pendency of the appeal the money must be paid, and the judgment satisfied; that it is no valid answer to this argument that the statute provides that in the event the commission on appeal should reverse the order of the referee "No employer's account shall be charged with the benefits so paid", for the reason that the employer, as a contributor to the trust fund has an additional interest in preserving the integrity of that fund as against illegal expenditure and dissipation thereof contrary to the express provisions of the act.

The foregoing arguments urged on behalf of the respondents are addressed to the merits of the controversy pending before the District Court of Appeal and are mentioned solely for the purpose of indicating that there is clearly a question of law presented to that court in a matter in which it has jurisdiction of both the parties and the subject matter under the constitution and laws of this state.

The majority say that the provision for payment of benefits pending appeal, when an initial determination for payment has been affirmed by the referee, was designed to carry out the policy declared in section 1 of alleviating the evils of unemployment, as part of a legislative plan of social security. This may be true where the payments are to persons eligible to receive the same under the act. But where the fact of ineligibility is concededly established and payments are threatened to be made to persons expressly excluded by the provisions of the act, do the majority still mean to say that such payments will carry out the legislative plan? The majority also say that to permit these "justifiable and necessary" payments to be postponed for long periods would defeat the objectives of the act. Would it defeat the objectives of the act to halt payments of benefits expressly forbidden by the act? On the contrary, would it not defeat the objectives of the act to permit payments of benefits expressly so forbidden? The legislature did not leave any question for determination to the referee or the commission when the facts unquestionably disclose ineligibility on the part of claimants to receive payment of benefits. The provisions of the act direct the commission and leave it no alternative.

Finally, the writ of prohibition should not issue if there is a "plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law", sec. 1103, Code of Civil Proc. The petitioners herein would have had such a remedy by petition to this court for a hearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal, if they had been dissatisfied with that decision. If the result in the mandamus proceeding had been the same in that court as in the Gantner & Mattern Co. case, as seems likely, it is fair to assume that the petitioners herein would not have been in a position to complain. In any event, if the mandamus proceeding had been allowed to take its usual course by decision in the District Court of Appeal and petition to this court, as the "plain, speedy, and adequate remedy" provided by the constitution, the long drawn-out process of the present proceeding for over a year and the consequent uncertainty of jurisdiction of District Courts of Appeal resulting from the majority opinion would have been avoided.

HARRIS et al. v. CANNON et al.

Civ. 6491.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 5, 1941.

1. Venue ⇐52½

A plaintiff has a right to oppose a motion for a change of place of trial on ground that action was not brought in county of residence of a defendant by showing that convenience of witnesses would be promoted by refusing a change.

2. Venue ⇐52(1)

Determination of question of retention of a cause of action on account of convenience of witnesses rests largely in discretion of trial court to which motion for change of venue is addressed.

3. Appeal and error ⇐965

Court's ruling on motion for change of venue and counter motion for retention of venue on account of convenience of witnesses will only be disturbed when an abuse of discretion appears.

4. Venue ⇐70

Where defendants filed motion for change of venue to county of defendants' residence on ground of convenience of witnesses but plaintiffs filed counter motion on ground of convenience of witnesses, order denying change of venue was not an abuse of discretion where one of plaintiffs set forth in affidavit in support of plaintiffs' motion names of six witnesses upon whom plaintiffs would rely, stating in substance nature of their testimony and defendants set forth in their affidavits the names of several witnesses but did not state what facts they could establish.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; M. G. Woodward, Judge.

Action by Sydney L. Harris and others against Fred B. Cannon and others for damages for failure to properly prepare and deliver certain reconditioned steel pipe or drill stem in accordance with an oral contract. From an order denying the motion of defendants for a change of venue, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Jesse A. Hamilton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Gumpert & Mazzera and J. Calvert Snyder, all of Stockton, for respondents.

PULLEN, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from an order denying the motion of defendants for a change of venue.

The action was for damages for failure to properly prepare and deliver certain reconditioned steel pipe or drill stem in accordance with an oral contract entered into between the parties hereto. The complaint was filed in the county of San Joaquin in which county the plaintiffs resided and had their place of business, and also where it is alleged the drill stem was to have been delivered.

To this complaint defendants filed an answer, and with the answer an affidavit of merits and a demand that the action be transferred to Los Angeles county. The motion for the change was made on the ground that the defendants were residents of the county of Los Angeles, and on the further ground of the convenience of witnesses.

Thereafter plaintiffs filed a counter motion and asked for an order retaining the venue in the county of San Joaquin on the ground of convenience of witnesses. These motions were heard together, and the court denied the motion of defendants for a change of place of trial, from which order this appeal is taken.

[1] The first contention of appellants seems to be that before the court can consider a motion for a change of venue upon the ground of convenience of witnesses the question of residence must be determined, and if defendant is found to be a resident of the county asserted in his affidavit, the action must be moved to such county before the convenience of witnesses can be inquired into. This, however, is not the rule. A similar contention was made in Sheffield v. Pickwick Stages, 191 Cal. 9, 214 P. 852, where Chief Justice Myers, then a Justice of the Supreme Court, clearly and directly held under pleadings similar to those found here, that a plaintiff has a right to oppose a motion for a change of place of trial on the ground that the action was not brought in the county of the residence of a defendant, by showing that the convenience of the witnesses would be promoted by refusing the change. This rule is also recognized and many cases cited in 25 Cal.Juris, p. 882.

[2, 3] As to the general right of a court to retain a cause on account of the convenience of witnesses, the authorities are in accord that such determination rests largely in the discretion of the trial court to which such motion is addressed, and will only be disturbed when an abuse of discretion appears. Plum v. Forgay Lumber Co., 118 Cal.App. 76, 4 P.2d 804. See, also, cases cited in 25 Cal.Juris, p. 885, note 20.

[4] Here there was no abuse of discretion. Affiant, one of plaintiffs, sets forth in his affidavit in support of his motion, the names of the six witnesses upon whom he would rely, stating in substance the nature of their testimony. Four of these witnesses resided in Stockton (as did, also, the affiant and his partner), one lived in Sacramento and one in Berkeley. Defendants set forth in their affidavits the names of several persons but do not state what facts they could establish.

The order is affirmed.

MACINTYRE et al. v. RETIREMENT BOARD OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

Civ. 11394.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Hearing Denied April 3, 1941.

1. Evidence ⇐83(2)

On acceptance of a position as officer or employee of a governmental agency, such as a municipality, an appointee assumably will perform his duties conscientiously and faithfully, whether or not an oath has been required.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐162(1), 220(9)

A municipal officer or employee who is guilty of conduct warranting dismissal should not continue in office or be permitted to receive other emoluments, such as a pension, offered as an inducement to honesty and efficiency, though he may be otherwise entitled to such other emoluments.

3. Municipal corporations ⇐220(9)

Without regard to time or vesting of pension rights, it is an implied condition of employment, and hence a condition of such vesting that the duties of a municipal employee shall have been faithfully performed, and if not, it is immaterial whether the proper authorities discover the misconduct and file charges before or after application for a pension, so long as the charges are filed before an order is made by the retirement board, since the filing of an application for a pension does not ipso facto retire the applicant.

4. Municipal corporations ⇐187

Municipal police officers who after having reached retirement age with sufficient years of service to entitle them to a pension, but who before order of retirement board granting pension, were dismissed from the police department, were not entitled to a pension.

5. Municipal corporations ⇐187

Retirement board of city and county was under duty to act either in favor of police officers seeking retirement on a pension or against them if it was not legally precluded from acting for or against them, but where officers were dismissed by the police commission because of charges of conduct unbecoming an officer, disobedience of orders, and insubordination, the board was prevented from acting.

6. Municipal corporations ⇐220(9)

Where judgment was entered for retirement board of city and county in proceeding by police officers for writ of mandate to compel the board to permit the retirement of the officers on pension, because of the fact that the officers had been dismissed because of misconduct, board was not, until appeal from the judgment was determined, in a position to act on the applications of the officers for retirement.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by Peter A. MacIntyre and another, against the Retirement Board of the City and County of San Francisco and others to compel the named defendant to permit the retirement of the petitioners on pensions as lieutenants of the Police Department. From an adverse judgment, the petitioners appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

J. Joseph Sullivan, of San Francisco, for appellants.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Reynald J. Bianchi, Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent City and County of San Francisco.

WARD, Justice.

An appeal by petitioners from a judgment denying their application for a writ of mandate to compel the retirement board of the city and county of San Francisco to permit their retirement on pension as lieutenants of the police department.

At the time of filing the application, each officer had reached the retirement age, with sufficient years of service to his credit, and had made all necessary contributions to the retirement system pension fund. Three days after the application of MacIntyre, and thirteen days prior to that of Mignola, to be retired from active service, a verified complaint setting forth charges of conduct unbecoming an officer, disobedience of orders and insubordination was filed against each petitioner with the board of police commissioners. Both officers were suspended, and tried before the police commission. Each was found guilty of the charges and dismissed from the department.

The question involved is whether an officer otherwise eligible for a pension and who makes an application therefor, but who is dismissed for misconduct by the police commission prior to final action on his application, is entitled to have such application granted. The sufficiency of the verified complaint, the weight of the evidence or the propriety of the order of dismissal are not involved in this proceeding.

Petitioners contend that their right to a pension vested upon attaining the required age, with necessary years of service, and the payment of proper contributions to the fund; in other words, that the right to pension vests upon the filing of the application and can not be defeated by dismissal thereafter. They rely primarily upon O'Dea v. Cook, 176 Cal. 659, 169 P. 366 and Kavanagh v. Board of Police P. F. Com'rs, 134 Cal. 50, 66 P. 36, which deal with pension rights as affected by subsequently enacted legislation. Petitioners' rights have nothing to do with subsequent legislation, but rather with the question whether such rights have been forfeited as the result of misbehavior.

[1, 2] It is assumed that upon acceptance of a position as officer or employee of a governmental agency, an appointee will perform his duties conscientiously and faithfully. In some instances an oath is required. When it is not required, efficiency and fidelity in the performance of duty are nevertheless paramount considerations. It is never contemplated that an officer or employee guilty of conduct warranting dismissal should continue in office or be permitted to receive other emoluments offered as an inducement to honesty and efficiency. The right to a pension is not indefeasible, and an employee, though otherwise entitled thereto, may not be guilty of misconduct in his position and maintain his rights notwithstanding such dereliction of duty.

In Douglas v. Pension Board, 75 Cal.App. 335, 340, 242 P. 756, 757, the court said: "The considerations upon which a government adopts, as a part of its administrative policy, a system for the pensioning of those who have continuously, for a specified period of years, served the government in the performance of public civil duties, both as officers and employees, are, in a large measure, these: (1) To encourage those public officers or employees who have by experience or otherwise demonstrated peculiar fitness for the performance of the public services to which they have been assigned to continue in the service of the government and at all times faithfully discharge the duties involved in such service. The hope held out for future additional reward or compensation for their public services to that which they receive concurrently with the period during which they are actually and actively engaged in performing such services is conducive to uniform faithfulness to and efficiency in discharging the duties which their offices or employments have exacted."

In People v. Greene, 87 App.Div. 589, 84 N.Y.S. 673, 674, the court said: "The pension roll is a roll of honor—a reward of merit, not a refuge from disgrace; and it would be an absurd construction of the language creating it to hold that the intention of the Legislature was to give a life annuity to persons who, on their merits, as distinguished from mere time of service, might be dismissed from the force for misbehavior."

[3, 4] Without regard to the time of the vesting of pension rights, it is an implied condition of employment, and hence a condition of such vesting that the duties of the employee shall have been faithfully performed; it is immaterial whether the proper authorities discover the misconduct and file charges before or after the application for a pension so long as the charges are filed before an order is made by the retirement board. The filing of the application does not ipso facto retire the applicant. It is necessary that an order of retirement be duly made. Up to that time the police officer, whether under suspension or in actual service, is under the control and jurisdiction of the police commission. If, prior to an order of the retirement board, he is dismissed upon charges of conduct unbecoming an officer, he is not entitled to "a pension" as that term is used in the charter.

[5, 6] In the closing brief, appellants stress the point that "respondents refused * * * to act upon the application". The contention is that the retirement board must act. We agree that it is the duty of such board to act either in favor of petitioners or against them, unless in effect it is legally precluded from acting, which is the condition here. An alternative writ was issued directing respondents to grant the pensions or show cause before the court at a designated time why they had not done so. Respondents filed an answer to the petition for the writ; petitioners demurred thereto and the demurrer was overruled. An agreed statement of facts was filed, with a stipulation waiving findings of fact and conclusions of law, and the matter submitted. Judgment was entered for respondents, and petitioners appeal. Until the appeal is determined, respondents are not in a position to act on the application for retirement.

Each side refers to the fact that unless services are discontinued by death or retirement, the officer or employee is entitled upon demand within a specified period to the "accumulated contributions". Appellants have not permitted respondents "to act". No demand for accumulated contributions appears in the record, and the matter not being an issue on this appeal, it is not necessary to determine any question in relation thereto.

Other questions of a technical nature have been presented by the petitioners but the decision arrived at on the subject discussed renders other consideration unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇐907(5)

Where probate court order directing payment of a monthly sum from excess income of an incompetent person's estate to his daughter and providing that sums paid should constitute an advance against any inheritance daughter might receive did not require daughter to acknowledge that payments should constitute advancements, and daughter signed a written election to remain in her father's home in compliance with court order, but that document was not a part of the record on appeal, the reviewing court was required to presume that document did not contain daughter's consent that payments should constitute advancements. Probate Code, § 1558.

2. Appeal and error ⇐553(2)

Under statute, an appeal may be presented and heard on a typewritten transcript of the judgment roll, duly certified by the clerk and the trial judge, even in the absence of a settled bill of exceptions or of a phonographic report of the trial. Code Civ.Proc. § 953a; Rules for the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal, rule 1, § 1.

3. Insane persons ⇐64

person would have aided the next of kin had he been of sound mind, the probate court had no authority to create an advancement to be paid to a daughter from the estate of her incompetent father or to direct that the allowance made to daughter should constitute an advance against any inheritance she might receive upon the death of her father. Probate Code, §§ 1050, 1558.

4. Descent and distribution ⇐93

An "advancement" is a perfect and irrevocable gift, not required by law, made by a parent during his lifetime to his child with the intention on the part of the parent that the gift shall represent a part or the whole of the portion of his estate that the child would be entitled to on the death of the parent intestate.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Advancement".

5. Descent and distribution ⇐94

Where a statute provides the method for creating advancements to be charged to prospective shares of heirs, that procedure is exclusive. Probate Code, § 1050.

6. Descent and distribution ⇐98, 117

The matter of making advancements to an heir which may have the effect of charging his share of the estate with payments previously made to him depends on the intention of the testator or donor, and that intention must be established by satisfactory evidence in order to charge the payments as advancements. Probate Code, § 1050.

7. Insane persons ⇐64

In absence of a statute authorizing the probate court to do so, it has no power to impress payments from the estate of an incompetent person upon the prospective shares of the heirs or next of kin as advancements. Probate Code, §§ 1050, 1054, 1558.

8. Descent and distribution ⇐110

Ordinarily, the question whether payments to heirs shall be charged against their interests in an estate as advancements is determined by the probate court at the time of distribution of the estate. Probate Code, § 1054.

9. Appeal and error ⇐907(5)

Where written document concerning daughter's election to reside with her incompetent father was signed by daughter at the probate court's request after rendering of order making allowance to daughter from excess income of incompetent father's estate and providing that sums paid to daughter should constitute an advance against any inheritance she might receive upon father's death, and document was not part of evidence adduced at the trial, the reviewing court could not assume, in support of the judgment, that document contained an acknowledgment of advancements merely because it did not appear in the record on appeal. Probate Code, §§ 1050, 1054, 1558.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; Roy B. Maxey, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the guardianship of the person and estate of Forrest M. Hudelson, an incompetent person, wherein Thirza L. Hudelson procured an order for the payment to her of a monthly sum from the excess income from the estate as necessary maintenance. From that portion of the order providing that any sums paid by the guardian to petitioner under the order should constitute an advance against any inheritance petitioner might receive upon the death of her father, the incompetent person, and that the guardian should keep an account of all sums so paid, Thirza L. Hudelson appeals.

Order modified by striking therefrom the portion from which the appeal was perfected.

Mark A. Joseph, of San Anselmo, for appellant.

Frank B. Collier and Hawkins & Hawkins & Cardoza, all of Modesto, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

Thirza L. Hudelson, the daughter of Forrest M. Hudelson, an incompetent person, has appealed from a portion of an order which she procured pursuant to section 1558 of the Probate Code to pay her from the excess income from her father's estate the sum of $50 per month, until the further order of the court, as necessary maintenance. That portion of the order from which this appeal was perfected is as follows: "and provided, further, any sum or sums of money paid by the guardian to petitioner under the provisions hereof shall constitute an advance against any inheritance petitioner might receive upon the death of her father, and the guardian of said incompetent shall keep an account of all sums so paid." It is contended the above-quoted portion of the order is unauthorized by law and void.

Upon the hearing of the application for allowance from the estate of petitioner's father under section 1558 of the Probate Code, the court found that she is the daughter and next kin of the incompetent person; that there is a surplus income from his estate not necessary for his maintenance; that the ward would have contributed to his daughter's support except for the fact that he is of unsound mind; that the petitioner was a resident in the household of the ward, and that a reasonable portion of the surplus income from the estate should be paid to the daughter. It was then ordered that Thirza M. Hudelson be paid $50 per month "until the further order of this court", in addition to her room and board, while she remains in the household of her father, or in lieu thereof, the sum of $100 per month if she resides elsewhere. It was further provided that all such payments shall be deemed to be advancements on account of any inheritance which she might receive from her father's estate at the time of his death, and that unless the petitioner shall elect in writing, within thirty days from the date of the order, whether she will remain in the home of her father or live elsewhere the petition will be deemed to have been denied.

[1] The appeal was perfected under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is presented on a typewritten copy of the judgment-roll, duly certified by the clerk and by the trial judge. No bill of exceptions was settled, and no phonographic copy of the proceedings of the trial was procured. The evidence which was adduced at the hearing is not before this court. It is conceded the appellant did sign a written election to remain in the home of her father, in compliance with the court order. But we are not informed of the exact contents of that document. It is not a part of the record on appeal. No motion for diminution of the record, to supply that instrument, was made. We have no means of determining what rights are determined by that written instrument. We must presume it does not contain the consent of the petitioner that her payments shall constitute advancements to be charged to her future share in her father's estate, for the court order requires no such acknowledgment.

[2] The respondent contends that this appeal is ineffectual for the reason that no bill of exceptions was settled, and because the filing of a typewritten transcript of the judgment-roll is in violation of rule I, section 1, of the Rules for the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal. It is further contended that section 1558 of the Probate Code, under which the application for an allowance was made, confers upon the court a discretion to impress payments allowed upon the prospective interests of heirs, as advancements. In support of that theory it is suggested that that section of the code specifically grants the court discretion to determine whether any allowance shall be made, and, if so, to designate the amount thereof.

It has been frequently held that, since the adoption of the amendment to section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, in 1915, an appeal may be presented and heard upon a typewritten transcript of the judgment-roll, duly certified by the clerk and the trial judge, even in the absence of a settled bill of exceptions or of a phonographic report of the trial as therein provided. Ramsay v. Rodgers, 189 Cal. 100, 207 P. 516; Benson v. Gardner, 14 Cal.2d 526, 95 P.2d 136; Charles v. City of Crescent City, 12 Cal.2d 241, 83 P.2d 34. The respondent's claim that this appeal is ineffectual is therefore without merit.

[3] The court was without authority to create an advancement to be paid to the daughter from the estate of her incompetent father under the provisions of section 1558 of the Probate Code, or to direct that the allowance should be made a charge against her future inheritance of any portion thereof. The statute contains no such provision. It merely gives the court discretion to allow a reasonable sum to be paid to the next of kin from the surplus income of the estate of an insane or incompetent person, which surplus is not required for the maintenance of the ward, conditioned upon first determining that "the ward would * * * have aided [the petitioner] if said ward had been of sound mind". The only discretionary authority of the court under such circumstances is found in the following language quoted from that section: "The granting of such allowance and the amounts and proportions thereof shall be discretionary within the court, but the court shall give consideration to the amount of surplus income available after due provision has been made for the proper support and maintenance of the ward, to the circumstances and condition of life to which the ward and said next of kin have been accustomed and to the amount which the ward would, in the judgment of the court, have allowed said next of kin, had said ward been of sound mind."

[4] An advancement is defined in 1 American Jurisprudence, at page 715, as follows: "An advancement is a perfect and irrevocable gift, not required by law, made by a parent, during his lifetime, to his child, with the intention on the part of the donor that such gift shall represent a part or the whole of the portion of the donor's estate that the donee would be entitled to on the death of the donor intestate."

Section 1397 of the Civil Code, which defined the nature of advancements, was repealed at the time of the adoption of the Probate Code. Section 1050 of the last-mentioned code now contains the only statutory requirements with relation to the creation of advancements.

[5, 6] Where the statute provides the method for creating advancements to be charged to the prospective shares of heirs, that procedure is the exclusive manner of creating such advancements. It is the uniform rule that advancements to an heir which may have the effect of charging his share of the estate with payments previously made to him, depends upon the intention of the testator or donor. That intention must be established by satisfactory evidence in order to charge the payments as advancements. Estate of Spreckels, 6 Coffey Prob.Dec. 375; 1 Cal.Jur. 477, sec. 2; 1 Am.Jur. 720, secs. 11 and 12; 26 A.L.R. 1089, note. In conformity with that rule, section 1050 of the Probate Code was adopted. It provides that advancements to an heir may be established only by proof of that intention on the part of the testator or donor expressed in writing, or by written acknowledgment thereof signed by the donee. That section reads: "A gift before death shall be considered as an ademption of a bequest or devise of the property given; but such gift shall not be taken as an advancement to an heir or as an ademption of a general legacy unless such intention is expressed by the testator in the grant or otherwise in writing, or unless the donee acknowledges it in writing to be such."

Quoting with approval from Beebe v. Estabrook, 79 N.Y. 246, it is said in Re Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 181 App.Div. 642, 168 N.Y.S. 952, 955, with respect to the exclusive control of the statute over the means of determining the existence of advancements that: " 'The right to charge advancements made by an intestate to his children against their distributive shares in his estate depends upon positive law, and the statute regulates the right and prescribes the circumstances and limitations under which the right exists.' "

[7] In the absence of a statute authorizing the court so to do, it has no power to impress payments from the estate of an incompetent person upon the prospective shares of the heirs or next of kin as advancements. It is apparent that such an order would lack the required proof of the intention of the donor to create advancements to be charged against the interests of the heirs. The statute confers upon the court no power to determine what the intention of an incompetent person might be with respect to the payment of allowances to needy relatives. After a person has been declared incompetent he is incapable of determining how his estate shall be disposed of, or whether payments to needy relatives shall be made as mere advancements.

[8] Usually the question as to whether payments to heirs shall be charged against their interests in an estate as advancements is determined by the court at the time of distribution of the estate. Sec. 1054, Probate Code; 3 Bancroft's Probate Practice, p. 1880, sec. 1143.

The respondent asserts that the appellant's signature to the written instrument of election required by the court constitutes an acknowledgment on her part, in conformity with the provisions of section 1050 of the Probate Code, that the payments to be made shall be charged against her interest in the estate as advancements. The appellant admits that she signed the document as required by the court, but declares that it merely consists of an election on her part to remain in the home of her father, and that it contains no acknowledgment or consent that the payments would constitute advancements to be charged against her as an heir of her father's estate. An examination of the challenged portion of the court's order discloses the fact that the petitioner was not required to sign a written acknowledgment that the payments would be considered as advancements. It merely required her to sign a written "election" within thirty days from the date of the order, with respect to "one of said alternatives" as to whether she would remain in or out of the home of her father. The reason for that requirement, as appears from the petition, was that the petitioner had previously resided with her father for several years and had rendered personal aid to him. It was desirable that she should continue to render that service. The determination as to whether she would remain in her father's home, or elect to live elsewhere fixed the amount of allowances to be received by her under the order of the court.

That portion of the order which clearly shows that the court did not ask nor require the petitioner to sign a written acknowledgment that her payments would constitute advancements reads as follows:

"It is hereby ordered that in the event petitioner continues to reside in the household of her father, she shall receive room and board, together with a monthly sum of $50.00 in cash, * * * until the further order of this court; or in the event petitioner elects to reside elsewhere she shall receive in cash the sum of $100 per month * * * until the further order of this court; provided, however, petitioner shall, within thirty days from this date elect in writing and file in this proceeding her acceptance of one of said alternatives [with respect to her future residence] * * * and provided, further, that any sum or sums of money paid by the guardian to petitioner under the provisions hereof shall constitute an advance against any inheritance petitioner might receive upon the death of her father, and the guardian of said incompetent shall keep an account of all sums so paid.

"It is further ordered that if petitioner fails to make an election within the time * * * as herein required * * * her petition for allowance shall thereupon be deemed denied."

[9] It will be observed the "election" which is required by the clear language of the court order has no application to the subsequent declaration that the payments shall be deemed to constitute advancements against any inheritances she might receive from the estate at the time of the death of her father. In the absence of the written document determining petitioner's choice with respect to her future residence, which is not before this court, we must assume the petitioner merely signed the written declaration of choice of residence, as required by the court, and that she did not voluntarily include therein an acknowledgment not required by the court that the payments might be considered as advancements. The written document, signed at the request of the court, subsequent to the rendering of the order for allowances, was not a part of the evidence adduced at the trial. We may therefore not assume, in support of the judgment, that the written document contained an acknowledgment of advancements, merely because it does not appear in the record on appeal. The court made no finding that such an acknowledgment had been executed, or that it would be required. Section 1558 of the Probate Code, under which the order for allowances was made, does not authorize the court to grant a petition for payments from the estate of an incompetent person, conditioned upon their becoming advancements. If the respondent assumes that the appellant voluntarily signed a written acknowledgment of advancements in conformity with section 1050 of the Probate Code, after the order for allowances was made, it was his duty to offer evidence of that fact by a motion for diminution of the record to present that document to this court. No such motion was made.

Section 1050 of the Probate Code is the only statutory provision of the California laws with respect to the creation of advancements. That section requires proof of the intention of the testator to create advancements, to be shown by his written declaration to that effect, or by written acknowledgment of the donee. Neither alternative has been complied with in this case. The incompetent person was incapable of either consenting to the payments or legally designating them as advancements. The petitioner signed no such acknowledgment. There is an absolute absence of compliance with the statute creating advancements.

Since the court was without authority to make an order of allowance from the estate of the incompetent person subject to the declaration, "and provided, further, any sum or sums of money paid by the guardian to petitioner under the provisions hereof shall constitute an advance against any inheritance petitioner might receive upon the death of her father, and the guardian of said incompetent shall keep an account of all sums so paid", the order should be modified by striking therefrom the foregoing quoted language, from which portion of the order this appeal was perfected. It is so ordered.

METROPOLITAN FINANCE CORPORATION OF CALIFORNIA v. MORF et al.

Civ. 12208.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 6, 1941.

1. Sales ⇐482

A finance corporation, lending money to retail automobile dealer on automobiles previously obtained by him from wholesalers and receiving in exchange trust receipts reciting that retailer held automobiles as trustee for such corporation, had no cause of action against registered legal owner, who financed wholesalers' acquisition of automobiles under trust receipt transactions, for conversion thereof, as such owner had right to possession of automobiles prior in time and superior to that of finance corporation.

2. Sales ⇐459

Trust receipts, given by automobile retailer to finance corporation loaning him money on automobiles before title thereto passed to him from wholesalers, vested no legal title to automobiles in such corporation, especially where retailer had not approved mechanical condition of automobiles or received properly indorsed certificates of ownership thereof, as contemplated by his contracts with wholesalers for purchase thereof, at time of execution of trust receipts. Vehicle Code, § 186, St.1935, p. 118; Civ.Code, § 1739, rule 3(2).

3. Estoppel ⇐75, 76

Where finance corporation, loaning money to automobile retailer in exchange for trust receipts reciting that retailer held automobiles previously obtained from wholesalers as trustee for such corporation, did not rely on any act of wholesalers, but relied solely on retailer's representation that he had automobiles in his possession, without taking any precautions to verify such statement, while wholesalers merely gave retailer possession of automobiles and did nothing to mislead corporation as to conditions under which retailer held such possession, wholesalers were not "estopped" to assert their title to automobiles in finance corporation's action for conversion thereof.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estopped".

4. Estoppel ⇐75

Persons intrusting another with mere possession of personalty do not hold him out as owner thereof, and hence are not "estopped" to assert title thereto.

5. Property ⇐9
Sales ⇐234(2)

Possession of personal property is prima facie, not conclusive, evidence of possessor's title thereto, and maxim caveat emptor applies in dealing with him as to such property.

6. Chattel mortgages ⇐84

Unrecorded trust receipts, given by automobile retailer to finance corporation loaning him money on automobiles of which he was given merely possession by wholesalers, were not valid as "chattel mortgages". Civ Code, §§ 2957, 3440.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Chattel Mortgages".

7. Sales ⇐473(1)

A finance corporation, loaning money to automobile retailer in exchange for trust receipts reciting that he held certain automobiles as trustee for such corporation, was not in position of "bona fide purchaser" of automobiles within Uniform Trust Receipts Law, as it did not obtain valid security interest in automobiles, but was nothing more than "pledgee" of personal property without change of possession. Civ.Code, § 3013, subd. 11.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George A. Dockweiler, Judge.

Action by the Metropolitan Finance Corporation of California against Haward Morf and others, for conversion of automobiles. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

J. Edward Haley, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Pierson & Block, by Ralph K. Pierson, all of Compton, for respondents.

DORAN, Justice.

The appellant herein appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants and respondents entered after a trial of the issues in an action brought by appellant for an alleged conversion of certain automobiles.

There is no conflict in the evidence. It appears therefrom that at the time of the transactions which gave rise to this litigation, one J. K. Woods was engaged in the retail used car business in the city of Los Angeles, and had been so engaged for a period of approximately ten years. Respondents Morf and Fewel were engaged together in the business of wholesaling used cars, either as partners or in the relationship of employee and employer, and the cars here in question were obtained by Woods from the said respondents. According to Woods' own testimony, his general course of business in such matters was as follows: "And I would look them over and whatever car I was interested in, I would ask him what they wanted for it, what price they wanted for it, and so forth, and finally tell him that I would take the car providing it was good mechanically. And they would deliver the cars to my place—their employees—and if the car was in such a condition that I wanted it at the price that they quoted me on it, I would have a check made out for it, my bookkeeper would make out a check for it and I would file it and when they brought in the pink slips, why, I gave them the check for the car. That was the way I handled it." According to Woods' further testimony, the cars here concerned appear to have been obtained upon such terms. Woods appears to have signed order blanks for the cars in question. However, though these blanks were marked for identification, they were not placed in evidence. The cars were apparently delivered to Woods during the period from January 14, 1937, to February 17, 1937.

According to the record, these cars, seven in number, were brought into California from outside the state, and were then registered in this state in the name of respondent Fewel. Respondent Covington was also registered in California as legal owner of four of the cars, and appears to have financed Fewel's acquisition of the said cars under trust receipt transactions.

Shortly after obtaining each of the said cars, Woods applied for and received a loan or advance from appellant upon each, giving to appellant in exchange an instrument denominated "Trust Receipt", which recited that Woods held the car in question as trustee for appellant, with right of sale. In the case of six of the seven cars involved, these so called trust receipts bear a date prior to the date when the cars were registered in California in Fewel's name. Appellant received no other instrument or document of title.

Registration of the said cars was never transferred to Woods or to appellant, nor did Woods or appellant ever receive the certificates of ownership of the said cars. At the time the cars were delivered to Woods, title to the same does not appear to have been transferred to respondent Fewel on the records of the Motor Vehicle Department of California. Although Woods drew checks to Fewel for the cars, the checks were never delivered to Fewel nor was any payment made to respondents for the said cars. Early in March, 1937, Woods was declared bankrupt and shortly before that time the respondents, or some of them, appear to have taken possession of the cars and the same were later sold to other persons.

It also appears that when appellant advanced the money to Woods on the cars there was no particular check made as to Woods' possession of or title to the same. The transaction was negotiated upon the presentation by Woods of slips of paper describing the cars in question, and Woods was not asked for either the white or pink certificate, neither of which he had. The loan transactions between Woods and appellant do not appear to have any direct connection with the acquisition of the cars by Woods from respondents. There was on file with the Secretary of State of California a statement covering trust receipt financing of respondent Fewel by respondent Covington, and a similar statement regarding such financing of Woods by appellant.

The court found that the plaintiff (appellant) was not the owner and entitled to possession of the said cars and that there had been no conversion by defendants (respondents).

[1] It is manifest that under the circumstances appellant could have no cause of action against respondent Covington for conversion of the cars. Covington as registered legal owner, and entruster of Fewel, is clearly shown to have a right to possession of the cars prior in time and superior to that of appellant, assuming appellant to have any interest. As will hereinafter appear, the doctrine of estoppel is not applicable to the facts presented.

[2] The nature of appellant's interest in the cars, if any, depends of course upon the true nature of the so called trust receipt transactions with Woods. These transactions were not of the type within the contemplation of the Uniform Trust Receipts Law, secs. 3012 to 3016.16, Civil Code. Appellant did not purchase the cars on behalf of Woods, nor did it take title to itself as security for its advancement or receive any bill of lading and draft or ownership certificate as agent for the seller. Furthermore it appears that the "Trust Receipts" were given by Woods to appellant before title to the cars passed to Woods. There had been no registration of the cars in Woods' name nor delivery to him of any endorsed certificate of ownership. Short of an estoppel there was nothing to prevent the application of the provisions of section 186 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 118, and the mere delivery of the cars to Woods was ineffective so far as vesting of any title or interest in Woods was concerned. The trust receipt before the passing of the title to Woods, was inoperative to vest any legal title in appellant, and, even if title had thereafter passed to Woods, the receipt in question could not have deprived him of title. People's Nat. Bank of Boston v. Mulholland, 224 Mass. 448, 113 N.E. 365.

The instant case is readily distinguishable from that of Commercial Credit Co. v. Barney Motor Co., 10 Cal.2d 718, 76 P.2d 1181, cited by appellant, in that there title to the car had been transferred directly to the finance company, while here that essential element of a trust receipt transaction is lacking.

Furthermore, aside from the applicable provisions of the Motor Vehicle Code, it is clear that in the sale of the cars to Woods by respondents the parties did not intend property in the cars to pass to Woods until approval by Woods of the mechanical condition of the cars and the delivery to him of a properly endorsed certificate of ownership. The sale was thus one upon approval, or terms similar thereto, and according to the rules for ascertaining the intention of the parties under section 1739 of the Civil Code, Rule 3(2), and upon the facts of the case, property in the cars had not passed to Woods at the time the trust receipts were executed.

[3-5] Respondents are not estopped to assert their title to the cars in question. In the first place, the evidence shows that appellant did not rely upon any act of respondents but relied solely upon Woods' representation that he had the cars in his possession and did not take any precaution to verify Woods' statement. In the second place, respondents had merely given Woods possession of the cars, and entrusting a third person with mere possession does not constitute holding him out as owner. Bice v. Harold L. Arnold, Inc., 75 Cal.App. 629, 638, 243 P. 468. Respondents had done nothing to mislead appellant as to the conditions under which Woods held possession and "nothing is better settled than that possession of personal property is prima facie, not conclusive, evidence of title and that the maxim caveat emptor applies". Pacific Acceptance Corp. v. Bank of Italy, 59 Cal.App. 76, 81, 209 P. 1024, 1027, quoting from the note to Davis v. First Nat. Bank, 25 L.R.A.,N.S., 760.

[6] Had Woods the authority or right to encumber the cars, the "trust receipts" would still lack validity as chattel mortgages, since they were unrecorded and failed to satisfy the provisions of section 2957 and section 3440 of the Civil Code. Hogan Finance & Mortgage Co. v. Mead, 205 Cal. 1, 4, 269 P. 610; Pacific Finance Corp. v. Hendley, 119 Cal.App. 697, 705, 7 P.2d 391.

[7] Appellant claims to be in the position of a bona fide purchaser of the cars and that it comes within the definition of a purchaser contained in the Uniform Trust Receipts Law, sec. 3013[11] Civil Code. As seen above, appellant did not obtain a valid security interest in the cars and therefore cannot come within such a definition. Nor does the case of Commercial Credit Co. v. Barney Motor Co., supra, support appellant. The bank in that case was clearly a bona fide purchaser. Appellant's position can be nothing more than that of a pledgee in a pledge of personal property without change of possession. The distinction between a bona fide purchaser and such a pledgee was expressly noted in the Barney Motor Co. case, supra, wherein at page 722 of 10 Cal.2d, 76 P.2d 1181, Pacific Finance Corp. v. Hendley, supra, was cited as involving the situation of a pledgee, and the latter case is directly in point here.

The evidence supports the findings of the court and the conclusions based thereon are correct.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

COUNTY OF LAKE v. FORBES et al.

Civ. 6425.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 5, 1941.

1. Paupers ⇐51

In county's action to recover from aid recipient's adult sons amount paid to recipient, evidence that during time recipient was receiving aid a son owned an automobile, had bought 20 shares of stock at $175 a share, paying one-third down, that he thereafter bought a new automobile and subsequently another one, and that his net income for one year was $3,000 and for preceding year about $4,000, sustained finding that such son was pecuniarily able to support his father. St.1937, p. 1094, § 2224.

2. Paupers ⇐51

The adult sons of an aged father who received aid from county could not avoid liability to county for sums paid to the father on ground that it was necessary for court to find the amount necessary to support the father before sons could be compelled to support him, since the action by county to recover sums paid does not arise out of statute providing for reciprocal duties of parents and children in maintaining each other. St.1937, p. 1094, § 2224; Civ.Code, § 206.

3. Paupers ⇐51

The statute authorizing an action by a county against spouse or children who are able to support recipient of aid from county is complete in itself and gives right of action to the county where certain facts exist. St. 1937, p. 1094, § 2224.

4. Paupers ⇐51

In county's action to recover from adult sons of aid recipient the amount of aid given, overruling demurrer to complaint which was amended to conform to proofs after trial was not error on ground that original complaint did not state that father was a poor person, where such allegation was required under statute providing for reciprocal duties of parents and children but was not required under Welfare and Institutions Code on which county's action was based. St.1937, p. 1094, § 2224; Civ.Code, § 206.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1040(10)

In county's action against adult sons of aid recipient to recover amount given to recipient alleged error in overruling demurrer to complaint which was amended to conform to proofs after trial was harmless, where no prejudice resulted from such ruling. St.1937, p. 1094, § 2224

6. Paupers ⇐51

A complaint in county's action to recover from aid recipient's adult sons the amount of aid given was not demurrable for failure to allege that board of supervisors passed a resolution authorizing commencement of action, where Welfare and Institutions Code, on which county's action was based, provided that board should merely "request" district attorney to proceed with the action, and no resolution was necessary. St.1937, p. 1094, § 2224.

7. Paupers ⇐51

The adult sons of recipient of aid from county could not avoid liability to county for amount of aid given on ground that under statute existing at time when aid was given it was necessary for board of supervisors to make a finding that sons were unable to support their father before relief could be granted to the father, and having made an order granting relief, board must have found that sons were unable to support their father, where legislature in enacting statute authorizing county to maintain action gave the superior court the power to determine whether or not adult children were able to support their father. St.1937, p. 1094, § 2224.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; Benjamin C. Jones, Judge.

Action by the County of Lake against George H. Forbes, Jr., and another, to recover the amount paid by plaintiff to defendants' parent, wherein defendants filed a demurrer. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Lovett K. Fraser, of Lakeport, for appellants.

Burt W. Busch, Dist. Atty., of Lakeport, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice.

This is an action brought by the county of Lake, pursuant to section 2224 of Welfare and Institutions Code, St.1937, p. 1094, against two adult sons, to recover the amount of $526 paid by respondent county to the parent of said sons under the provisions of the aforesaid law. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $526, and defendants have appealed.

On October 1, 1937, the board of supervisors of Lake county granted the application of George H. Forbes for aid under the provisions of division III of said code, and ordered that he be paid the sum of $35 per month until the further order of said board. Thereafter, and prior to January 16, 1939, the sum of $526 was paid to George H. Forbes by the county of Lake, pursuant to said order. At the time said order granting aid was made, George H. Forbes, Jr., and O. Forbes were the sons of said aged person, George H. Forbes, and were each of adult age.

Findings were made in favor of respondent upon all issues, and judgment against appellants in the sum of $526 was entered. The appeal is from such judgment.

George H. Forbes, at the time of the trial, was seventy-eight years of age. His only real property consisted of a house and lot, which were reasonably worth, together, $1,000. His personal property was under $50 in value. He had no other property. He was unable to support himself. His adult sons, mentioned above, contributed nothing to his support. Discussion of other facts appears later herein.

[1] It is contended by appellants that the finding to the effect that appellant George H. Forbes was pecuniarily able to support his father is not sustained by the evidence. The record shows that said appellant, during the time his father was receiving aid, owned a Dodge sedan worth $875; that he had bought twenty shares of American Telephone and Telegraph Company stock at $175 a share, paying one-third down; that in November, 1938, he bought a new Buick automobile; that after he bought the Buick, he bought a Chevrolet sedan; that his net income for the year 1938 was $3,000, and for the year 1937, about $4,000. It also appeared that he was married, but had no children. We hold the contention to be without merit.

[2] It is next contended by appellants that under section 206 of the Civil Code, it was necessary for the court to find the amount necessary to support the father before they could be compelled to support him. That section reads as follows:

"Reciprocal duties of parents and children in maintaining each other. It is the duty of the father, the mother, and the children of any poor person who is unable to maintain himself by work, to maintain such person to the extent of their ability. The promise of an adult child to pay for necessaries previously furnished to such parent is binding."

We do not believe that the action arises out of, or is governed in any manner by said section, but is based solely upon the provisions of section 2224 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, which we quote:

"Action by county against spouse or children able to support aid recipient: Disposition of sums recovered: Continuance of aid. If the person receiving aid has within the State a spouse or adult child pecuniarily able to support said person, the board of supervisors shall request the district attorney or other civil legal officer of the county granting such aid to proceed against the kindred in the order of their responsibility to support. Upon such demand the district attorney or other civil legal officer of the county granting aid shall, on behalf of said county, maintain an action, in the superior court of the county granting such aid, against said relatives, in the order named, to recover for said county such portion of the aid granted as said relative is able to pay. Any sum so recovered shall be credited by the county to the county and to the State in proportion to the contributions of the county and the State respectively.

"The granting of or continued receipt of aid shall not be contingent upon such recovery."

[3] This section is complete in itself, and gives a right of action to the county where certain facts exist. All of these facts have been here proven. The main question to be determined was whether or not the adult children were pecuniarily able to support the parent. The findings here are in the language of the statute, and, as we have pointed out, they are abundantly supported by the evidence. This contention is not made by the other appellant.

[4-6] It is also contended by appellants that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, which was amended to conform to proofs after the trial. The original complaint did not state that the father was a "poor person". Such allegation is required, appellants contend, by the provisions of said section of the Civil Code. As we have held that the complaint states a cause of action under the Welfare and Institutions Code, it was unnecessary to comply with section 206 of the Civil Code, in stating a cause of action in a case of this character. Assuming that the trial court erred in permitting the amendment, no prejudice resulted from the ruling. The point is without merit. It is also contended that the complaint is vulnerable to demurrer because it does not allege that the board of supervisors passed a resolution authorizing the commencement of the action. The point has no merit. The section of the Welfare and Institutions Code quoted above, provides that the board shall merely "request" the District Attorney to proceed with the action. No resolution was necessary.

[7] Appellants next contend that the board of supervisors found that they were not able to support their father, and that such finding is a conclusive determination of that issue. No express finding of that character was introduced in evidence. It is argued, however, that as the law stood in 1935, it was necessary for the board to make such a finding before relief could be granted to the father. Having made an order granting relief, they argue that the board then must have found that they were not able to support the parent. The legislature, in enacting said section 2224, gave the Superior Court the power to determine whether or not the adult children were able to support their father. The point is without merit.

Other questions are raised by appellants, but they lack sufficient merit to require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Where evidence of defendant's guilt of robbery was overwhelming, court did not abuse discretion in denying new trial sought on ground of newly discovered evidence, comprising testimony of new witnesses, who had allegedly been intimidated from testifying for defendant, that defendant was at home of one new witness at time of robbery. Pen. Code, § 1181, subd. 7.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Crum, Judge.

Raymond Fong Shee Shung was convicted of robbery, and, from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals.

Affirmed.

Abbott C. Bernay, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Gilbert F. Nelson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

Following his conviction after a trial before a jury on three counts of robbery, defendant prosecutes this appeal from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Epitomizing the facts as they appear in the record, it was testified at the trial that about one o'clock on the morning of Monday, June 17, 1940, a Chinese restaurant located at 11916 Ventura boulevard in the county of Los Angeles was held up and robbed by three men armed with guns, who bound the proprietor, William Wong, his wife and brother, and placed them in a rest room. One of the robbers, identified at the trial as the appellant, then at the point of a pistol commanded the victims to remain quiet. Certain money and other personal property was taken from the persons of the victims and from the premises. At the trial appellant was identified by Mrs. Wong and Paul L. Wong, while William Wong, who also identified appellant as one of the perpetrators of the robbery, testified that he had seen him in several other restaurants prior to the night of the holdup. On the occasion of the robbery appellant wore no mask and his face was visible to the victims. In the course of the robbery appellant took the wallet of Paul L. Wong, which contained a social security card and a chauffeur's license in the name of the latter. Six different witnesses were produced by the prosecution who identified the appellant as having used these documents while impersonating Paul L. Wong in order to cash fictitious checks to which he had forged Mr. Wong's name as an endorser.

Appellant took the witness stand in his own defense. He denied participation in the robbery or that he had ever been in the restaurant prior to his arrest. He claimed that he was sleeping in a Chinese laundry on West Sixth street in the city of Los Angeles on the Sunday night and Monday morning in question; that he went to sleep about 11:30 and did not arise until six in the morning. He admitted possession of the social security card and chauffeur's license of Mr. Wong, as well as the illegal use thereof, but claimed he found them in the rest room of a restaurant.

Upon this appeal appellant challenges only the correctness of the trial court's ruling in denying his motion for a new trial which was based solely upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. Pen.Code, sec. 1181, subd. 7. In support of this motion defendant tendered the trial court two affidavits in which the affiants deposed that they both were present at the home of one of them on the night the robberies were committed, and that appellant was also in that home at the hour when the victims testified they were held up. Both of these affiants further swore that they did not advise appellant of such knowledge on their part because of the receipt by them of an anonymous telephone call warning them not to testify for the defendant "upon penalty of incurring great harm to their persons". The affidavits further set forth the fact that by reason of such threats they were intimidated and did not acquaint defendant with such knowledge in their possession until after his trial. Although the affidavits do not set forth the location of the premises where the deponents stated the defendant was on the night of the robbery, we assume from a statement of counsel made on the hearing of the motion for a new trial that the home of one of the affiants was the Chinese laundry in which the defendant testified he spent the night in question.

[1, 2] It has repeatedly been said that the claim of newly discovered evidence as a ground for or warranting a new trial is uniformly looked upon by the courts with distrust and disfavor; that public policy demands that a litigant exhaust every reasonable effort to produce at his trial all existing evidence in his behalf. Indeed, the courts have gone so far as to say that the circumstance that the testimony has just been discovered when it is too late to introduce it is so suspicious that the very strictest showing of diligence is required. People v. Freeman, 92 Cal. 359, 366, 28 P. 261. Of course, it is recognized that despite the exercise of such effort, cases will sometimes occur where, after trial, new evidence most material to the issues, and which would probably have produced a different result is discovered. It is for such cases that the remedy of a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence has been given. People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 225, 116 P. 521. Manifestly, in the instant case appellant before the time of his trial was aware of the identity of the people present on the premises where he claimed to have spent the night when the charged offenses were committed. In fact, it appears from one of the affidavits filed with the motion for a new trial that defendant and his counsel, prior to the trial, were aware of the availability as a witness of one of the affiants whose evidence is now characterized as "newly discovered".

[3-6] In addition to due diligence, it is further required that the evidence be material and such as to render a different verdict reasonably probable upon a retrial. The question of the effect upon the case of the newly discovered evidence is, from its nature, peculiarly one that is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and it is only when a clear and unmistakable abuse of discretion is shown that the action of the trial court on a motion for a new trial will be disturbed on appeal. People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 P. 235. In the instant case we find no such abuse of the discretion vested in the trial judge when he determined that the newly discovered evidence was not of such character as to render a different verdict probable upon a retrial. The evidence of appellant's guilt was overwhelming and practically amounted to a demonstration thereof. He was positively identified by the witnesses for the prosecution, one of whom testified he had seen appellant on previous occasions prior to the night of the robbery, and as heretofore pointed out, six different witnesses testified to the possession by appellant of some of the property taken in the holdup.

For the reasons herein stated, the order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

2. Appeal and error ⇐994(3), 996, 1011(1)

It is the exclusive province of trial court to determine credibility of witnesses and weight and effect to be given to evidence, to consider inferences reasonably deducible therefrom, and to determine disputed fact from conflicting evidence.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

The reviewing court has jurisdiction to consider evidence only where there is no evidence to sustain a finding, or it can be said as a matter of law that evidence is insufficient to sustain it.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1009(2)

In suit involving a trust, findings that certain note was included in trust agreement and that it had not been outlawed would not be disturbed by reviewing court where findings were supported by ample evidence.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1078(1)

8. Appeal and error ⇐110, 782

An order denying motion for new trial being nonappealable, an attempted appeal therefrom was dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Dan F. Conway, Judge.

Suit by Mary Olivero against August Rosano and another, to quiet title to certain real property, wherein the defendants filed a cross-complaint naming Mary Olivero and another as cross-defendants. From an interlocutory judgment and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff and the cross-defendants appeal.

Judgment affirmed, and the appeal from the order dismissed.

Julius Hansen, of Fresno, for appellants.

Arthur Frame, of Clovis, for respondents.

KLETTE, Justice, pro tem.

Mary Olivero, plaintiff and appellant, brought suit against August Rosano and Mary Rosano, defendants and respondents, to quiet title to certain real property. Defendants and respondents filed a cross-complaint in which they named G. E. Olivero and Mary Olivero, husband and wife, as cross-defendants, and in which they alleged that on November 15, 1934, the Oliveros were indebted to defendants and respondents in the sum of $835, on a promissory note, and that on that date a deed was taken to the real property in question, in the name of defendants and respondents, who advanced the purchase price of $4,000, in cash and credit, upon the verbal understanding and agreement, that they were to hold title in trust for appellants, until all advances made by them, together with said sum of $835, represented by said note, were paid, with interest. Payment was to be made within one year, but time for payment was extended to November, 1936. It was alleged that there still remained unpaid on said advances, the sum of $1,837.13, and said sum of $835, together with interest.

The answer to the cross-complaint admits, in effect, most of the allegations thereof, merely realleging them in somewhat different detail, excepting as to the $835, which it is alleged was not included in the transaction, had been repaid prior to November 15, 1934, and that the entire transaction was barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appellants admitted owing $1,653.08, which they were willing to pay upon execution of deed to them.

It was stipulated by respective counsel, in open court, that appellants were indebted to respondents in the sum of $1,837.13, besides interest, but that this did not include the $835, and that the only issues before the court were as to whether this $835 had been paid, and also if barred by the statute of limitations.

The $835 note bore no date, other than 1930, and provided no date for payment, appearing to be the usual printed form of note, without the blanks filled in. Respective counsel have treated it as a demand note, which would outlaw within four years from the date of execution.

The trial court found for respondents on both of the issues presented, and rendered an interlocutory judgment that respondents held title to the real property in trust for appellants, as security for the payment of the sum of $3,153.85 (which included the $835, with interest thereon), which appellants were required to pay within ten months after the entry of judgment, whereupon respondents were required to convey said property to appellants. If said sum was not paid within the time specified, title to the real property was quieted in respondents. Plaintiff and cross-defendants appealed from this interlocutory judgment, and from the order denying them a new trial.

[1] There was a sharp conflict in the testimony, both as to the date when the note was made, and also as to whether paid. Respondents, the payees named in the note, had the note in their possession, with no endorsement of payments thereon, which raised a presumption it had not been paid. Rice v. Union Trust Co., 50 Cal.App. 643, 195 P. 720. Mary Rosano, one of the respondents, testified that the note was not paid, and that it was executed after Thanksgiving, 1930, which would bring it within four years of the time the trust was created, on November 15, 1934. Mary Olivero testified, just as positively, that the note had been paid, by being merged into another note, in 1931, and that the date of its execution was September, 1930, which would be more than four years before the creation of the trust.

[2, 3] It is a well recognized principle of law, that it is the exclusive province of the trial court to determine the credibility of the witnesses, the weight and effect to be given to the evidence, to consider inferences reasonably deducible from it, and from the conflicting evidence determine the disputed fact. It is only in cases where there is no evidence to sustain a finding, or where it can be said, as a matter of law, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain it, that this court has jurisdiction to consider the evidence. Thom v. Stewart, 162 Cal. 413, 122 P. 1069; Wood v. Lehne, 30 Cal. App.2d 222, 85 P.2d 910; Woods v. Cook, 14 Cal.App.2d 560, 58 P.2d 965.

[4] There is ample evidence in the record to support the findings that the $835 note was included in the trust agreement, that it had not outlawed at that time, and that it has not been paid, and therefore we cannot disturb these findings.

[5] While appellants, in their brief, confine their argument to the question as to whether the $835 note had outlawed before the trust agreement was made, yet in their answer to the cross-complaint, the plea of the statute of limitations goes to the entire cause of action set forth in the cross-complaint. We deem it necessary, therefore, to pass upon the question, from that point also.

[6, 7] This is an equitable action, to establish a trust, and must therefore be governed by the rules and maxims of equity. One of these is, that, "he who seeks equity must first do equity". Unwillingness to pay a just indebtedness, found to be due, does not commend one who seeks the aid of equity, to avoid payment of such indebtedness, on the ground that the debt, though morally due, is barred by the provisions of a statute, limiting the time within which an action to enforce payment of the obligation may be instituted. Bradley Co. v. Ridgeway, 14 Cal.App.2d 326, 58 P.2d 194.

[8] The judgment appealed from is affirmed. The order denying the motion for a new trial, being non-appealable Hill v. Fricke, 5 Cal.2d 320, 54 P.2d 460; Roberts v. Brae, 5 Cal.2d 356, 54 P.2d 698, the attempted appeal therefrom is dismissed.

An award by the Industrial Accident Commission must be upheld, if commission's finding is supported by any substantial evidence. St.1937, p. 265, § 3201 et seq.

2. Workmen's compensation ⇐665

An injury to mechanic in collision with truck while driving his automobile from town in which he was employed to city at time fixed by his employer for purpose of buying a hoist and arc welder for employer occurred in "course of his employment", and hence was compensable under Workmen's Compensation Act, though he had been expressly permitted by employer and planned to stop off at another city on route to visit relatives, as major purpose of trip was to perform employer's business. St.1937, p. 265, § 3201 et seq.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Course of His Employment".

3. Workmen's compensation ⇐665

An employee making trip necessitated by his work is in "course of his employment", so as to entitle him to compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act for injury sustained during trip, though he is serving some purpose of his own at same time. St. 1937, p. 265, § 3201 et seq.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇐617

Any reasonable doubt as to whether employee's act was contemplated by employment should be resolved in his favor in determining compensability of injury sustained while performing act, in view of state's policy of liberal construction of Workmen's Compensation Act in employee's favor. St.1937, p. 265, § 3201 et seq.

Proceeding by Walter Matthews for a writ of review to annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying petitioner compensation for injuries sustained while employed by Granville Naylor.

Award annulled.

Tebbe & Correia, of Yreka, and Edmund D. Leonard, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

E. A. Corten, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TUTTLE, Justice.

Petitioner seeks to review and annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying him compensation on a finding that injuries sustained by him did not arise out of, and in the course of his employment.

[1] There were two hearings held by respondent Commission. The first terminated in a denial of any relief to petitioner upon the ground that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. A rehearing was granted, and the second trial also resulted in the denial of any relief, upon the ground that the evidence failed to show that petitioner was injured in the course of his employment. That is the sole issue before us here. If there is any substantial evidence to support the finding of the Commission, the award must be upheld. At the second hearing it was stipulated that all the evidence introduced at the first hearing might be considered as a part of the record in the case.

[2, 3] There is no substantial conflict in the evidence, and respondents do not so contend. They insist, however, that from all the evidence adduced they were justified in inferring and finding that the injury did not arise out of the employment of petitioner.

On or about December 3, 1937, petitioner started out from Etna for San Francisco, by way of Healdsburg. He used his own automobile, and drove down Highway 99, which is admittedly, as the record shows, the usual and most direct route from Etna to San Francisco. While he was between the cities of Redding and Anderson, his car collided with a truck. As a result he suffered a fracture of the right hip and multiple contusions. He was confined to a hospital for twenty-one weeks, and his expenses in that connection were $458.95. His doctor bill was $522.50. The Commission held that the trip upon which he started was a personal mission, hence not compensable. Petitioner contends that he was, in making the trip, on the business of his employer, hence the injury arose out of his employment and he was therefore entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Division IV of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 265, § 3201 et seq.

It now becomes necessary to look at the evidence bearing upon the purpose and object of the trip. For a number of years petitioner was employed by respondent Naylor, at the town of Etna, Siskiyou county, as a mechanic. Around Thanksgiving Day, 1937, he told his employer that he wished to visit relatives in the city of Healdsburg, Sonoma county. Respondent Naylor gave the following testimony in respect to his reply to that request:

"A. He said he would like to go to Healdsburg to see his people.

"Q. Did he say how long he intended to be gone? A. He didn't say.

"Q. Did he say when he wished to go when he first mentioned it? A. He would like to go around Thanksgiving.

"Q. At the time of that statement or request to you, what conversation did you have with him about it; what request if any did you make of him with reference to it? A. We were pretty busy at the time; I had quite a little work, and I asked him if he couldn't put it off until a little later and do some work for me at the same time.

"Q. What was this work you wanted him to do for you at the same time he made the trip? A. I was figuring on buying a hoist and an arc welder, and he had worked in San Francisco and knew a lot of mechanics and knew how to get around better than I did, and I figured he would be better to hunt this equipment up than I would because he knew more about it."

The proposed trip was deferred until December 3rd. In the meantime they had another conversation, in which they agreed upon the date of departure, and the work to be done by petitioner in San Francisco. It was the same work as that described in the testimony given above. In respect to the date of the trip, respondent Naylor testified: "I picked the time for the trip; he didn't." The testimony of petitioner is as follows:

"A. We were talking one day and I asked him couldn't I get off for about a week for Thanksgiving; he said, 'You ain't going to leave me now because I got too much work.' He said, 'Will a little later do?' And I told him, 'Sure'. So I waited until we got the work caught up.

"Q. At that time when you asked him about the Thanksgiving trip was anything said about doing any errands for him in San Francisco? A. Yes.

"Q. Will you state just what was said at that time by Mr. Naylor? A. Going to Healdsburg he wished I would go on down to the City and look over some hoists and an arc welder down there that might be worth while to buy, and see about some new ones, too."

During the time of his absence, he was to receive his usual wages.

We believe that the only reasonable conclusion to be reached from the evidence is that petitioner was in the employ of respondent Naylor when the accident occurred, and the injury was therefore a compensable one. "If the trip is undertaken from a mixture of motives and the duty within the employment is not the major factor of the journey or movement, the injury is not compensable. * * * What is the major purpose of the trip is frequently a very close question of fact. The test is: If the work of the employee creates the necessity for travel, he is in the course of his employment, though he is serving at the same time some purpose of his own." Vol. I, Workmen's Compensation (Campbell) page 177, sec. 188. Here, the undisputed evidence shows that the employer refused to permit petitioner to make the trip as first planned. The undisputed evidence is that the second date of departure was picked by the employer and not by the employee. Thus it appears that there would have been no trip at all unless the business of the employer was attended to and performed. The city of Healdsburg is (though not in the most direct way), on the route between Etna and San Francisco. In our opinion the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn is that the main and chief purpose of the trip, as rearranged, was the business of the employer. It was the major factor of the journey. The only case on this point, cited by respondents, is London G. & A. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 587, 213 P. 977. There the claimant took some work to be done in his home instead of in the office where he was employed. He completed the work at noon, had lunch, and was opening the front door of his home, on his way to return to his office. He slipped on the floor and broke his hip. Compensation was denied, upon the ground that the particular work which he had taken home had been finished, and the injury, therefore, did not arise out of his employment. In the instant case the work which the employee had undertaken for his employer had not been performed. We are unable to accept the view that the evidence will support a finding that the petitioner was on a personal mission when he was injured. On the contrary, we believe that the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that the work of the employer created the necessity for the travel. Respondent Naylor refused to permit petitioner to take the trip when it was first suggested by the latter, and picked the time for the second. Furthermore, he expressly permitted petitioner to stop off at Healdsburg on his way to San Francisco. The employer cannot now be heard to contend that because he merely planned to make such stop, petitioner lost all right to compensation.

[4] In reaching our conclusion, we have, throughout, been guided by the section of the Act mentioned which expressly enjoins us to construe the law liberally. Also, we have been mindful of the rule that "Any reasonable doubt as to whether the act is contemplated by the employment, in view of this state's policy of liberal construction in favor of the employee, should be resolved in favor of the employee". Employers', etc., Corporation v. Industrial Accident Commission, 37 Cal.App.2d 567-574, 99 P.2d 1089, 1092.

The award is annulled.

1. Automobiles ⇐171(9)

Driver of each of two automobiles which collided at intersection had duty to look for approaching automobiles before entering the intersection.

2. Automobiles ⇐245(14, 61)

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision by plaintiff who was riding with co-employee, which occurred at unobstructed intersection, evidence failed to establish as a matter of law absence of negligence on part of defendant, which was proximate cause of collision. Vehicle Code, St. 1935, p. 93 et seq.

3. Appeal and error ⇐977(3)

The granting of new trial is a matter resting so largely in discretion of trial court that its action in that regard will not be disturbed except on disclosure of a manifest and unmistakable abuse of discretion.

4. New trial ⇐6

Discretion to grant new trial is not a right to exert mere personal or arbitrary will of the judge, but is governed by fixed rules of law to be reasonably exercised for accomplishment of justice.

5. Appeal and error ⇐977(3)

Action of trial court in granting new trial will not be set aside on appeal even if, as a matter of first impression, reviewing court might feel inclined to take a different view from that of trial court concerning propriety of its action, so long as the case made presents an instance showing a reasonable or even fairly debatable justification, especially where the question rests largely in fact and involves proper deduction to be drawn from the evidence.

6. New trial ⇐70

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision which occurred at an unobstructed intersection, action of trial court in granting to plaintiff a new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict for defendant was not an abuse of discretion. Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 93 et seq.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; Arthur Coats, Judge.

Action by Vincil Anderson against Edward F. Lang for injuries sustained in an automobile collision. Verdict was for the defendant. From an order granting motion for new trial, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Gerald M. Desmond, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Manwell & Manwell, of Marysville, for respondent.

MONCUR, Justice pro tem.

This is an action on the part of plaintiff and respondent Vincil Anderson to recover damages from defendant and appellant for personal injuries incurred by respondent as the result of a collision between an automobile in which respondent was riding and one driven by defendant and appellant.

The following is a sufficient statement of the facts for the purpose of a decision upon this appeal:

On June 21, 1938, plaintiff was riding in an automobile driven by one Oscar Benton, a fellow employee of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, who was driving south on a rural highway in Sutter county, known as Township road. The automobile driven by appellant Lang was proceeding easterly on the highway known as Franklin road. The two roads intersect at right angles, and the collision occurred east of the intersection at about 10 o'clock in the morning. Respondent and Benton were the only occupants of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company's automobile, and appellant was the sole occupant of the automobile which he was driving at the time of the accident.

The trial was before the court and jury, and after verdict by the jury and judgment thereon in favor of defendant, appellant herein, the trial court granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial upon the grounds stated in the motion, including that of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that the verdict is against law; and it is from the order granting the motion that this appeal has been taken.

[1, 2] The question for determination is whether there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in granting the motion. It is conceded that the question of contributory negligence on the part of Oscar Benton, the driver of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company automobile, is not involved in this appeal. It is the contention of appellant that it appears from the evidence as a matter of law that there was no negligence on the part of appellant Lang, which was the proximate cause of the accident and the resulting injuries to respondent. With this contention we do not agree. An examination of the record discloses that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence in many material respects. The intersection was an unobstructed one under the provisions of the Vehicle Code of this state, St. 1935, p. 93 et seq.

Appellant Lang testified that before entering the intersection he looked to the right and left and did not see any automobiles approaching. Both respondent and Benton testified that they saw appellant Lang approaching the intersection but that he did not appear to be looking or to see them approaching. It was the duty of both drivers of the automobiles to look for approaching automobiles before entering the intersection. If appellant Lang looked, as he testified that he did, he should have seen the approaching automobile in which respondent was riding. Either he did not look, or having looked, did not see that which was plainly to be seen. Also there is a sharp conflict as to the speed of the two automobiles, and as to which entered the intersection first.

[3-5] The law of this state concerning appeals in matters of this kind is so well settled that it scarcely requires the citation of authorities in connection with the law in this respect. Both appellant and respondent cite the case of Harrison v. Sutter Street Railway Co., 116 Cal. 156, at page 161, 47 P. 1019, at page 1020, and we quote as follows from that case:

"That the granting of a new trial is a thing resting so largely in the discretion of the trial court that its action in that regard will not be disturbed except upon the disclosure of a manifest and unmistakable abuse, has become axiomatic, and requires no citation of authority in its support. It is true that such discretion is not a right to the exertion of the mere personal or arbitrary will of the judge, but is a power governed by fixed rules of law, and to be reasonably exercised within those rules, to the accomplishment of justice. But, so long as a case made presents an instance showing a reasonable, or even fairly debatable, justification under the law for the action taken, such action will not be here set aside, even if, as a question of first impression, we might feel inclined to take a different view from that of the court below as to the propriety of its action. More especially is this true where, as here, the question rests largely in fact, and involves the proper deduction to be drawn from the evidence. The opportunities of the trial court in such instances for reaching just conclusions are, as a general thing, so superior to our own that we will not presume to set our judgment against that of the former where there appears any reasonable room for difference."

The foregoing has been cited with approval by the Supreme and Appellate courts of this state in many instances. It will suffice to refer to two of those cases, both of which have been cited in the instant case. Koyer v. McComber, 12 Cal. 2d 175, 82 P.2d 941, and Menne v. Friermuth Co., 130 Cal.App. 106, 19 P.2d 535.

The appeal in the case of Koyer v. McComber, supra, cited and relied upon by appellant, was before the district court of appeal in the first instance, and the decision therein appears in Cal.App., 75 P.2d 89. In that case there was an order granting a motion for a new trial. The district court of appeal reversed the trial court. A hearing was granted by the Supreme Court, and that court affirmed the trial court's order granting a new trial. Thereon concerning the question of the insufficiency of the evidence the Supreme Court, 12 Cal.2d at page 183, 82 P.2d at page 945, said:

"We think it unnecessary to discuss the further ground upon which the motion for a new trial was granted—that is, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict finding the defendants guilty of fraud in said transaction. Conceding that there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict as to all answering defendants, it is apparent that there was a substantial conflict in this evidence [respecting the class of building of an apartment house] * * *. This conflict was evidently resolved by the trial court in favor of the defendants and, as shown by the authorities heretofore cited, all intendments are to be indulged in by a reviewing court in support of the action of a trial court in passing upon a motion for a new trial, and it will not be disturbed if the question of its propriety be open to debate."

Appellant cites and relies upon the case of Chase v. Jonkey, 12 Cal.App.2d 365, 55 P.2d 1229, and cases therein cited. Those cases involve appeals from judgments after denials of motions for new trials. The rule as set forth in said decisions and invoked herein is correct, but cannot be applied in the situation herein existing. In the case of Menne v. Friermuth, supra, 130 Cal.App. at page 108, 19 P.2d at page 535, the appellate court quotes from the case of Harrison v. Sutter Street Railway Co., supra, as follows:

"The rule invoked is correct, as addressed to the function of the trial court, or when asking this court to set aside the verdict where it has been refused by the court below. But when we are asked to review the act of that court, where, in the exercise of its discretionary power, it has seen fit to set aside the verdict on this ground, a very different rule prevails. Every intendment is to be indulged here in support of the action of the court below, and, as elsewhere suggested, it will not be disturbed if the question of its propriety be open to debate."

[6] We are satisfied that the trial court was well within the proper exercise of its discretion in granting the motion for a new trial, and its order is therefore affirmed.

Civ. 2715.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 4, 1941.

Hearing Granted April 3, 1941.

1. Municipal corporations ⇐185(4)

If city council intended to economize by dispensing with services of policewomen and if discharge of an employee within the civil service could be accomplished by failing to appropriate money for his salary, some official action was necessary to give effect to council's intent in order to effectuate discharge of policewomen. St.1931, p. 2906, § 115 et seq.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐886

Under charter provision of San Diego the unappropriated balance of the general fund would be available for appropriation to cover shortages in any other fund, including the salary fund of the police department. St.1931, p. 2886, § 69(h).

3. Municipal corporations ⇐186(6)

In action to compel reinstatement of plaintiffs as policewomen of San Diego and to recover salaries from date of commencing action, evidence as to balance in fund budgeted for police salaries after payment of salaries for first seven months of fiscal year established that after payment of salaries for remainder of year, on basis of same average monthly salaries as during first seven months thereof, there would remain in fund more than sufficient to pay salaries of policewomen for the period from commencement of action to date of judgment.

4. Municipal corporations ⇐185(4)

Where city council appropriated sufficient funds for police salaries to pay salaries of policewomen as well as salaries of other members of police department, and took no other action to dismiss policewomen, the policewomen were not removed from their civil service positions, notwithstanding city council's intention to economize by dispensing with their services. St. 1931, pp. 2888, 2906, §§ 71, 115 et seq.

5. Appeal and error ⇐843(2)

In action to compel plaintiffs' reinstatement as policewomen and to recover salaries from commencement of action until date of judgment, district court of appeal would not consider question with respect to payment of salaries from date of purported discharge until commencement of action nor during period following entry of superior court's judgment for plaintiffs.

6. Appeal and error ⇐1170(7)

Errors in the admission and exclusion of evidence were without prejudice, where district court of appeal determined case without regard to erroneously admitted evidence and assumed the facts sought to be established by excluded evidence and the other excluded evidence was merely cumulative. MARKS, Justice.

Plaintiffs brought this action against the city of San Diego and a number of its officers and agents seeking a writ of mandate to compel their reinstatement to the positions of policewomen of that city and to compel the payment of their salaries from and after July 15, 1939. During the trial plaintiffs dismissed the portions of the complaint under which their salaries were sought to be recovered prior to the filing of the complaint on November 29, 1939.

Several years prior to July 15, 1939, plaintiffs had reached the status of classified employees of the city of San Diego and had come within the protection of its civil service rules and regulations. (See art. VIII, Charter of San Diego, Stats.1931, pp. 2838, 2906.)

The fiscal year of the city of San Diego commences on July 1st, and ends on June 30th of the next year. It is the duty of the city manager to file his budget for each fiscal year before the first meeting of the city council in May. The then city manager, Robert W. Flack, filed such a budget on May 2, 1939.

There had been an election in San Diego and several new members of the city council took office on, or prior to May 8, 1939. F. A. Rhodes was appointed city manager. He took office on June 1, 1939, supplanting Flack. The councilmen instructed Rhodes to prepare a budget that would reduce the city expenditures by $500,000. He submitted his budget on June 16, 1939. Section 71 of the charter prohibits the city council from increasing any budgeted item but permits a reduction of any of them.

Both the Flack and the Rhodes budgets contained an appropriation to pay the salaries of five policewomen.

On June 13, 1939, the city council passed Ordinance Number 1611, New Series, "* * * creating and establishing certain positions in the service of the City of San Diego. * * *" This ordinance repeated the provisions for the creation of positions for eight policewomen, which was the same number provided for in several prior ordinances. It is admitted that this ordinance, and others preceding it, created many positions that were not filled. These provisions were made to take care of any emergency that might arise after the passage of the ordinance. San Diego had never employed more than six policewomen, and just prior to June 1, 1939, there were five in the service.

The duties of the policewomen were largely to supervise dine and dance establishments, to prohibit minors from entering such places or being served with intoxicants there, and to regulate the conduct of a certain class of women.

In the interest of economy, the council, in considering various items in the budget, decided to dispense with the services of the policewomen and to try the experiment of having the dine and dance places supervised by policemen accompanied by police matrons. It is clear from the evidence that it was the intention of the majority of the councilmen to effect a saving by reducing the budgeted appropriation for salaries of those employed in the police department, and by such reduced appropriation to dispense with the services of all policewomen. Whether or not they accomplished that purpose is the important issue in this case.

The budget ordinance appropriating money with which to pay the cost of the various departments of the city was passed on July 5, 1939. It appropriated for the police department, to pay for "personal service, $345,560.50". An additional $165,000 from certain specified revenues was appropriated for the same purpose. Thus there was appropriated $510,560.50 to pay the salaries of police department employees. These appropriations were general in their terms and there is nothing on the face of the ordinance to indicate that the money was to be used to pay any particular class of employees or that policewomen were not to be paid out of these funds.

Counsel for both parties argue many questions in their briefs with sincerity, force and logic. They support their arguments with generous citations of authorities. But when we strip the case of nonessentials and leave out of consideration several hundred pages of the transcript treating with immaterial collateral matters, the issue presented for decision is simple. It may thus be stated: Did the city council, by its appropriation ordinance, accomplish its declared purpose of dispensing with the services of the policewomen then employed by the city, who were within the protection of the civil service, by failing to appropriate money with which to pay their salaries?

In approaching this question we will assume, without holding, the soundness of practically all the arguments advanced by defendants; that it was the honest and praiseworthy intent of the councilmen to reduce the expenditures of the city; that as one step toward accomplishing this purpose they intended to dispense with the services of all policewomen by not appropriating any money for their salaries; that in this they were not actuated by any bad motives but were honestly and sincerely attempting to reduce taxes; that the discharge of an employee within the civil service can be accomplished by failing to appropriate money for his salary.

[1] The decision of the whole problem lies in the answer to the question: Was the money directly appropriated for salaries of those in the police department (together with other money appropriated that could be lawfully used for that purpose) sufficient to pay plaintiffs' salaries? If it was sufficient it would seem that the councilmen failed to carry their purpose into effect, for the only means used to accomplish that intent was the ordinances they passed. The mere intent to eliminate the policewomen was not sufficient to effect their discharge. In addition, there must have been some official action to give effect to that intent. The only action taken was the passage of Ordinance Number 1611, New Series, on June 13, 1939, and the budget ordinance on July 5, 1939. That Ordinance Number 1611 did not accomplish that purpose is clear from its terms. It created positions for eight policewomen. That the budget ordinance failed to give effect to that intent is rather clear from the evidence.

[2] As we have seen, the budget ordinance appropriated $510,560.50 to pay the salaries of employees of the police department. The deputy auditor of San Diego testified that between July 1, 1939, and January 31, 1940, both inclusive, there had been expended for that purpose, $292,285.86, leaving an unexpended balance in this salary fund of $218,274.64. If the monthly expenditures for salaries during the last five months of that fiscal year remained at the same average level as they were during the first seven months there would remain in this fund an unexpended balance of over $9,000. The same witness testified that on January 31, 1940, there remained $25,932.89 in the unappropriated balance of the general fund. This was evidently the unexpended balance of a budget appropriation of $150,000, designated in the ordinance as "unappropriated balance". Under subdivision "h" of section 69 of the charter, it is provided that the " 'unappropriated balance' * * * shall be available for appropriation later in the fiscal year to meet contingencies which might arise". It seems clear that this balance of $25,932.89 was available for appropriation to cover shortages in any other fund, including the salary fund of the police department.

Plaintiffs each received a salary of $157 per month. Under the judgment they will receive their salaries from November 29, 1939, the date of the commencement of this action, to March 29, 1940, the date of the rendition and entry of judgment.

[3, 4] From the evidence of the deputy city auditor it seems too clear to permit of serious argument that, after paying all other salaries of the employees of the police department for the entire fiscal year, there will remain in the fund directly budgeted for that purpose, more than sufficient to pay the salaries of plaintiffs for the period here involved without drawing upon the "unappropriated balance". It also seems clear that the councilmen failed to put into effect their purpose of causing the dismissal of plaintiffs by reducing the salary appropriations to an amount where the salaries of plaintiffs could not be paid. That being true, it follows that plaintiffs were not removed from their civil service positions, there having been no other action taken which could possibly result in their dismissal.

[5] It is not necessary to consider the payment of plaintiffs' salaries between July 15, and November 29, 1939, and after March 29, 1940, as those questions are not here directly involved. Any questions as to the payment of salaries for those periods should be determined if and when they arise and not before. See Buck v. City of Eureka, 119 Cal. 44, 50 P. 1065; Buck v. City of Eureka, 124 Cal. 61, 56 P. 612; Higgins v. City of San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 P. 824, 50 P. 670.

[6] Defendants complain of rulings overruling their objections to many questions asked by counsel for plaintiffs and in sustaining objections to evidence offered by them. There is considerable merit in many of their arguments. However, because of the view we take of the case those errors cannot be regarded as prejudicial. The erroneously admitted evidence has had no influence on this decision and we have disregarded it in its entirety. Some of the excluded evidence was cumulative. We have assumed the facts sought to be established by some other portions of the excluded evidence. We cannot reverse the judgment because of such errors. § 4½, art. VI, Const.

The judgment is affirmed.

4. Eminent domain ⇐267

Where procedure for enforcement of constitutional right to compensation for taking or damaging of private property has been established by legislative enactment, failure to comply therewith constitutes a "waiver" of right to enforce payment of damages. Const. art. 1, § 14.

7. Eminent domain ⇐277

The increase of water level beneath plaintiffs' lands, which were thereby rendered unfit for agricultural and horticultural purposes, as result of seepage and overflow of water from irrigation district's nearby canals and ditches, was result of a "dangerous condition" of district's property necessitating filing of claim for damages with district as prerequisite to right to maintain action in eminent domain against district for damages to land. 9. Eminent domain ⇐277

Where facts alleged, in plaintiffs' complaint in action in eminent domain for damages resulting from increase of water level beneath their property as result of seepage from irrigation district's canals and ditches, established that condition created by district was dangerous to plaintiffs' property, absence of word "dangerous" in complaint did not relieve plaintiffs of duty to file claim with district as prerequisite to right to maintain action. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action in eminent domain to recover compensation for damages to plaintiffs' property by Andrew M. Davis, Jr., and others, against the East Contra Costa Irrigation District. From a judgment of dismissal, the plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

A. L. Cowell, of Stockton, and Downey, Brand & Seymour, of Sacramento, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Defendant's demurrer to the third amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and from the judgment of dismissal entered thereon plaintiffs appeal.

The action was one in eminent domain (Const. of Cal., Art. I, sec. 14) to recover compensation for damages to plaintiffs' property. The basic facts pleaded were that since 1924 the defendant irrigation district has maintained canals and ditches along the lands to the north, west and south of plaintiffs' lands, whereby it has transported waters for irrigation purposes to lands in the vicinity of plaintiffs' property; that since 1927 seepage and overflow from said canals and ditches, the release of the waters therefrom upon the lands in the vicinity of plaintiffs' property, and the failure since 1935 to provide drainage facilities, has caused a fluctuating increase in the water level beneath the surface of plaintiffs' lands, and thereby destroyed the walnut and apricot orchards growing thereon, and deprived plaintiffs of the use of their lands for agricultural and horticultural purposes. The demurrer was sustained upon the ground that prior to the commencement of the action plaintiffs failed to file a claim with the secretary of the board as provided in section 2 of the Irrigation District Claims Statute (Stats. 1935, Chap. 833, p. 2250). It is plaintiffs' contention that said statute has no application to any of the four causes of action sued upon.

[1-5] It appears to be well settled that facts similar to those pleaded in the complaint herein give rise to a cause of action for damages against an irrigation district under the eminent domain provisions of the state constitution, regardless of whether the acts complained of were the result of negligence (Ketcham v. Modesto Irr. Dist., 135 Cal.App. 180, 26 P.2d 876; Hume v. Fresno Irr. Dist., 21 Cal.App.2d 348, 69 P.2d 483; Massetti v. Madera Canal & Irr. Dist., 20 Cal.App.2d 708, 68 P.2d 260; see also order of Supreme Court denying hearing in Tormey v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist., 53 Cal.App. 559, 568, 200 P. 814); but it is equally well settled that actions in eminent domain for the taking or damaging of private property are not immune from the operation of claims statutes, if the terms of the statutes are broad enough to include such actions. In other words, while the constitution grants the right to compensation, it does not provide the procedure by which the right may be enforced (Young v. County of Ventura, 39 Cal.App.2d 732, 104 P.2d 102); and that being so, the mode of procedure for the enforcement of such right may be provided by either statutory or charter provisions. Crescent Wharf, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles, 207 Cal. 430, 278 P. 1028. It is held, therefore, that where such procedure has been established by legislative enactment, a failure to comply therewith is deemed to be a waiver of the right to enforce the payment of damages. Young v. County of Ventura, supra, citing Musto-Keenan Co. v. City of Los Angeles 139 Cal. App. 506, 34 P.2d 506; Sala v. City of Pasadena, 162 Cal. 714, 124 P. 539; and Yonker v. City of San Gabriel, 23 Cal.App. 2d 556, 73 P.2d 623. Some of the cases wherein it has been held that charter provisions were controlling in the matter of the bringing of an action in eminent domain are Crescent Wharf, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles, supra; Bigelow v. City of Los Angeles, 141 Cal. 503, 75 P. 111; Bancroft v. City of San Diego, 120 Cal. 432, 52 P. 712; other cases applying the same doctrine under statutory enactments are McCann v. Sierra County, 7 Cal. 121, and Young v. County of Ventura, supra. It is apparent, therefore, that the determination of the question of whether an action in eminent domain to recover compensation for the taking or damaging of private property falls within the scope of a particular claims statute depends upon the terms of the statute and the alleged facts upon which the action is founded.

[6, 7] The claims statute here involved is entitled "An act relating to the liability of irrigation districts, their officers and employees", and section 2 is as follows: "Whenever it is claimed that any person or property has been injured or damaged as a result of any dangerous or defective condition of any property owned or operated and under the control of any irrigation district or its officers or employees and/or the negligence or carelessness of any officer or employee of an irrigation district, a verified claim for damages shall be presented in writing and filed with such officer or employee and the secretary of said board within ninety days after such accident or injury has occurred. Such claim shall specify the name and address of the claimant, the date and place of the accident or injury or damage and the nature and extent of the injury or damages claimed. The foregoing shall be a condition precedent to the filing or maintaining of any action for said injury or damages." As will be noted, the statute embraces all cases wherein it is claimed that property has been damaged as the result of "any dangerous" condition of any property owned, operated, or under the control of the district; and it is our conclusion that the trial court was justified in holding that the facts set forth in the complaint, which on demurrer must be taken as true, show that the operation by the district of the properties under its control created a condition dangerous to plaintiffs' property, as the result of which plaintiffs' property was damaged, and that therefore the case was brought within the scope of the clause of the statute above mentioned.

The pertinent facts as they were alleged by plaintiffs upon which the foregoing conclusion is based may be stated as follows: (first cause of action) Plaintiffs' lands (containing 54.7 acres) were planted to walnut and apricot trees, and up to August 1, 1935, produced large and valuable agricultural and orchard crops. Prior to 1927 the water level of said lands was not less than fifteen feet below the surface, which did not adversely affect the fertility or productiveness of the soil; and the lands were not subject to overflow of water by seepage or otherwise. From 1927 to 1929 seepage from defendant's canals and ditches, together with the water brought to and released upon lands within the district, caused the water level of plaintiffs' lands to fluctuate so that in 1929 it was brought within four feet of the surface of the soil; and during that period, so it was alleged, Andrew M. Davis, Jr., one of the plaintiffs, "repeatedly advised the defendant district of the increasing ground water level and the threat of damage to his orchard therefrom, and the district installed drainage facilities designed to lower said water table purportedly to comply with the provisions of the Drainage Act of 1907 (Stats. of 1907, p. 569)." However, at that time plaintiffs' lands did not show evidence of permanent injury or damage. From 1930 to 1935, due to seepage and overflow from said canals and ditches and the release of waters on other lands in the district, the water level beneath plaintiffs' lands fluctuated to within eight feet of the surface; and during that period also drainage facilities were maintained by defendant whereby quantities of ground water were removed from the immediate vicinity of plaintiffs' lands, so that at that time plaintiffs' lands did not show evidence of permanent injury or damage. Continuing, it was alleged: "Ever since the 1st day of August, 1935, water has constantly escaped and seeped through the bottom, sides, and banks of canals and ditches maintained by defendant district in the immediate vicinity of plaintiffs' hereinabove described lands. During all of said period to and including the date of filing the complaint herein and thereafter the drainage facilities maintained by defendant district were not maintained in such manner as to prevent the rise of ground water hereinafter described. During said period the ground water of all of the plaintiffs' lands as hereinabove described has been raised by reason of the said escaped water and seepage water from the canals and ditches of defendant district to a level of less than five feet below the surface of said lands, by reason whereof the fertility and productiveness of plaintiffs' said lands has been destroyed and the said lands have been rendered entirely unavailable for the raising of apricots or walnuts and have been rendered in large part unavailable for any other useful purpose; the said apricot trees and part of said walnut orchard trees have died in large numbers." In the second cause of action it was alleged: "II. Ever since the latter part of the year 1924 defendant district has owned, maintained and used irrigation canals and ditches in the vicinity of plaintiffs' property described in the Paragraph of the first cause of action in this complaint numbered II and within the boundaries of the said irrigation district. During all of said period defendant district has removed waters from the San Joaquin River, has transported and distributed such waters by seepage and overflow through said canals and ditches to lands within the said irrigation district, including lands not owned by defendant district in the vicinity of plaintiffs' said lands." "III. By means of such distribution of water defendant corporation within three years last past * * * has deprived plaintiffs of their said properties * * * without just or any compensation. * * *" "IV. But for such distribution of water by defendant district within three years last past before the filing of the complaint herein the plaintiffs' said lands hereinabove described and the apricot and walnut orchards on said property would have remained in a healthy condition and would not have suffered from disease and destruction." "V. Defendant at no time had or now has any easement or prescriptive right or other interest in property for the seepage, escape, or overflow of water hereinabove in paragraphs II and III of this second cause of action described. * * *" The third cause of action appears to be based on the combined allegations of the first and second causes of action, most of the allegations thereof either being incorporated therein by reference or realleged in substantially the same form. The fourth cause of action rests largely upon the following portions of paragraph II thereof, to-wit: "From the 1st day of August, 1935, to the date of the filing of the complaint herein, the canals and ditches of defendant irrigation district have been and now are so negligently and carelessly maintained by defendant that water has constantly escaped and seeped through the bottoms, sides and banks of said canals and ditches, and said defendant during said period has negligently, carelessly, and without right allowed said water to flow to and upon the lands of plaintiffs hereinabove described and to and upon lands not owned by defendant district in the immediate vicinity of the lands of plaintiffs hereinabove described. During all of said period defendant, well knowing that drainage facilities were required to prevent the damage herein complained of to plaintiffs' lands, failed, neglected and refused to provide drainage facilities as required by the statutes of the State of California."

[8, 9] It must be presumed that when the legislature in the enactment of the claims statute employed the word "dangerous" it intended that said word should be interpreted in the sense in which it is ordinarily used; and as defined in the dictionaries, it means attended or beset with danger; full of risk; causing danger; likely to harm; perilous; hazardous; unsafe. Here it appears from the allegations of each of the causes of action sued upon that over a period of many years great quantities of water to be used for irrigation purposes were brought into the district by the defendant by means of canals and ditches which it owned and over which it had control and thereupon released on lands in the vicinity of plaintiffs' property, and also allowed same to escape, seep and overflow from its canals and ditches, as the result of which the water level of plaintiffs' lands was increased to the extent of rendering the lands useless for agricultural or horticultural purposes. Manifestly a condition so created was dangerous to plaintiffs' property; and that the danger was apparent to plaintiffs and to the district is shown by the allegation that prior to 1930 one of the plaintiffs "repeatedly advised the defendant district of the increasing ground water level and the threat of damage to his orchard therefrom."

It is true, as pointed out by plaintiffs, that nowhere in the complaint was it alleged that the condition so created was "dangerous"; however, the facts alleged in themselves show that it was and therefore an allegation to that effect would merely have been the statement of a conclusion. And plaintiffs are not in a position on this appeal to claim that any part of the responsibility for the distribution, seepage or overflow of said waters rests with any adjoining owners, for the reason that all four causes of action are based upon allegations to the effect that the district alone is responsible therefor, and for the damage resulting therefrom.

It is also true that the eminent domain provisions of the constitution declare that "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation * * *"; whereas the claims statute under consideration pertains only to cases where property has been damaged. But there is nothing whatever in the complaint herein indicating that there was any "taking" of any property belonging to plaintiffs; so that the question of whether such a case would be subject to the provisions of the claims statute is one with which we are not here concerned.

[10] Plaintiffs' final contention is that the provisions of section 2 prescribing the time and manner of filing claims and the contents thereof indicate that in the enactment of the statute the legislature had in mind only cases of accidental injury or specific damage resulting at a given time and place from the negligent manipulation of the property of the irrigation district. When, however, the section is read as a whole it becomes apparent that it was not contemplated that the act should be given such a limited construction, because by the opening clause thereof it includes within the scope of the act any claim for damage or injury to real property resulting from "any" dangerous condition brought about by the district in the operation of its properties.

Furthermore, it does not appear that it was impracticable for plaintiffs to have complied with the requirements of the act by filing a claim prior to the commencement of the action. A similar question was raised in Young v. County of Ventura, supra, which involved a different state of facts, but a claims statute almost identical with the one here under consideration. It was the claims statute governing the commencement of actions against counties municipalities and school districts (Act 5149, Deering's General Laws; Stats. 1931, p. 2475), which as here is made applicable to actions wherein it is claimed that a person has been injured or any property damaged "as a result of the dangerous or defective condition" of any street, building, grounds, etc. With respect thereto the court said [39 Cal.App.2d 732, 104 P.2d 105]: "The purpose of the law requiring an early filing of a claim is to give the county notice that it will be called upon to make payment and to enable it to investigate the circumstances at such time as the facts can be ascertained and thereby negotiate a settlement or prepare its defense. This is a reasonable provision on behalf of the county and it causes no hardship upon the claimants. Plaintiffs were not called upon to file more than a general statement of their claim, which could doubtless be prepared within a period of ninety days. If their claim could not be settled by negotiation with the authorities of defendant county, accurate and complete proof of the extent of the damages could be prepared for an action in court. In this regard they are in no different position from that of most of the claimants for damages for personal injuries, who as a general rule cannot determine the exact amounts of their damages within ninety days from the dates of the accidents. Plaintiffs cannot successfully argue that by the statutory requirement of filing a claim they were deprived of due process of law. The legislature has furnished due process to them but they did not avail themselves of it." The same may be said with regard to the present case, for while plaintiffs were permitted to file suit for the recovery of damages at any time within the period of the statute of limitations, there was nothing to prevent them from filing a claim with the district when it became evident that their property had been rendered useless; and having failed so to do, it must be held in accordance with the mandate of the statute that the recovery of damages is barred.

The judgment is affirmed.

AHRENS v. NAFTZGER et al.

Civ. 12795.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 4, 1941.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1941.

Hearing Denied April 3, 1941.

1. Appeal and error ⇐116

Orders denying motions of party brought before the court in supplementary proceedings to quash subpœna duces tecum and order requiring appearance of such party are not appealable.

2. Appeal and error ⇐66

In absence of statutory authority therefor, an appellate tribunal should not review an order of the lower court unless it be a final determination of the subject matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Benjamin J. Scheinman, Judge.

Action by Myrtle Viola Ahrens against Roy E. Naftzger and others, wherein Muriel Evans was brought into court on supplementary proceedings. From orders denying her motions to quash subpoena duces tecum and order requiring her appearance, Muriel Evans appeals.

Appeals dismissed.

Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, Edgar F. Hughes, and Charles M. Fueller, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. C. W. Friday and Ira A. Gwin, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff obtained a judgment against defendants Hugh Evans and Ed. Bischoff. Thereafter supplementary proceedings were commenced and Muriel Evans, the appellant, who was not a party to the action, was ordered by the court to appear and answer "concerning her property". Plaintiff was attempting to conduct the examination in accordance with section 717 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Muriel Evans made a special appearance for the purpose of presenting motions to quash a subpoena duces tecum and the order of the court requiring her appearance. She appeals from the orders of the court denying her motions.

[1] Appellant points out deficiencies in the affidavits on which the order for her appearance was based and also claims that the order was defective in that it ordered her to answer concerning her own property instead of ordering her to answer concerning the property of the judgment debtor. Without discussing these alleged defects respondent contends that the orders from which the appeal is prosecuted are not appealable and that the appeal must be dismissed.

It was held in Frost v. Superior Court, 41 Cal.App. 580, 183 P. 206, 207, that orders such as those now under review are not final orders. In that case the petitioner was a judgment debtor in a case pending in the superior court of Modoc county. A writ of execution was issued and returned partially satisfied and thereafter the court made an order directing the petitioner to appear before a referee in the city of San Francisco to answer concerning his property. The petitioner did not appear before the referee and the court issued "a writ of attachment for contempt" against the petitioner. A writ of certiorari was sought in the District Court of Appeal, the petitioner contending that the affidavit filed as a basis for the order for the petitioner to appear in San Francisco was defective in that it did not set forth necessary jurisdictional facts. The reviewing court held that the writ should not be allowed unless there had been a final adjudication or determination of the subject matter in the lower court. In deciding that the order under review was not a final order the court held that the superior court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the supplementary proceeding; that the court should be permitted without interruption to exercise its jurisdiction until final judgment; and that the proceedings could not be arrested "at any particular time in the progress thereof to determine whether the court has committed error either in the matter of putting its jurisdiction in motion or in ruling upon some proposition arising during the course of the hearing of the proceeding".

[2] We are in accord with the ruling in the Frost case. Although in that case the court was considering an application for a writ of certiorari, while in the case now before us an appeal has been taken, the governing principle is identical. In the absence of statutory authority therefor an appellate tribunal should not review an order of the lower court unless it be a final determination of the subject matter.

The appeals are dismissed.

WILLIAMSON et al. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY FLOOD CONTROL DIST.

Civ. 11552.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 27, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 28, 1941.

1. Counties ⇐113(5)
Levees and flood control ⇐9

Power to make contract for county and flood control district for payment of attorneys' fees and expenses in taxpayers' suits, rests with board of supervisors. Pol. Code, §§ 4001, 4031, 4039; St.1915, p. 1503, § 3; Civ.Code, § 1565.

2. Counties ⇐121
Levees and flood control ⇐9

Express contract of board of supervisors rendering county or flood control district liable for attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in taxpayers' suits can be made only by resolution or ordinance duly adopted. Pol.Code, §§ 4001, 4031, 4039; St.1915, p. 1503, § 3; Civ.Code, § 1565.

3. Levees and flood control ⇐9

An express contract rendering flood control district liable for attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in taxpayers' suits did not exist where record did not contain facts showing adoption of resolution or ordinance by majority of board of supervisors in regard to such matter. Pol.Code, §§ 4001, 4031, 4039; St.1915, p. 1503, § 3; Civ.Code, § 1565.

4. Levees and flood control ⇐11

In action against flood control district to recover attorney's fees and expenses incurred in taxpayers' suits instituted to recover amount paid in settlement of claim against district, plaintiffs relying on implied contract were bound to show that privity of contract existed between plaintiffs and district.

5. Levees and flood control ⇐11

Attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in taxpayer's suit instituted to recover money paid in settlement of claim against flood control district could not be recovered from the district on theory of implied contract where it was not shown that the services were rendered and expenses incurred in such circumstances as authorized the plaintiffs to entertain a reasonable expectation of their payment by the district.

6. Levees and flood control ⇐11

Attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in taxpayers' suits to recover money paid by flood control district in settlement of claim against district could not be recovered from district on trust theory where the taxpayers' suits were dismissed either voluntarily or for lack of prosecution, and there was no evidence that any one of the suits or all of them together contributed in any way to the ultimate recovery which was accomplished in action instituted by the district.

7. Costs ⇐103

A court of equity having possession of a fund may in certain instances allow an attorney's fee and costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by J. C. Williamson and others against Los Angeles County Flood Control District, to recover for attorneys' fees and expenses claimed to have been earned or incurred in certain so-called "taxpayers' suits". From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied; SPENCE, Justice pro tem., took no part in the consideration or decision of this matter.

E. D. Martindale, in pro. per., of Los Angeles (Fred W. Heath and Charles E. McGinnis, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

J. H. O'Connor, Co. Counsel, S. V. O. Pritchard, Asst. Co. Counsel, and A. Curtis Smith, Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of nonsuit entered upon motion of the defendant made at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' affirmative case. The plaintiffs are seeking by this action to recover from a political entity, a flood control district, for attorneys' fees and expenses claimed to have been earned or incurred by them in certain so-called "taxpayers' suits".

On December 7, 1928, the district entered into a contract for the construction of a concrete dam across San Gabriel Canyon. The contractors entered upon the performance of the contract and excavated large quantities of material from the damsite for which they were paid progress payments aggregating $1,831,312.80. In October, 1929, acting pursuant to the Dam Act, St.1929, p. 1505, which became effective on August 14, 1929, the state engineer examined and condemned the damsite. A dispute arose between the contracting parties as to their respective rights under the contract of December 7, 1928. The contractors filed a claim for $4,290,-459.20, representing their view of the matter, and on February 3, 1930, a compromise was made by the partial allowance of the claim to the extent of $737,986.90 and the purchase from the contractors of certain personal property left at the damsite for $92,779. In executing this compromise the contractors were given a full and complete release of all liability.

In the making of this contract of compromise one of the supervisors of the district was "interested" in violation of section 920 of the Political Code and section 71 of the Penal Code. The "interest" of the supervisor was bribery, a fact which was not known to the district until February 6, 1933, at which time the supervisor was indicted by the grand jury. The "taxpayer plaintiffs" were likewise ignorant of the bribery until the time of the indictment.

On August 5, 1930, Mr. Shorb, one of the "taxpayer plaintiffs", filed the first of the "taxpayers' suits" here involved. That case is No. 306952. The original complaint sets forth a simple cause of action for money had and received for $737,986.90 against the dam contractors. The amended complaint assailed the original contract of December 7, 1928, as fraudulent and the compromise contract as ill-advised. In neither complaint was any showing made to justify a collateral attack upon the quasi-judicial action of the board of supervisors in partly allowing the claim of the contractors as required by such cases as County of Alameda v. Evers, 136 Cal. 132, 68 P. 475; McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 329, 33 P. 113; El Dorado County v. Elstner, 18 Cal. 144; Andrews v. Pratt, 44 Cal. 309. This "taxpayer's suit" was brought on behalf of the taxpayers of Los Angeles County, and not on behalf of the taxpayers of the Flood Control District. In bringing said suit no demand upon the board of supervisors or any officer or agent of the district was ever made. The action was voluntarily dismissed by the "taxpayer plaintiff" on June 19, 1931. By this action the plaintiff recovered nothing for the district.

Within a few days after the voluntary dismissal of this first "taxpayer's suit" Mr. Shorb, one of the "taxpayer plaintiffs", filed the second suit, No. 323822. In this suit the "taxpayer plaintiff" sought to set up a cause of action upon the theory that the original contract of December 7, 1928, had been procured by fraud. Again no attempt was made to attack directly the quasi-judicial action of the board of supervisors in making a settlement with the contractors and giving to them a full and complete release.

The complaint was demurred to and the demurrer sustained. The plaintiff failed, however, to amend within the time allowed by the court, and judgment was entered dismissing the action as to all defendants but one, C. R. Ross, and the district. A stipulation for the dismissal of the action as against the district was later filed on October 28, 1932. Nothing was recovered for the district.

On February 6, 1933, the supervisor who was bribed in connection with the settlement was indicted by the grand jury. On April 20, 1933, Mr. Williamson, one of the plaintiffs, made demand on the supervisors that a suit be commenced. On May 15, 1933, about three weeks later, the board of supervisors instructed the county counsel to file a civil action to set aside the said settlement. On June 12th the board employed special counsel to assist in the prosecution of the action authorized on May 15th. The grand jury completed its investigation on September 7, 1933, and by an extended resolution directed a suit to be brought pursuant to the provisions of section 929 of the Penal Code. On September 21st the board of supervisors authorized the same suit and appropriated $25,000 for its maintenance. On the same day suit was filed, No. 363102, and was prosecuted by the district to a successful conclusion.

On July 13, 1936, three years after commencement, the sum of $737,986.90 in cash was collected upon compromise of the litigation. The action was most vigorously contested. The district bore the entire expense and burden of the prosecution at an outlay of upwards of $75,000.

To return, however, to the situation in 1933—on June 1, 1933, fifteen days after the board had authorized suit "to set aside the said settlement" and while the grand jury was still investigating the matter, Mr. Williamson, without presenting any further demand, filed the third "taxpayer's suit", No. 357986. On December 28, 1933, two other taxpayers who are not joined as parties plaintiff in this present suit although their counsel are so joined, filed a complaint in intervention. On October 10, 1934, Mr. Williamson filed an amended complaint. Other than filing these complaints no steps were taken by the "taxpayer plaintiffs" or their counsel to prosecute this action. On April 12, 1935, the action was voluntarily dismissed by the plaintiff and on July 13, 1936, it was dismissed by the court as to the intervener for lack of prosecution.

With reference to this third "taxpayer's suit" it will be noted (1) it was dismissed in the manner just indicated; (2) nothing was recovered by it for the district; (3) the action was never prosecuted beyond the filing of the complaint; (4) there was no refusal on the part of the district to bring an action. The "taxpayer's suit" was filed in the midst of diligent preparation on the part of public officials to proceed with their suit.

In the present suit Williamson and Shorb, as taxpayers, and Martindale, Phillips, Park, Cavaney, McGee and Robnett, as attorneys, all joined as plaintiffs seeking to recover attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in the three "taxpayers' suits", in no one of which was any recovery had. All of the suits were dismissed either voluntarily or for lack of prosecution. There is no evidence that any one of these suits, or all of them together, contributed in any way to the ultimate recovery which was accomplished in case No. 363102. In that action no one of the plaintiffs in this action asked an allowance for attorney fees or expenses incurred in any of the other actions specifically designated above.

The plaintiffs inserted in their complaint ten separate counts. In presenting their cause they rely on any one of three different theories.

[1-3] They contend that under the facts they had an express contract. But, a most careful examination of the record discloses no facts that will support that contention. The power to make a contract, for the county, on the subjects discussed, rested with the board of supervisors of Los Angeles County. Pol. Code, § 4001. The same power, as to the affairs of a flood control district, rests with the board of supervisors of the district. Stats. 1915, p. 1503, § 3. The board of supervisors can act in such matters only by resolution or ordinance duly adopted. The record does not disclose the adoption of any resolution or ordinance. Pol.Code, § 4039. And, if a resolution is relied on it must further appear that "a majority of all the members concur therein". Pol.Code, § 4031. No such facts are contained in the record. Therefore there was no evidence of the "minds" of the members of the board of supervisors. It is equally true there was no evidence of the mind of any one, or all, of the plaintiffs on the subject of the payment of costs and attorney fees by the defendant. Obviously under these circumstances the consent of each party was not "communicated by each to the other", but that was one of the essential elements to constitute the making of an express contract. Civ.Code, § 1565. It follows that no express contract existed. Nevills v. Moore Min. Co., 135 Cal. 561, 566, 67 P. 1054. That conclusion is particularly applicable in actions brought against public boards and officers. Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 151, 157, 38 P. 682.

[4, 5] Not waiving the contention that they held an express contract, the plaintiffs next assert that they had an implied contract. They cite and rely on Young v. Bruere, 78 Cal.App. 127, 248 P. 301; Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139 Cal. 432, 73 P. 189; Brown v. Board of Education, 103 Cal. 531, 37 P. 503; and Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 P. 824, 50 P. 670. The facts in each of these cases were in no respect similar to the facts in this case and those cases are not in point even as a matter of argument. The contention which these plaintiffs make was made before the supreme court of South Carolina in the case Park v. City of Laurens, 68 S.C. 212, 46 S.E. 1012. On page 1014 of 46 S.E., that court said: "When municipal officers refuse to perform their plain ministerial duty, any citizen interested is allowed to put the machinery of the courts in motion to require the performance of such duty, because of his own interest in its performance; but it would be stretching the doctrine of representation very far to hold that in such case he was the representative, agent, or trustee of the corporation, in the sense that his attorney could bring a direct action against the city for his services. * * * The sole question we are called upon to decide in this case is whether the conduct of this litigation by the plaintiff under contract with Mr. Garrison implied a contract between the city and the plaintiff upon which he could bring a direct action. We are obliged to hold that there was no privity of contract between the city and the plaintiff, and therefore the action cannot be sustained." That in such actions the plaintiff is bound to show that "privity of contract" existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, clearly appears from the leading case entitled Woods v. Ayres, 39 Mich. 345, 33 Am.Rep. 396. That case is a very complete exposition of the law as to when an implied contract arises. It was recently cited and followed in Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. United States, 261 U.S. 592, 593, 43 S.Ct. 425, 67 L.Ed. 816. The facts in Coleman v. United States, 152 U.S. 96, 14 S.Ct. 473, 474, 38 L.Ed. 368, were far more favorable to the plaintiff than the facts in the instant case. Coleman was appointed by the attorney general of the United States to maintain actions against Maxwell Land Grant Company to have certain patents cancelled, to a large tract of land, to a part of which Coleman's clients claimed title and to the balance of which the United States claimed title. The action was commenced and carried on for a while. Later Coleman commenced an action against the United States in the court of claims to recover for services rendered and expenditures made on an alleged implied contract. The court of claims ruled against him. He took an appeal. Having stated that under certain circumstances a liability on an implied contract could arise against the federal government, the court said: "But we think that a promise to pay for services can only be implied when the court can see that they were rendered in such circumstances as authorized the party performing to entertain a reasonable expectation of their payment by the party benefited. * * * For their past services they are entitled to recover from the settlers who employed them, but the admitted facts clearly show that the United States are under no express or implied obligation to answer for a breach of contract between the appellants and their clients." The case of Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. United States, supra, was also based on facts more favorable to the plaintiff than the facts in the instant case. There the plaintiff provided quarters for federal troops who were guarding the property of the plaintiff and adjoining property of the government. The court carefully analyzed the facts and reached the conclusion that neither an express nor an implied contract was shown.

[6, 7] Nor were the plaintiffs entitled to recover under any trust theory. It will be remembered that they did not appear in action No. 363102, the action brought by the district and in which the fund, $737,986.90, was recovered. In that action they made no application to be reimbursed. In that action the claim to be reimbursed might have had some merit when the court had actual charge of the fund. But in the present action the court had no charge whatever of the fund. That a court of equity having possession of a fund may in certain instances allow an attorney fee and costs is settled law. The instances in which that may be done are quite fully set forth in County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba, 205 Cal. 111, 117, 118, 270 P. 201. The same doctrine has been declared in many well considered cases. State v. Andrews, 131 Tenn. 554, 175 S.W. 563; Hempstead v. Meadville Theological School, 286 Pa. 493, 134 A. 103, 49 A.L.R. 1145. But no authority has been cited to us and we know of none that holds the facts contained in this record would constitute an action in equity against the defendant district.

It follows that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover on any theory which they advance. Having reached these conclusions it is unnecessary to discuss other points presented in the briefs.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

42 Cal.App.2d 750

PORTER et al. v. NELSON et al.

Civ. 2526.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 5, 1941.

1. Husband and wife ⇐262(1)

Where realty was deeded to wife, there was a presumption that it was her separate property, but the presumption was rebuttable. Civ.Code, § 164.

2. Husband and wife ⇐268(2)

The statutory exemption of the earnings of a wife from liability for the debts of her husband except for necessities, is "waived" where such earnings are so mingled with community property as to lose their identity. Civ.Code, § 168.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waived".

3. Husband and wife ⇐249

Where separate property and community property are so commingled that they cannot be traced, and the identity of each has been lost, the whole will be treated as community property, since the burden is on the one claiming that property is separate to establish that fact. Civ.Code, § 164.

4. Husband and wife ⇐268(2)

Where separate property and community property are so commingled that they cannot be traced, a wife may not thereafter claim an exemption as to a sum which equals the amount of her earnings which she has theretofore placed in the common fund. Civ. Code, § 168.

5. Husband and wife ⇐264

In action to quiet title to realty purchased at sale under execution to satisfy a judgment which plaintiff held against a husband, wherein wife set up defense that realty was her separate property, on ground that it had been purchased with funds partly owned by her before her marriage and partly derived from her earnings after her marriage, evidence justified judgment for plaintiff on ground that wife's funds had been so commingled with community funds that the identity of each had been lost, and that hence all would be treated as community funds. Civ.Code, § 168.

6. Execution ⇐264

At time of sale under execution which was levied to satisfy a judgment, purchaser acquired any interest possessed by the judgment debtor in the realty. Code Civ.Proc. § 700.

7. Execution ⇐283

The fact that any interest acquired by purchaser of realty under execution, which was levied to satisfy a judgment, was still subject to a right of redemption did not deprive the purchaser of a present interest, and purchaser had sufficient claim of title to enable him at that time to bring an action to quiet title, though the action might have been defeated by timely redemption. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 700, 738.

8. Appeal and error ⇐762

Where point was raised for the first time in appellant's reply brief, the District Court of Appeal was not required to act on it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Knud M. Truelsen against Herman K. Nelson and Mrs. Herman K. Nelson. From an adverse judgment, the defendants appeal, and F. F. Porter and another as executors of the plaintiff are substituted in his place on his death.

Judgment affirmed.

Farnsworth, Burke & Maddox and James K. Abercrombie, all of Visalia, for appellants.

McFadzean & Crowe, of Visalia, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This was an action to quiet title to three parcels of land. The plaintiff, Knud M. Truelsen, died while this appeal was pending and his executors have been substituted. For convenience, we will refer to Knud M. Truelsen as the plaintiff and respondent.

The plaintiff purchased these parcels at a sale under execution which was levied to satisfy a judgment for $35,601.57 which he held against the defendant Herman K. Nelson. The defense to this action was that these parcels of land were the separate property of Mrs. Nelson, the other defendant, having been purchased with funds partly owned by her before her marriage and partly derived from her earnings as a school teacher after her marriage. The defendants have appealed from the judgment on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support certain findings to the effect that the properties in question were the community property of Mr. and Mrs. Nelson and not the separate property of the latter.

Mr. and Mrs. Nelson were married in 1924. From then until 1928 Mr. Nelson received a salary as manager of a 260-acre ranch. In 1928 he acquired a half interest in a contract to purchase that ranch, the purchase price being $56,000. In the same year he became indebted to this respondent in the sum of $21,750, giving a note therefor. About a year later he gave the respondent a new note, secured by his interest in the contract for the purchase of the 260 acres. Later that year he seems to have lost his interest in that ranch, although he continued to manage it until 1931, drawing the same salary he had drawn prior to 1928.

The first parcel of the property here in question was purchased on contract on July 29, 1931, $1,266.92 being paid on account of the purchase price. In 1934 this property was deeded to Mrs. Nelson, at which time a trust deed signed by both Mr. and Mrs. Nelson was placed on the property to secure a loan of $4,000. Payments on that loan were made each year thereafter until 1938, at which time $3,500 had been paid on the principal sum. The second parcel was purchased on November 25, 1931, for $800, of which $200 was paid in cash. The property was deeded to Mrs. Nelson and a trust deed given for the balance of the purchase price, which was signed by both Mr. and Mrs. Nelson. This trust deed was paid off in two instalments in 1934. The third parcel was deeded to Mrs. Nelson in 1935, the purchase price of $1,106 being paid in full. Mr. Nelson farmed the three parcels in question each year after they were deeded to his wife and, in 1932, 1934 and 1935, respectively, he executed crop mortgages covering the crops thereon, in which he represented that he was the owner of the land. In 1936 such a crop mortgage was given, which was signed by both Mr. and Mrs. Nelson. A well was drilled and a pumping plant was installed for the purpose of furnishing water to a part of this land, one of these contracts being executed by both Mr. and Mrs. Nelson and the other by Mr. Nelson alone.

There is evidence that Mrs. Nelson had $5,000 at the time of her marriage, that between that time and 1929 she earned $6,450 by teaching school, and that from 1930 to 1938 she earned an additional $4,892.84 in that manner. All of this money was placed in bank accounts in the name of Mrs. Nelson, but there is no evidence as to when any particular amount was placed therein or when any amounts were withdrawn therefrom. She testified that she had kept no accounts and had made no segregations except that she had, about a week before the trial, made a list of her earnings as a school teacher through these years. Mr. Nelson discontinued his bank account about the time his debt to the respondent was created in 1928 and from then until the date of the trial all moneys earned by Mr. Nelson, and all moneys received from his farming operations on the lands here in question and on other lands were deposited in Mrs. Nelson's bank account. He testified that he had farmed other lands during this time and that he had done contracting work for other farmers. Checks were drawn on the wife's bank account to pay the expenses of the farming operations on the lands here in question and on other lands and to pay for equipment used in his contracting work. Checks were also drawn on the same account for the living expenses of both Mr. and Mrs. Nelson and for any other expenses of both. All payments made on the three parcels of land here in question were also made by checks drawn on this account.

While Mrs. Nelson testified that at the time of their marriage she and her husband agreed that the money she then had and the money she should earn by teaching were to be retained by her as her separate property, Mr. Nelson twice testified that there was no such agreement. Many thousands of dollars which came from Mr. Nelson's farming and contracting operations were thus placed in Mrs. Nelson's bank account. Mrs. Nelson testified that she kept no books, had no record of deposits or withdrawals from this account and that she could not tell within $5,000 of how much money she had had in the bank in 1931, or within $5,000 of the amount in her bank accounts since 1932. Each of the appellants gave conflicting testimony on material matters and each contradicted the other in several important respects. The evidence indicates and justifies the inference that after 1928 all money received by these parties from all sources were mingled in a common bank account standing in the name of the wife, that no records were kept and that no attempt at segregation was made at any time. It further appears that a few days before the trial Mrs. Nelson put down from memory the amounts she had received as a teacher during the various years, and one of the contentions seems to be that a sum equal to the amount of these earnings together with her original $5,000, should be considered as her separate property and be exempt from her husband's debt.

[1-4] This property having been deeded to Mrs. Nelson there was a presumption that it was her separate property. Civ. Code, § 164. This presumption, however, is a rebuttable one. Estate of Cronvall, 220 Cal. 503, 31 P.2d 372. In that case, while the court said that the evidence was meager, it was held sufficient to overcome the presumption and to establish the community character of the property. Section 168 of the Civil Code provides that the earnings of a wife are not liable for the debts of her husband, except for necessities. This exemption may be waived and is waived where such earnings are so mingled with community property as to lose their identity. Pfunder v. Goodwin, 83 Cal.App. 551, 257 P. 119. It is well settled in this state that where separate and community property are so commingled that they cannot be traced, and the identity of each has been lost, the whole will be treated as community property since the burden is upon the party claiming that the property is separate to establish that fact. Fountain v. Maxim, 210 Cal. 48, 290 P. 576; Estate of Fellows, 106 Cal.App. 681, 289 P. 887. And where separate and community property is thus mingled a wife may not thereafter claim an exemption as to a sum which equals the amount of her earnings which she has theretofore placed in the common fund. Street v. Bertolone, 193 Cal. 751, 226 P. 913.

[5] In the light of these established rules it cannot be here held that the evidence is not sufficient to support the findings of which the appellants complain. While there are conflicts in the evidence these have been resolved by the trial court in favor of the respondent.

In their final brief the appellants raise the point that this action was begun some nine months after the delivery of the sheriff's certificate of sale, and some three months before the expiration of the year of redemption and the issuance of the sheriff's deed, and that the sheriff's deed had not been recorded at the time of the trial. It is argued that this action was premature, that the respondent had no title at the time the action was brought, and that he has failed to prove that he ever had title.

[6, 7] Section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that such an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an interest in real property, adverse to him. At the time of the sale the respondent acquired any interest in this property possessed by the judgment debtor (§ 700, Code Civ.Proc.), and the other appellant claimed title adversely to him. The fact that any interest acquired by the respondent was then subject to a right of redemption did not deprive him of a present interest. In Pollard v. Harlow, 138 Cal. 390, 71 P. 454, 455, 648, it was pointed out that while the property is still subject to redemption "the case is simply the familiar one of a legal title defeasible upon the happening of a condition subsequent", and also that while a deed is subsequently to be given that deed gives to the purchaser no new title to the land but is merely evidence that his title has become absolute. It would seem to follow that the respondent had sufficient claim of title to enable him to bring and maintain this action, although it might have been defeated by a timely redemption.

[8] A further consideration is that this point was raised for the first time in appellants' reply brief, and we are not required to act upon it. Tagus Ranch Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 7 Cal.App.2d 457, 46 P.2d 809; Lady v. Palen, 12 Cal.App.2d 3, 54 P.2d 1134; Lotts v. Board of Park Com'rs, 13 Cal.App.2d 625, 57 P.2d 215; Witter v. Bank of Milpitas, 204 Cal. 570, 269 P. 614. We would be the more disinclined to act upon it since the situation could have been met by appropriate proceedings in the trial court, had the point there been raised, and since the evidence so clearly discloses a commingling of the various funds owned by the appellants that it may not reasonably be expected that a reversal and new trial would change the result.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOURSE et al. v. KOVACEVICH.

Civ. 2586.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 6, 1941.

1. Evidence ⇐384, 397(1), 429, 433(1), 448

When terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by parties, it is to be construed as containing all terms of agreement, and there can be, between parties and their representatives or successors in interest, no other evidence of terms of agreement than contents of writing, except where a mistake or imperfection in writing is put in issue by pleadings, where validity of agreement is the fact in dispute, or to explain an ambiguity in agreement. Code Civ.Proc. § 1856; Civ.Code, § 1625.

2. Evidence ⇐384

The "parol evidence rule" is not a rule of evidence but is a rule of substantive law.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Parol Evidence Rule".

3. Evidence ⇐384

The "parol evidence rule" does not exclude evidence for any of the reasons ordinarily requiring exclusion, based on probative value of such evidence, or policy of its exclusion.

4. Evidence ⇐384

The "parol evidence rule", as applied to contracts, is that as a matter of substantive law the act of embodying complete terms of an agreement in a writing becomes the contract of parties, and extrinsic evidence is excluded because it cannot serve to prove what an agreement was, this being determined, as matter of law, to be the writing itself.

5. Evidence ⇐442(1)

The "parol evidence rule" comes into operation when there is a single and final memorial of understanding of parties, and, when that takes place, prior and contemporaneous negotiations, oral or written, are excluded.

6. Mines and minerals ⇐55(5)

Under written contract and deed providing that grantors reserved from land conveyed an "equal one-eighth of any royalty of all oil, gas * * *" developed on or received from land "together with one-eighth of any cash bonus received from said land", quoted words meant that grantors reserved to themselves one-eighth of any royalties and one-eighth of any bonus, and words "equal one-eighth" meant an amount equal to each of the other one-eighths, and use of "any royalties" indicated that parties intended that whatever royalties were received grantors were to receive an equal one-eighth thereof.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Equal One-Eighth of Any Royalty of All Oil, Gas * * *".

7. Evidence ⇐450(3, 5)

Under written contract and deed providing that grantors reserved from land conveyed an "equal one-eighth of any royalty of all oil, gas * * *" developed on or received from land "together with one-eighth of any cash bonus received from said land", there was no ambiguity in instruments, and hence parol testimony of statements and intentions of parties when contract was made was inadmissible in proceeding for declaratory relief concerning contract and deed. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1060, 1856; Civ.Code, § 1625.

8. Contracts ⇐154

Where plain, unambiguous wording of a contract permits a complete fulfillment of obligations assumed and promotes object of agreement, that construction is to be preferred, to one dependent upon forced addition to, or elimination of, the terms of agreement.

9. Contracts ⇐143

It is not the province of the court to alter a contract by construction, or to make a new contract for parties, nor can the court rewrite clear terms of a lawful contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; W. L. Bradshaw, Judge.

Proceeding by Laurence B. Nourse and others against Ellen Kovacevich for declaratory relief respecting a written contract and deed. From a judgment of the superior court in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Iener W. Nielsen and Harold V. Thompson, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Harvey, Johnston & Baker, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

KLETTE, Justice pro tem.

On October 4, 1930, plaintiffs and respondents, entered into a contract to sell to John J. Kovacevich and David Freedman, certain real property in Kern county. On October 29, 1937, in accordance with said contract, plaintiffs and respondents, deeded said real property to John J. Kovacevich, who had acquired the interest of David Freedman. Title to the real property later passed to Ellen Kovacevich, defendant and appellant.

Both the contract and deed contained the following reservations as to oil royalties: "It is understood and agreed that the sellers do hereby reserve from the land herein mentioned an equal one-eighth of any royalty of all oil, gas, gasoline or other hydrocarbon substances developed on or received from said land, together with one-eighth of any cash bonus received from said land, and that said property is sold subject thereto, and second party shall have the right to lease said land for oil development without signature or authorization of first party, * * *".

On January 3, 1935, about four years and three months after the contract of sale was made, but before the deed was executed, an oil and gas lease was placed on the real property, by the parties, which provided for a one-eighth royalty.

This action was instituted by plaintiffs and respondents, against defendant and appellant, for declaratory relief under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The complaint alleges that an actual controversy has arisen, between plaintiffs and defendant, relative to said reservation of oil and gas royalties, plaintiffs claiming they are entitled to one-half thereof, and that defendant claimed that plaintiffs were only entitled to one-eighth thereof, and that she, the defendant, was entitled to seven-eighths thereof.

After answer was filed, a trial was had before the court, without a jury, and evidence was received as to the surrounding circumstances, conversations, and understanding of the parties at the time the contract was made. The court found for plaintiffs and respondents, and against defendant and appellant, on all of the issues, and entered its judgment in accordance therewith, that plaintiffs and respondents were to receive one-half of all royalties from said land, and that defendant and appellant was to receive one-half of said royalties. Appeal was taken by defendant from this judgment.

[1] It is the established law, that when the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing, by the parties, it is to be construed as containing all the terms of the agreement, and there can be, between the parties and their representatives or successors in interest, no other evidence of the terms of the agreement, than the contents of the writing, except (1) where a mistake or imperfection in the writing is put in issue by the pleadings, (2) where the validity of the agreement is the fact in dispute, or (3) to explain an ambiguity in the agreement. Sec. 1856, Code Civ.Proc.; sec. 1625, Civ.Code; First Bond & Mortgage Co. v. Malouf, 37 Cal.App.2d 74, 98 P.2d 824; Williams v. Silverstein, 213 Cal. 269, 2 P.2d 165; Lynch v. Melby, 129 Cal.App. 646, 19 P.2d 49; Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 166 P. 808; Estate of Gaines, 15 Cal.2d 255, 100 P.2d 1055.

This case does not come under the first or second clauses above mentioned but under the third clause, and is based upon the claim that an ambiguity exists in the reservation clause in the contract and deed.

[2-5] The parol evidence rule, as is now universally recognized, is not a rule of evidence, but is one of substantive law. It does not exclude evidence for any of the reasons ordinarily requiring exclusion, based on the probative value of such evidence, or the policy of its exclusion. The rule, as applied to contracts, is, simply, that as a matter of substantive law, the act of embodying the complete terms of an agreement in a writing, becomes the contract of the parties. Extrinsic evidence is excluded, because it cannot serve to prove what an agreement was, this being determined as a matter of law, to be the writing itself. The rule comes into operation, when there is a single and final memorial of the understanding of the parties. When that takes place, prior and contemporaneous negotiations, oral or written, are excluded. Estate of Gaines, supra; Hanrahan-Wilcox Corp. v. Jenison Machinery Co., 23 Cal.App.2d 642, 73 P.2d 1241; Rottman v. Hevener, 54 Cal. App. 474, 202 P. 329.

[6, 7] We find no ambiguity in the writing involved in this appeal, hence, parol evidence was not admissible to explain away an ambiguity. The words, "equal one-eighth of any royalty of all oil, gas," etc. "together with one-eighth of any cash bonus received from said land," can only mean one thing, and that is, that respondent grantors reserved to themselves, one-eighth of any royalties, and one-eighth of any bonus. The words "equal one-eighth", can only mean an amount equal to each of the other one-eighths. Certainly it did not mean that they had reserved a "one-half of all royalties from said premises," as the court held. The use of the words, "any royalties", used in the phrase, under consideration, indicates that the parties did not, at that time, have in mind any specific royalties which might be obtained under a lease, but rather, whatever the royalties received, the respondents were to receive an "equal one-eighth" thereof. Had they meant one-half, why did they not say "equal one-half", instead of "equal one-eighth"?

[8] Where the plain, unambiguous wording of a contract, permits a complete fulfillment of the obligations assumed, and promotes the object of the agreement, that construction is to be preferred, to one dependent upon forced addition to or elimination of, the terms of the agreement. Winship v. Wilkes, 121 Cal.App. 44, 8 P.2d 502; Oberwise v. Poulos, 124 Cal.App. 247, 12 P.2d 156.

[9] It is not the province of the court to alter a contract by construction, or to make a new contract for the parties, nor can the court rewrite the clear terms of a lawful contract. Wells v. Union Oil Co., 25 Cal.App.2d 165, 76 P.2d 696; Grey v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 359; Greene v. Vargas, 7 Cal.App.2d 127, 45 P.2d 347; Hill v. General Petroleum Corp., 128 Cal.App. 284, 16 P.2d 1035.

The court holds that there is no ambiguity in the reservations in the contract and deed, which the trial court was called upon to construe; that the trial court erred in admitting oral testimony of the statements and intentions of the parties at the time the contract was made; and that the trial court has, by its judgment, made a new and different contract for the parties, than that which they entered into.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

ARONSON et al. v. BANK OF AMERICA N. T. & S. A., et al.

Civ. 12250.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 31, 1941.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 17, 1941.

Hearing Denied March 31, 1941.

1. Banks and banking ⇐40
Executors and administrators ⇐334, 349 (2)

At any time before decree of distribution, administrators of an estate had authority to effect a sale of personalty, and short of knowledge or notice of a wrongful purpose, a bank's predecessor was in no position to question a request by administrators for transfer of stock made on presentation of a properly endorsed certificate, and without such knowledge, no liability could attach to bank for a transfer so made. Code Civ.Proc. § 1523; Civ.Code, § 324.

2. Banks and banking ⇐40

Whether bank's predecessor on whose books administrators caused stock to be transferred knew or did not know that transferee would hold or sell stock was of no consequence on question of bank's liability for conversion of stock, nor did fact alone that predecessor knew that stock was later to be used for account of administrators individually charge predecessor with knowledge of a wrongful purpose.

3. Banks and banking ⇐40

Where certain counts of complaint in action against bank and administrators for conversion of bank stock complained of transfers of stock made by bank's predecessor before distribution of estate was decreed and did not show that predecessor had any knowledge at time of transfers that administrators intended to apply stock or proceeds of transfer to their own use and benefit or to the benefit of any third party or that at the time predecessor was in possession of facts amounting to notice of any such plan or purpose, those counts did not state a cause of action against bank.

4. Pleading ⇐8(3, 15)

In action against bank and administrators for conversion of bank stock, allegations of fraud and conspiracy, unsupported by any facts and standing alone, constituted pure "conclusions" of the pleaders insufficient to charge bank and administrators with any wrong.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Conclusions".

5. Pleading ⇐8(21)

In action against bank and administrators to recover for conversion of bank stock allegedly transferred by bank's predecessor after date when decree of distribution was made and entered, allegation that at all times up to and including stated date predecessor and its officers, managers, and directors had actual knowledge of all facts and matters alleged which occurred or existed before that date was an allegation of an "ultimate fact" and not a "conclusion of law" with respect to existence of decree of distribution.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Conclusion of Law" and "Ultimate Fact".

6. Corporations ⇐134

A wrongful transfer of stock on the books of a corporation renders the corporation liable for a "conversion" of the stock, and where the corporation has knowledge of the lack of authority of an agent demanding the transfer, the corporation is so liable if it transfers the stock upon such a demand.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Conversion".

7. Executors and administrators ⇐315(6)

A decree of distribution of an estate confirms the title which has accrued under the law of descent and is intended to be a final disposition of the entire estate, so that nothing remains for the court to act upon, and there is nothing left for the legal representatives to do but to obey the decree and deliver the property of the estate into the hands of the heirs or legatees. Code Civ.Proc. § 1666; Probate Code, § 1021.

8. Executors and administrators ⇐315(7)

Where distribution of an estate has been decreed, the representative of the estate becomes personally liable for refusing to comply with the decree, and the court may compel performance on his part. Code Civ.Proc. § 1666; Probate Code, § 1021.

9. Banks and banking ⇐40

In action against bank and administrators to recover for conversion of bank stock, counts of complaint charging that transfers of stock by bank's predecessor occurred after date when decree of distribution was entered and alleging that predecessor had knowledge of that decree when transfers were demanded by administrators contained a sufficient charge that transfers were made with knowledge of lack of authority in administrators demanding transfers and hence were sufficient to state a cause of action for "conversion" against bank. Code Civ.Proc. § 1666; Probate Code, § 1021.

10. Banks and banking ⇐40
Executors and administrators ⇐431(1)

In action against bank and administrators to recover for conversion of bank stock, where facts alleged showed that defendant bank's predecessor committed an actual conversion in effecting an unauthorized transfer of stock, no demand for stock certificates was necessary before commencement of action for conversion.

11. Banks and banking ⇐40
Executors and administrators ⇐443(7)

A complaint charging bank and administrators with conversion of bank stock was not fatally defective because of failure to allege a demand for stock certificates, even if demand was necessary, where complaint revealed circumstances rendering a demand futile, and it was alleged that a demand was made for value of stock converted and that bank and administrators refused to pay the same or any part thereof.

12. Banks and banking ⇐40

Where complaint in action against bank and administrators for conversion of bank stock alleged that bank took over all assets of its predecessor and paid no consideration therefor and that predecessor was dissolved before commencement of action and revealed that predecessor was left with nothing with which to respond in damages, bank was the only party able to respond in damages for conversion of stock by predecessor, as against contention that bank did not succeed to or assume any liabilities arising out of the relationship of predecessor with its shareholders. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 652, § 31.

13. Banks and banking ⇐40

The statute providing that the rights of creditors of a bank selling its business to another bank shall not be impaired by sale and that any liability or obligation for payment of any money due or to become due or any claim or demand in any manner or for any cause existing against selling bank or any stockholder thereof shall not be released or impaired, but that buying bank shall succeed to all such relations, obligations, trusts, and liabilities is broad enough to include contingent liabilities for tortious acts of selling bank, particularly where sale leaves selling bank without ability to respond in damages. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 652, § 31.

14. Limitation of actions ⇐72(2)

A cause of action for conversion of bank stock "accrued" to minors themselves, and the existence of a general guardian had no effect on the tolling of the statute of limitations during minority under statute. Code Civ.Proc. § 352.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Accrued".

15. Limitation of actions ⇐72(1)

The appointment of a general guardian has no effect on the tolling of the statute of limitations with respect to a cause of action accruing to or vesting in a minor. Code Civ. Proc. § 352.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Herbert Hellman Aronson and others against Bank of America N. T. & S. A. and others to recover damages for an alleged conversion of certain shares of bank stock. From a judgment dismissing the action as to the defendant bank after a demurrer interposed by the bank to the first amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend further, plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment reversed with directions.

Mitchell, Silberberg, Roth & Knupp and Livingston & Livingston, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edmund Nelson, G. L. Berrey, and Freston & Files, and James A. McLaughlin, all of Los Angeles (Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Bank of America, etc.

DORAN, Justice.

Appellants as plaintiffs instituted this action to recover damages for an alleged conversion of certain shares of bank stock and now appeal from a judgment dismissing the said action as to the respondent bank after a demurrer interposed by the bank to the first amended complaint herein was sustained without leave to amend further. The appeal is prosecuted from the judgment of dismissal upon a bill of exceptions, in which appellants assign as error the order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend, the denial of appellants' motion to amend the said order so as to permit further amendment of the complaint and the denial of a motion for an order granting leave to amend the complaint by filing certain proposed amendments. The respondent bank demurred both generally and specially.

The instant action is the second such between the same parties and for the same cause. A general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint in the first action was sustained without leave to amend, the cause was dismissed and the judgment of dismissal was affirmed by the Supreme Court of this state on October 4, 1937, the opinion being reported in Aronson v. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, 9 Cal.2d 640, 72 P.2d 548. The facts which form the basis of appellants' complaint are briefly summarized in that opinion.

The court there held that the complaint failed to state a cause of action because it failed to show that the administrators had exercised dominion over the shares and converted them to their own use and benefit, that in the absence of allegations to the contrary it must be presumed that they were acting in their capacity as administrators of the estate, that there were no allegations showing that the plaintiffs suffered any injury in the transaction, and that as to the predecessor bank, it was not shown that it did anything more than obey the provisions of section 324 of the Civil Code, as it then read, which section then provided that "such shares of stock * * may be transferred by indorsement by the signature of the proprietor, his agent, attorney, or legal representative, and the delivery of the certificate". The court held that the said section did not require proof of the authority of the legal representative, and the bank could not be held guilty of a conversion in following the mode of conduct prescribed by the statute.

Before the affirmance of the judgment in the former action and on November 28, 1936, the present action was commenced by appellants and the complaint therein was thereafter amended on June 18, 1937, and again on May 21, 1938, after which respondent bank put in an appearance and interposed its demurrer.

The complaint sets forth four separate counts, each count based upon a transaction whereby defendants Marco and Irving Hellman as administrators of the estate of appellants' mother, Amy Hellman Aronson, deceased, caused certain shares of stock, the property of the estate, to be transferred upon the books of a predecessor of respondent bank, whose assets and business respondent bank later purchased and whose liabilities the said respondent thereby assumed. The complaint alleges that distribution of the estate was decreed in October, 1925. The first and second counts of the complaint are concerned with transfers of stock made before the decree of distribution, the third and fourth counts have to do with transfers after such decree was made and entered. The transfers are alleged to have been made either to third parties or to one of the administrators, and it is alleged that the said administrators never applied to the court for approval and confirmation of the transfer and never accounted to the plaintiffs for said stock, but converted the same to their own use and benefit.

[1] Appellants in their brief confine their argument to the fourth count of the complaint on the ground that if any one of the counts states a cause of action, then the general demurrer to such count was not well taken. It should be pointed out, however, that the first two counts of the complaint differ from the third and fourth in a vital respect, namely, that they involve transfers made before the decree of distribution of the estate. As will hereinafter appear, upon the facts alleged, and under the ruling of the Supreme Court in the first action hereinabove cited, the only basis for the liability of respondent bank's predecessor for conversion of the stock would be knowledge of lack of authority of the administrators at the time of the transfer of the stock in question. Without such knowledge, under the law as it then existed, no liability could attach to the predecessor bank for a transfer of stock made under the circumstances alleged in the complaint. At any time before the decree of distribution the administrators were clothed with authority to effect a sale of the personal property and, short of knowledge or notice of a wrongful purpose, the bank was not in a position to question a request for transfer of stock made on presentation of a properly endorsed certificate. § 1523, Code Civ.Proc.; 324 Civ. Code; Aronson v. Bank of America, supra.

Appellants have failed in any attempt to charge the predecessor bank in any one of the counts of the complaint with knowledge of a wrongful purpose of the administrators in procuring the transfer of the stock. The facts of which the said bank is alleged to have knowledge are not such as would even put the bank on notice that the transaction was wrongful. The allegations of all four counts are similar in this respect. The bank is in effect charged with knowledge that the transfer of the stock was not made for the purpose of enabling the administrators to continue to hold said stock in the said estate, nor for the purpose of effecting a subsequent sale for the benefit of the estate, but was, on the contrary, made so as to permit a third party to deal with the stock as his own and for his own account and for the account of the administrators, individually and personally, and to permit the third party and the administrators to use the stock in their own personal speculations. All of which is no more than to charge the bank with knowledge that the stock was transferred to a third party so that he could use it as his own; which is the principal purpose of any transfer of stock.

[2] The term "subsequent sale" as used in the complaint can only be taken to mean a resale of the stock by the transferee. What the transferee did with the stock after it became his could have no bearing upon the nature of the transfer here complained of and whether the bank knew or did not know that the transferee would hold or sell the stock is of no consequence. Nor does the fact alone that the bank knew that the stock was later to be used for the account of the administrators individually charge the bank with knowledge of a wrongful purpose. The Supreme Court in its decision in the first action above referred to had before it the fact that one of the transactions complained of involved a direct transfer of stock to one of the administrators individually, yet the court there held that the complaint did not state a cause of action against the bank for a wrongful conversion. If a direct transfer of stock to one of the administrators as an individual does not put the transferring bank on notice as to a wrongful purpose it cannot be said that knowledge that the administrator would later use the stock for his own account could be of any greater effect. It should be obvious that if the stock is transferred to any person as an individual, an administrator included, it is that person's intention to use the stock for his own account. The decision of the Supreme Court in the first action is controlling upon the question of the effect of any such knowledge upon the part of the predecessor bank.

[3, 4] The important factor is knowledge on the part of the bank as to what disposition was to be made of the proceeds received on the transfer and whether any proceeds were to be forthcoming. As to this the complaint is silent and fails to show that the bank in question had any knowledge at the time of the transfers that the administrators intended to apply the stock or the proceeds of the transfer to their own use and benefit or to the benefit of any third party, or that, at the time, the bank was in possession of such facts as to amount to notice of any such plan or purpose.

Since the transfers complained of in the first and second counts of appellants' complaint occurred before distribution of the estate was decreed and since appellants have failed to charge the predecessor bank with the requisite knowledge of a wrongful purpose on the part of the administrators, those two counts still fall within the rule laid down in Aronson v. Bank of America, supra, and for the reasons there given the said counts fail to state a cause of action against respondent bank. The allegations of fraud and conspiracy are unsupported by any facts stated in the first and second counts and, standing alone as they do, constitute pure conclusions on the part of the pleaders, insufficient to charge the defendants with any wrong. See Kavanagh v. Wade, Cal. App., 108 P.2d 475; Moropoulos v. C. H. & O. B. Fuller Co., 186 Cal. 679, 683, 200 P. 601.

[5] As to the remaining counts, however, the transfers of stock are alleged to have occurred at a time after the date when the decree of distribution was made and entered, and it is further alleged that: "At all said times from the date of its incorporation up to and including December 8, 1928, Merchants National Trust and Savings Bank of Los Angeles, and its executive officers, managers, and directors, had actual knowledge of all the facts and matters hereinabove alleged which occurred or existed prior to December 8, 1928." The bank named in the allegation is the predecessor of respondent bank.

Respondent attacks the above quoted allegation as insufficient to charge the bank with knowledge in that it amounts to a mere conclusion of law. The point was raised by respondent's special demurrer. As to the existence of the decree of distribution, which according to the complaint is a "fact" and "matter" existing prior to December 8, 1928, the above allegation, though very general and perhaps not in the best form, is in effect an allegation that the bank knew of the existence of the decree of distribution at all such times, and constitutes an allegation of an ultimate fact and not a conclusion of law. Farmers Life Ins. Co. v. Ignacio State Bank, 85 Colo. 46, 272 P. 1116; 49 C.J. 69 and cases cited in note 85 thereof.

[6] A wrongful transfer of stock upon the books of a corporation renders the corporation liable for a conversion of the stock, Aronson v. Bank of America, supra, 9 Cal.2d at page 646, 72 P.2d 548, citing 26 Ruling Case Law 1115; and where the corporation has knowledge of the lack of authority of the agent demanding the transfer the corporation is so liable if it transfers the stock upon such a demand. Quay v. Presidio & Ferries R. R. Co., 82 Cal. 1, 22 P. 925; Tafft v. Presidio & Ferries R. R. Co., 84 Cal. 131, 132, 24 P. 436, 11 L.R.A. 125, 18 Am.St.Rep. 166. Therefore, to decide whether the third and fourth counts of the complaint state a cause of action against respondent bank it first becomes necessary to determine what authority, if any, was possessed by the administrators to procure the transfer of the stock in question to themselves or a third party after the entry of the decree of distribution. If the decree terminated any authority of the administrators to procure such a transfer then knowledge on the part of respondent bank's predecessor of the existence of the decree must be held to be knowledge of the lack of authority in the administrators, at the time of the transfers complained of. Quay v. Presidio and Ferries R. R. Co., supra.

[7-9] Section 1666 of the Code of Civil Procedure, then in effect, provided as to such a decree that it was "conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal". Provisions to the same effect are now embodied in section 1021 of the Probate Code. Accordingly, it has been held that the decree of distribution confirms the title which has accrued under the law of descent, and is intended to be a final disposition of the entire estate, so that nothing remains for the court to act upon; and there is nothing left for the legal representative to do but to obey the decree and deliver the property. See the article on Executors and Administrators in 11b Cal.Jur., § 1289, pages 785, 786, and cases there cited; St. Mary's Hospital v. Perry, 152 Cal. 338, 342, 92 P. 864; Rafferty v. Mitchell, 4 Cal.App.2d 491, 41 P. 2d 563. The representative of the estate becomes personally liable for refusing to comply with the decree and the court may compel performance on his part. Estate of Kennedy, 129 Cal. 384, 388, 62 P. 64; 11b Cal.Jur., § 1311, p. 820. From the foregoing, it is clear that after distribution of an estate is decreed the executor or administrator has no further authority but to deliver the property of the estate into the hands of the heirs or legatees; and, specifically, in the instant case the administrators were without authority to demand the transfers of stock complained of in the third and fourth counts of the complaint herein. Furthermore, since it is alleged that the predecessor bank had knowledge of the decree of distribution at the time the said transfers were demanded, it follows that the complaint herein contains a sufficient charge that the transfers in question were made by the said bank with knowledge of the lack of authority in the agent demanding the same; and hence, if true, such transfers constituted an unlawful exercise of dominion over the property of the plaintiffs (appellants), who are shown by the complaint to be the heirs at law entitled to inherit their mother's estate. On the facts as alleged in said counts, it must be held that a cause of action for conversion is therein stated.

[10, 11] Respondent contends that appellants' statement of the cause of action is fatally defective because of failure to allege a demand for the stock certificates. But the facts alleged show that respondent's predecessor committed an actual conversion in effecting an unauthorized transfer of the stock and under such circumstances no demand is necessary before the commencement of an action for conversion. Mier v. Southern California Ice Co., 56 Cal.App. 512, 518, 206 P. 83. Even if demand were necessary the complaint reveals circumstances which would render such a demand futile; moreover, it is alleged that a demand was made for the value of the stock converted and that the defendants refused to pay the same or any part thereof.

[12, 13] Respondent also contends that through its purchase of the banking business and assets of its predecessor under section 31 of the Bank Act, it did not succeed to or assume any liabilities arising out of the relationship of its predecessor with the shareholders thereof, but only assumed the liabilities incurred by its predecessor in the course of its banking business. The complaint herein sets forth that respondent took over all the assets of its predecessor and paid its predecessor no consideration therefor, and reveals a situation wherein the predecessor was left with nothing with which to respond in damages. The purchase of the business is alleged to have been effected through an exchange of shares directly with the shareholders of the predecessor bank. It is also alleged that the predecessor was dissolved prior to the commencement of the instant action. It appears therefore that respondent bank is the only party now able to respond in damages for the conversion of the stock by its predecessor. In view of the broad language employed in section 31 of the Bank Act, as amended by Statutes 1913, page 151; Statutes 1921, page 1373; Statutes 1927, page 1792, Vol. 1, Deering's General Laws 1937, Act 652, p. 234, it cannot reasonably be said that a purchase of assets such as the one here alleged was not intended to carry with it responsibility for all liabilities of whatever kind or nature. In fact, the act expressly so provides, where in section 31 it is said: "The rights of creditors of the selling bank shall not in any manner be impaired by any such sale, nor shall any liability or obligation for the payment of any money due or to become due, or any claim or demand, in any manner, or for any cause existing against such selling bank or against any stockholder thereof, be in any manner released or impaired * * *, but such bank to which the other shall sell all its business or all the business of any of its departments, shall succeed to all such relations, obligations, trusts and liabilities and be held liable to pay and discharge all such debts and liabilities and to perform all such trusts of the selling bank in the same manner as if such bank to which the other had sold had itself incurred the obligation or liability * * *." (Italics added.) The language of the section above quoted is broad enough to include contingent liabilities for tortious acts of the selling bank, particularly when, as it appears here, the sale leaves the selling bank without ability to respond in damages.

Respondent contends that there is a distinction to be drawn between the "internal" and "external" affairs of a corporation. While that may be conceded, it is not the point here involved. The question here to be determined is whether the language of section 31 of the Bank Act is broad enough to cover all liabilities of a selling bank regardless of distinction or classification, and, as seen above, the answer in the instant case is in the affirmative.

[14, 15] Respondent by its demurrer attempted to raise the bar of the statute of limitations. The complaint affirmatively shows that at the time of the transfers complained of the plaintiffs were minors under the protection of a general guardian and continued under such custody until arriving at their majority. Appellants contend the statute of limitations was tolled during their minority and rely upon the provisions of section 352 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Respondent argues that the cause of action vested in the general guardian and that the period of limitation commenced to run from the time the cause of action accrued. In the previous action hereinabove referred to this question was considered by division two of this court (See Aronson v. Bank of America, Cal.App., 65 P.2d 823) when the case was before it prior to the hearing in the Supreme Court, and the question was not passed upon by the Supreme Court in its decision. Aronson v. Bank of America, supra. This court held that the existence of a general guardian had no effect upon the tolling of the statute during minority under section 352, Code of Civil Procedure, and the reasons there given and the authorities there cited are sound. It is clear that the cause of action herein accrued to appellants themselves and that it is generally held that the appointment of a general guardian has no effect upon the tolling of the statute of limitations as to a cause of action accruing to or "vesting" in a minor. See Funk v. Wingert, 134 Md. 523, 107 A. 345, 6 A.L.R. 1686, and annotation, 6 A.L.R. 1689.

Although not discussed to any extent in the briefs, it appears that respondent's special demurrer to the third and fourth counts of the complaint on the grounds of uncertainty is not well taken, either because uncertainties specified do not exist or because the matter objected to is immaterial or surplus matter which may be left out of the pleading without impairing its sufficiency. 21 Cal.Jur. 105, 106. It should be mentioned in passing that the complaint is far from a model of pleading and is in no sense concise. It is clear, however, that no attempt has been made to set out more than one cause of action in each count.

In view of the fact that the allegations of the first and second counts of the complaint reveal a situation wherein no cause of action would lie against respondent bank or its predecessor the trial court did not err in refusing to grant leave to plaintiffs to amend those counts, but for the reasons above given the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the third and fourth counts and in dismissing the action.

The judgment of dismissal is therefore reversed with directions to the trial court to grant appellants leave to file an amended complaint if they are so advised.

CAMPBELL v. BIRCH et al.

Civ. 12069.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 5, 1941.

Hearing Granted April 3, 1941.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1008(1)

In action based upon fraud, issues as to the falsity of representations made, their materiality and plaintiff's reliance upon them are "questions of fact" for the trial court.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Questions of Fact".

2. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

On appeal in action based on fraud, the District Court of Appeal may not interfere with findings of fact which are supported by substantial evidence, though it may not agree with the conclusions reached by the trial judge.

3. Trusts ⇐262

In action by trustee to recover difference between rental stipulated in lease and lesser amount which trustee was allegedly induced to accept by fraud and deceit respecting solvency of obligors, evidence sustained recovery.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇐238

Where lease provided that lessee should pay all reasonable costs, expenses and attorney's fees incurred by or against lessors in any litigation between the parties arising out of or in connection with the lease, in case the lessors or parties claiming under them should prove successful, attorney's fees and expenses were properly awarded trustee who was successful in action to recover difference between rental stipulated and lesser amount which he was induced to accept by fraud.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1050(1)

Where evidence alleged to have been erroneously admitted was of such character that appellant suffered no prejudice, any slight error in admission was not ground for reversal.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Caryl M. Sheldon, Judge.

Action by Roy Campbell, as trustee, against A. Otis Birch and others, to recover difference between stipulated rental and lesser amount which plaintiff was allegedly induced to accept by fraud and deceit of the defendants. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

George Acret, of Los Angeles (substituted for Clifford A. Rohe), for appellants Birch.

Clyde F. Murphy, of North Hollywood, for appellant Minter.

Syril S. Tipton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

This action arises out of a 99-year lease of real property located in the city of Los Angeles, which lease was executed on June 6, 1928, and provided that appellant A. Otis Birch should pay rental of $1,000 per month during the period covered by this action. Respondent in his trustee capacity prosecutes the action as the successor in interest of the original lessors, and seeks to recover the difference between the stipulated rental of the lease and a lesser amount which he alleges he was induced to accept by the fraud and deceit of the appellants, A. Otis Birch, his wife, M. Estelle C. Birch, and his cousin, Lula M. Minter, together with costs, expenses and attorney's fees as provided in the lease.

It is alleged, and admitted, that on August 1, 1935, there remained unpaid certain judgments amounting to $6,395.70 which had theretofore been recovered by respondent against appellant A. Otis Birch for rental due under said lease, and in addition there was due from said appellant on the said date the further sum of $3,016.89 for unpaid rent and interest thereon for the months of May, June and July of 1935, or a total of $9,413.59.

It is also alleged that just prior to August 1, 1935, appellants Birch made an offer to compromise said claims for the sum of $6,000 upon the condition that respondent "agree to a reduction in the rent provided in said lease for a period of five years". Accordingly, on said August 1, 1935, respondent and appellants Birch executed a modification agreement providing that in lieu of the payment of $1,000 monthly instalments of rental required by the original lease, appellants should pay the sum of $500 per month for the period of August 1, 1935, to August 1, 1936, and for the four-year period thereafter ensuing appellants should pay a reduced rental pursuant to a graduated schedule agreed upon. Thereafter, the probate court granted respondent's petition for permission to accept said compromise and to execute said modification agreement.

The instant action was instituted on April 17, 1937, to recover the sum of $8,413.59 in damages, of which the sum of $3,413.59 was alleged to have been sustained by reason of the compromise and settlement of judgments and claims for rent, and of which the sum of $5,000 was alleged to have been sustained by reason of the modification agreement and the acceptance of a reduced rental for a period of ten months.

The gist of this action is fraud in inducing respondent to alter his position to his damage, it being alleged that prior to August 1, 1935, respondent had levied execution under some of the judgments above mentioned upon real property of appellant Birch, including that parcel known as 1144 South Broadway, Los Angeles, and that on or prior to October 15, 1934, appellants had entered into a conspiracy to defraud and deceive respondent; that in pursuance thereof and with the express intent to defraud and deceive respondent, appellants Birch executed a note for $15,000 secured by a trust deed naming Lula M. Minter as beneficiary, covering and purporting to be a lien upon the property situate at 1144 South Broadway; that said trust deed was fictitious and false and appellants Birch did not receive the $15,000 thereunder, nor a further advance of $10,000 under said deed of trust; that appellant Minter did not pay to appellants Birch said sums of $15,000 or $10,000 or any part thereof, and said note and trust deed were executed and recorded pursuant to the scheme and conspiracy of appellants to defraud and deceive respondent and to make the latter believe that A. Otis Birch was insolvent or nearing insolvency.

It was also alleged: "That between the dates of November 8, 1934 and August 1, 1935, the defendants * * * by words and acts lead this plaintiff to believe that the defendants were indebted to the defendant Lula M. Minter, in approximately the sum of 130,000, and that said sum was secured by a pledge of the stock of the Birch Holding Company, and that if this plaintiff insisted upon the collection of the judgments he had recovered against the defendant A. Otis Birch, and insisted upon the payment by said Birch of the monthly rental, as provided in the 99-year lease above mentioned, that the defendant Lula M. Minter would foreclose her pledge on the stock of the Birch Holding Company, as above set out, thereby causing the defendants A. Otis Birch and M. Estelle C. Birch to become insolvent. * * *

"That the various statements and acts of the defendants, and each of them, as above set out, as to the indebtedness between the defendants A. Otis Birch and M. Estelle C. Birch and Lula M. Minter, were false and said indebtedness was false and fictitious and non-existent in fact, which fact was known to the defendants, and each of them, and the statements and acts of the defendants, and each of them, were made and done for the purpose and express intent of deceiving the plaintiff. * * *

"That relying upon the statements and acts of the defendants * * * that (they) were indebted to Lula M. Minter in the sum of $130,000 and that said indebtedness was secured by a pledge of all of the stock of the Birch Holding Company, which company owned all of the property formerly owned by A. Otis Birch, and in fear that the defendant Lula M. Minter would foreclose her pledge upon said stock and for fear that the defendant A. Otis Birch would become insolvent, this plaintiff did, on or about August 20, 1935, accept said offer of $6,000 for his judgments and claims against the defendant A. Otis Birch, which claims at said time totalled the sum of $9,413.59, and further agreed to a modification of said lease, whereby he would accept a lower rental for a period of five years." That had respondent known that the acts and statements of appellants as to the financial condition of the defendant A. Otis Birch were false and the alleged indebtedness of $130,000 existing in favor of appellant Minter was fictitious and false, "he would not have accepted said offer of settlement and would not have agreed to a reduction of rent under said lease."

The trial court found in favor of respondent trustee in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, and judgment was thereafter entered against the three appellants for the sum of $8,413.59 by way of general damages, and for $313.35 for costs of suit; and against appellant A. Otis Birch for the sum of $375 by way of special damages, and for the sum of $878.85 as attorney's fees.

Appellants contend upon this appeal that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment.

It appears from the record herein that in 1928, when the lease from which this litigation arose was executed and its obligations assumed by appellant A. Otis Birch, his net worth was in excess of three millions of dollars; and that in October, 1934, appellant and his wife, M. Estelle C. Birch, formed three corporations, to-wit: (1) Birch Ranch & Oil Company, (2) Birch Securities Company, and (3) Birch Holding Company. They then vested in the Birch Ranch & Oil Company all of their interests and assets in the Conaway Ranch, the Birch Oil Company and the Birch-Royer Oil Company, and vested in Birch Securities Company ownership of the bonds of reclamation district No. 2035 on the Conaway Ranch which was located in Yolo county. Ownership of all of the stock of the Birch Ranch & Oil Company and of the Birch Securities Company was then vested in the Birch Holding Company.

By reference to a financial statement of appellant A. Otis Birch dated April 11, 1933 (Plaintiff's Exhibit 13), it appears that the Birch Oil Company which was thus transferred was valued at $500,000, that its property was clear and that 70% was owned by appellant A. Otis Birch; that the Birch-Royer Oil Company was valued at $300,000, its property was clear and 87½% was owned by Mr. Birch. With respect to the Conaway Ranch, this statement recites: "Conaway Ranch, Woodlands, Calif., 22,000 acres, value $2,200,000; 2,000,000 bonds issued for reclamation work; $454,000 bonds sold, rest of bonds held by Mr. Birch and put up for security for loans. Some of bonds are with Citizens Bank."

All of the stock of the Birch Holding Company was owned by appellants, A. Otis Birch holding 49% and M. Estelle C. Birch holding 51% thereof.

In October, 1934, at the time of the formation of these corporations and the vesting of ownerships, as above noted, appellants Birch executed and delivered to appellant Minter their promissory note for $130,000, and also delivered to her all of the stock of the Birch Holding Company, as security, and she took physical possession of the stock and held it until about the middle of July, 1935.

On August 1, 1935, or thereabouts, the agreement compromising respondent's accrued claims and reducing the rent under the lease was executed.

Shortly before this, to-wit, on July 16, 1935, appellants A. Otis Birch, M. Estelle C. Birch and one Stanley C. Benson, executed an instrument by which it was agreed that appellants Birch "will arrange with Lula M. Minter so that she will release the $25,000 lien she has upon the Broadway property which you (Benson) just purchased, which amount is represented by a $15,000 note secured by a second trust deed, and $10,000 additional advance according to the terms of the note and trust deed. This $25,000 is to be added to our present liability to Miss Minter in the sum of $130,000 as security for the payment of which she holds all of the capital stock of the Birch Holding Company. The Birch Holding Company owns all of the issued and outstanding stock of the Birch Ranch & Oil Company and Birch Securities Company.

"We hereby transfer, sell and assign the entire issued and outstanding capital stock of the Birch Holding Company, to-wit, 100,000 shares, which we own, to you, subject to our present indebtedness of $130,000 to Miss Minter, the $25,000 additional to be added as above mentioned, about $76,000 which we now owe Mrs. Conaway, (the payment of our obligation to Mrs. Conaway being also secured by the Birch Holding Company stock after Miss Minter is paid) and subject also to our right to additional sums which we may be able to borrow from Miss Minter and Mrs. Conaway from time to time, but the maximum for which the Birch Holding Company stock will be held by Miss Minter will be $200,000, and the maximum to Mrs. Conaway $150,000, and they are to be so notified by you and ourselves. * * *

"You (Benson) hereby assume and agree to pay as soon as possible all liabilities of the corporation, also what we personally owe the Citizens National Trust & Savings Bank, California Trust Company, California Bank of Los Angeles, the Hopkins family, and all deficiencies which may be obtained on our notes secured by trust deeds or mortgages on property which we still own or which we have owned and either lost or sold. Any refinancing you may find it necessary to do in order to pay these liabilities or indebtedness, or to operate those corporations, or their properties, shall be done in such manner that we will have no personal liability. * * *

"You and Mr. Birch are to work actively to enhance the value of all assets, lessen the liabilities and expenses, assist in all refinancing, and put the affairs of the corporations and properties in the best condition possible, financially and otherwise, but in so doing, we are not to assume any personal liability. Mr. Birch is to continue to manage the properties of the corporations, subject to the direction and control of the respective Boards of Directors.

"Our present liabilities to any of the corporations for cash advances and otherwise are to be cancelled immediately.

"If and when the corporations and their properties and liabilities are refinanced and reorganized, and you and we agree that the capital stock of the Birch Holding Company has a net market value of at least $1,000,000 you are to pay us the sum of $500,000 in cash." (Italics added.)

On July 16, 1935, coincident with the execution of the foregoing instrument, the appellant Minter delivered to appellants Birch their note in her favor for $130,000 and the note and trust deed for $25,000 also in her favor, released the Birches from all personal obligation to her and accepted in lieu thereof the personal note of Stanley C. Benson for $162,574.66 in her favor, dated July 16, 1935, payable ten years after date. This note provided that Benson should pledge and deposit with the payee thereof (appellant Minter) 100,000 shares of the capital stock of the Birch Holding Company "as collateral security for the payment of this note and of all other obligations of the undersigned (Benson), and also other obligations which may be incurred by A. Otis Birch and M. Estelle C. Birch, as hereinafter more particularly mentioned, in favor of the payee or the holder hereof. * * *"

This personal note of Benson also provided: "This obligation is made and given by the undersigned, Stanley C. Benson, in favor of the payee, Lula M. Minter, to replace the obligation which A. Otis Birch and M. Estelle C. Birch now have to the said payee, Lula M. Minter, in a sum equivalent to the principal of this note, and from which they are hereby fully released by the payee."

In connection with this last mentioned transaction, appellant Minter testified in a deposition given by her on November 7, 1936, that the stock she had held of the Birch Holding Company was returned by her to appellant A. Otis Birch on July 16, 1935, and that it was reissued and returned to her in the name of Mr. Benson.

With reference to the agreement of July 16, 1935, between the Birches and Benson, and the Benson note to Minter providing for pledge of and deposit by Benson of the Birch Holding Company stock to Minter, the stock was not returned to Miss Minter as collateral security for the said Benson note, but instead the Birches and Benson executed an instrument denominated a voting trust agreement designating the Birches as trustees and Benson as beneficiary, and providing that all of the stock of the Birch Holding Company, comprising 100,000 shares, should be deposited with the trustees, who were vested with "all of the powers, rights and privileges of a shareholder of the corporation", and also the power to "vote for, do or assent, or consent to, any act or proceeding which the shareholders of said company might or could vote for, do or assent, or consent to." At the same time, to-wit, on July 16, 1935, appellants Birch executed a purported trustee's certificate certifying that they had received from Stanley C. Benson certain certificates issued in their names evidencing ownership of 100,000 shares of the capital stock of the Birch Holding Company, and reciting that these shares were to be transferred on the books of said corporation to appellants Birch, as trustees, and to be held by them under the so-called voting trust agreement of July 16, 1935. Neither this certificate nor the voting trust agreement made any mention of Lula M. Minter or the fact that said stock had been pledged to her as collateral security for the Benson note.

Respondent Campbell testified that early in the spring of 1935 (prior to the execution of the various instruments between the Birches, Minter and Benson dated July 16, 1935), appellant A. Otis Birch came to his office and informed him that "his financial condition was such that he did not have funds available to pay the rent (of the 99-year lease) and he would have to have a modification; that he simply could not go on. That he owed lots of money * * * (to appellant Minter) $130,000 on a note she held the stock of the Birch Holding Company as security for, and that he owed her $25,000 on a second mortgage (trust deed) on the Broadway property." Said witness testified he talked to Mrs. Birch on the telephone and she told him they were "very anxious to settle this case and get together and make a settlement rather than to go to court to fight about it." He also talked to Mr. Benson who told the witness Campbell that he was acting as intermediary between Mr. Birch and Miss Minter and that he (Benson) "thought he would be able to get her (Minter) to cooperate and not close out Mr. Birch in the event that we could make some kind of a settlement on this lease. * * * He also told me that he personally knew that this was a good mortgage—this second mortgage for $25,000, she had really loaned him (Birch) the money, and that he knew that the $130,000 was actually loaned, in his opinion. Finally, Mr. Benson and I worked out a modified agreement", which was consummated on August 1, 1935.

When respondent Campbell was asked if he relied upon the statements of Birch and Benson to the effect that if the modification agreement was not made that Miss Minter would take some action against the Birch properties, said witness replied: "Yes, I believed * * * that Mr. Birch on August 1st really owed Miss Minter $130,000 on the property which was what I considered the fact * * * and I believed that all I could do would be to attach the stock in order to collect any money, and that Miss Minter would come in with a $130,000 mortgage, and take it away from me, because I could not pay off that large amount of a loan, as well as relying upon the fact that Mr. Birch had said unless he did get relief he would have to go into insolvency, or bankruptcy, or something." Respondent also testified that he had a title search made and was informed that the second mortgage of $25,000 in favor of Minter was a matter of record. Upon cross-examination, respondent stated that Mr. Birch gave him a financial statement signed by him in April, 1933, so that respondent was familiar with the amounts then owed by said appellant Birch, and that it was in March of 1935 at a supplementary proceeding that he first heard that Miss Minter was holding certain stock as security for certain loans she had made to appellant Birch; that when Mr. Birch came to his office in the spring of 1935 and stated that he was unable to borrow from the banks and had to borrow from his relatives, respondent "believed that * * until I found that Lula M. Minter was not holding the stock of the Birch Holding Company." He said he made this discovery when Miss Minter made a deposition on November 7, 1936, at which time she stated "she was holding the stock of the Birch Holding Company under the name of Stanley C. Benson." Continuing on cross-examination, respondent stated that certain statements made by appellant A. Otis Birch during the course of supplementary proceedings in May of 1935 induced him to make the agreement of August 1, 1935, such statements being to the effect that said appellant owed a great deal of money; that he was living by borrowing from his relatives; that he was practically broke; and that the only available funds he had were those borrowed from his relatives. Certain statements made by said appellant at a supplementary proceeding had in July of 1935 also constituted an inducing factor for the agreement of August 1, 1935, as well as telephone conversations which he had with Mrs. Birch.

In answer to the question, "Now, when did you first come to the conclusion, Dr. Campbell, that the statements that were made by Mr. Birch in the month of March, 1935, to the effect that he owed Miss Minter $130,000 were untrue, give me the date, approximately.", the respondent answered: "Well, it was right after Miss Minter's deposition of November 7, 1936, when I had a court order for a handwriting expert to examine the stock, and when they came to court to produce the stock, she did not have it, and that is when I first saw that they were telling things that were not true."

Continuing: "Q. What stock did you request? A. The Birch Holding Company.

"Q. What date was that again, please? A. November 7, 1936.

"Q. * * * Well, Dr. Campbell, didn't you know, as a matter of fact, that Miss Minter was not supposed to have the stock at that time in accordance with the contracts that had been made, did you not know that the stock was being held in a voting trust at that time? A. When—that is when I first found it out; I did not know that.

"Q. Did you not know that Miss Minter in November of 1936 was holding what was known as a voting trust certificate for those shares of stock? A. No, not until I came up to the court on the court order to produce the stock, and they did not have the stock, and they produced this trust certificate in lieu of it, that was the first thing I knew about it.

"Q. Now, when did you first learn that a contract had been made between Mr. Birch, Mrs. Birch and Mr. Stanley Benson on the 16th of July, 1935? A. I learned that at a supplementary proceeding of Mr. Birch when we started to question him, we had a judgment against him and—

"Q. (Interrupting) About what date was that, please? A. The transcript is there.

"Mr. Tipton: About September 22nd, 1936.

"By Mr. Murphy: Was that the first time you knew that such a contract had been made? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Do you know, Dr. Campbell, whether when Mr. Otis Birch was talking to you in the early month of March, 1935, whether it was a fact that at that time Miss Lula M. Minter was holding all of the stock of the Birch Holding Company as security for the payment of the $130,000 note? A. I knew it only as Mr. Birch said so, * * * I did not doubt it at all. He said she had it, and I believed she did. * * *

"Q. * * * Dr. Campbell, I am going to ask you a question point blank: What did you find out was untrue in November of 1936? * * * A. Miss or Mrs. Minter stated she was holding the stock of the Birch Holding Company in the name—the stock was in the name of Stanley C. Benson, and that was not true. The stock has never been in the name, so they say, of Stanley C. Benson, and she was not holding the stock.

"Q. By Mr. Murphy: And you learned that when? * * * A. November the 7th, 1936. * * *

"Q. Yes. So as to understand it correctly, this statement that Miss Minter was holding stock in the name of Stanley C. Benson was not one of the statements which induced you or assisted in inducing you to make the contract of August 1, 1935? A. I did not even know of it at that time. * * *

"Q. But what was there that happened on November 7, 1936, that led you to believe that the statement made by Mr. Birch on May 7, 1935 to the effect that he had given to Miss Minter the Birch Storage stock as security for a loan was not true? * * * A. It is my remembrance Miss Minter said he gave her the stock.

"Q. All right. Did the fact that Mr. Birch told in a supplementary proceeding on May 7, 1935, that he had put up the Birch Storage stock with Miss Minter as security induce you or assist in inducing you to make the contract of August 1, 1935? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Now, don't you know, as a matter of fact, Mr. Campbell, and didn't you know on November 7, 1936, that it was a fact that on July 16, 1935, a contract was made between Mr. Benson and Mr. Birch and Mrs. Birch by which the stock which stood in the name of Mr. Birch and Mrs. Birch in the Birch Holding Company was issued to them as trustees, and that they as trustees executed a voting trust certificate with Stanley C. Benson, and issued to Stanley C. Benson a voting trust for all these shares of stock, which voting trust certificate standing in the name of Stanley C. Benson was endorsed by Stanley C. Benson to Miss Minter, and that she held the voting trust certificate as a pledge to secure the $130,000 note? A. I found that out when I subpoened the stock into court for examination, and she did not have the stock; it was through your office, or your assistant brought up this other agreement, and that is the first I ever knew of it."

Voluminous records consisting of checks, notes, bank statements, deeds, trust deeds, mortgages and other legal documents were introduced in evidence by appellants to show a course of dealing between A. Otis Birch and Lula M. Minter for many years prior to the execution of the 99-year lease which forms the basis of the instant litigation. Appellants maintain that by means of these records they proved the existence of a bona fide obligation between themselves beginning as early as 1897 and steadily growing until 1934 when A. Otis Birch was indebted to Miss Minter in the sum of $130,000; that the representations made to respondent, and which he claimed induced him to enter into the compromise agreement and reduce the rental under the lease, were true; consequently, the findings as to false representations, intention to defraud and as to the existence of a conspiracy are not supported by the evidence.

It is a noteworthy fact that when appellant Birch arranged to have Mr. Benson take over the stock of the Birch Holding Company and to refinance his business and assume his great load of liabilities, no mention was made of the 99-year lease, and when examined under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure by counsel for respondent, Mr. Birch admitted that during the time when he was seeking a modification of the terms of the lease and a compromise agreement with respect to the judgments held against him by respondent, he never mentioned to the latter his negotiations with Benson. He also admitted that under the agreement with Benson and the arrangement with Miss Minter, his obligation of $130,000 and interest thereon was released on July 16, 1935; that he had no agreement, either oral or written, with Miss Minter by which he agreed to pay her the $130,000 which was assumed as an individual obligation by Benson; and that on August 1, 1935 when the compromise and modification agreement was consummated with respondent, he (Birch) did not owe Miss Minter anything. Appellant Birch further testified that he and Benson continued to operate the Birch companies under the agreement with Benson until November 27, 1937.

As hereinbefore stated, the gist of this action is fraud in that appellants deceived respondent and induced the belief, contrary to the facts, that they were insolvent or would forthwith become insolvent and all of their assets would be taken from them by Lula M. Minter through foreclosure of her liens thereon, and that relying upon such belief respondent discounted his existing claims and reduced the rental under the 99-year lease, all to his damage.

A review of the voluminous record in this case conclusively establishes the fact that appellants Birch were not insolvent and that they never even slightly approximated that status. Moreover, the evidence, only a small portion of which is recited in this opinion, clearly indicates that appellants suppressed the true state of facts concerning their affairs, and that this was one means by which they induced respondent to change his position.

[1-3] In actions based upon fraud, issues as to the falsity of representations made, their materiality and plaintiff's reliance upon them are questions of fact for the trial court. (See 12 Cal.Jur. 835, and authorities there cited.) Even though this court might not agree with the conclusions reached by the trial judge in the instant case, it is powerless to interfere because it is obvious that there is substantial evidence to support his findings of fact.

[4] With appellants' contention that attorney's fees and expenses were improperly awarded herein, we cannot agree, for the reason that it was provided by the 99-year lease from which this litigation stems that "It is hereby agreed between the parties hereto that lessee shall pay all reasonable costs, expenses and attorney's fees incurred by or against lessors in any litigation between the parties hereto or persons claiming under them, arising out of or in connection with this lease or the construction or enforcement thereof, in case the lessors or parties claiming under them shall prove successful in such litigation."

[5] Appellants complain of two errors in the admission of evidence. The evidence referred to was of such character that appellants suffered no prejudice through its introduction; consequently, if any slight error resulted therefrom, it would be insufficient upon which to base a reversal of the judgment herein.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from the Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Lawrence Kennedy, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Theza Van Antwerp, deceased, and as guardian of John Alan Van Antwerp, a minor, against the Occidental Life Insurance Company, to recover on a five-year, convertible, nonparticipating, term policy of insurance issued by defendant to one who was the deceased husband of Theza Van Antwerp, deceased, and the deceased father of John Alan Van Antwerp. From a judgment in favor of the defendant after a directed verdict, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

L. M. Linneman, of Dos Palos, and Lawrence Kennedy, of Fresno, for appellant.

W. M. Conley, Philip Conley, Matthew Conley, and Conley, Conley & Conley, all of Fresno, for respondent.

KLETTE, Justice, pro tem.

This appeal was taken by plaintiff and appellant from a judgment entered in favor of defendant and respondent, after a directed verdict.

On April 25, 1935, Archibald Reid Van Antwerp took out a five-year, convertible, non-participating, term policy of insurance with respondent, for the sum of $5,000, payable to his wife, Theza Van Antwerp, if living, otherwise to his son, Alan Van Antwerp. The policy called for a quarterly payment of premium, amounting to $21.50 each quarter, payable on the 25th day of July, October, January and April of each year. The policy provided for a period of thirty-one days' grace before lapsing. All premiums were paid up to and including that which fell due on October 25, 1938, but the premium falling due on January 25, 1939, was not paid, or attempted to be paid, until March 31, 1939, under circumstances which will hereafter be detailed. The undisputed evidence shows that at least one notice was sent Mr. Van Antwerp from the head office of the insurance company at Los Angeles, calling attention to the fact that the final date of payment of premium was February 25, 1939, and also a letter under date of March 31, 1939, calling attention to the fact that the policy had lapsed. On March 21, 1939, Delford Hale, an insurance agent who had secured this policy for Mr. Van Antwerp, called upon him to take steps to be reinstated. The agent at that time prepared an application and health certificate for reinstatement of the policy, but there is a conflict in the evidence as to whether it was signed by Van Antwerp on that day, or on March 31, 1939. Mr. Van Antwerp did not have the money to pay the premium, but said he would have it about April 1st, and Delford Hale agreed to advance it for him. Again there is a conflict in the evidence as to whether this understanding was reached on March 21 or March 31, 1939. On March 31, 1939, Delford Hale drew his check in favor of the respondent insurance company, covering the amount of the premium due, and left it at the Fresno office of respondent, at about 4 p. m. of that day, and it was mailed to the head office at Los Angeles between 4:30 and 5 p. m. the same day. It was received at the Los Angeles office of respondent on April 1, 1939, the exact hour not being determined.

On the morning of April 1, 1939, Van Antwerp was found dead in his bed. He was last seen alive at 8 p. m. the evening before. The body was found between 4 and 7 o'clock in the morning, according to the testimony of the witnesses. He was lying on the top of the covers, wearing house slippers and fully clothed, with the exception of his shirt, which was off. When found, he had been dead for several hours. He was survived by both beneficiaries under the policy.

Under date of April 7, 1939, respondent drew its check in favor of Theza Van Antwerp for the refund of the premium forwarded March 31, 1939, which it was stipulated was tendered her.

Mrs. Van Antwerp died August 31, 1939. Thereafter Lawrence Kennedy was appointed administrator with the will annexed, of her estate, and guardian of John Alan Van Antwerp, the son, who at the time of the trial was a minor of the age of twenty years. Kennedy thereupon instituted this suit, both as administrator and guardian.

A jury was empaneled to try the case, and at the close of the evidence, respondent moved for a directed verdict in its favor. This motion was granted, and the court directed the jury to bring in a verdict for defendant, which was done.

[1-3] Trial courts have full power, in a proper case, to direct the jury to render a verdict in favor of defendant, where there is no substantial evidence tending to prove all the controverted facts necessary to establish the plaintiff's case. It is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence, but if there be a conflict, it must not be a substantial one. The motion can be granted only when disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, and indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff, if such a verdict were given. Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 P. 267; Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 P. 283; Estate of Flood, 217 Cal. 763, 21 P.2d 579; Robbiano v. Bovet, 218 Cal. 589, 24 P.2d 466; Walters v. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, 9 Cal.2d 46, 69 P.2d 839, 110 A.L.R. 1259; Engstrom v. Auburn Auto Sales Corp., 11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1059.

It is contended by appellant that there was substantial evidence that the policy involved in this action was reinstated by Delford Hale, the agent of respondent, and that therefore the motion for the directed verdict should not have been granted. With this contention the court cannot agree.

An agent has such authority as the principal, actually or ostensibly, confers upon him. Sec. 2315, Civ.Code. Actual authority is such as a principal intentionally confers upon the agent, or intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, allows the agent to believe himself to possess. Sec. 2316, Civ. Code. Ostensible authority is such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess. Sec. 2317, Civ.Code.

[4] There is no evidence in the case that Delford Hale had any actual authority to renew or reinstate this policy of insurance for respondent. The only evidence upon this point is his positive testimony that he did not have any such authority. To create an ostensible authority, two essential features are necessary. The third person must believe that the agent had authority, and such belief must be generated by some act, or neglect, of the person to be held. Allen v. San Francisco Wholesale Dairy Produce Exchange, 59 Cal.App. 93, 210 P. 41; Walsh v. American Trust Co., 7 Cal.App.2d 654, 47 P.2d 323. The application for reinstatement and health certificate dated March 21, 1939, and signed by Mr. Van Antwerp, contained these statements:

"I hereby make application to the Occidental Life Insurance Company for reinstatement of above policy. * * * I hereby declare and agree that I have read the questions, statements, and answers, in this application and certificate, that they are complete and true, that they refer to the Insured under the above policy and may be relied on by the Company, and that no information acquired by any representative of the Company shall bind the Company unless it shall have been set out in writing herein. I further agree that all statements and answers in this application and certificate and in the application for the above policy shall be taken as the basis of the reinstatement, delivery, addition, change or issuance of the insurance applied for above, and that in no event shall the same become effective unless and until this application and certificate is approved at the Home Office of the Company and the full amount due is paid during the lifetime and good health of the Insured.

"I have paid $21.61 in connection with this application and certificate. The Company is authorized and directed to retain this amount, depositing or cashing any check or draft, without prejudice to its right to disapprove this application or certificate." (Italics ours.)

[5] Could it be said that Mr. Van Antwerp believed that Delford Hale had authority to, and was reinstating him, when he knew that the document he was signing was an application for reinstatement, and where it stated "that in no event shall the same become effective unless and until this application and certificate is approved at the Home Office of the Company", and "the Company is authorized and directed to retain this amount, depositing or cashing any check or draft, without prejudice to its right to disapprove this application or certificate"? We think not. Again, what evidence is there in the record to show that that belief, if it did exist, was generated by any act or neglect of respondent? We find none. In addition to the statements above quoted from the application for reinstatement, the policy, which Mr. Van Antwerp held, provided that, "Premiums must be paid at the Home Office of the Company unless otherwise provided, and in any case only in exchange for an official receipt, signed by the secretary and countersigned by the person to whom payment is made." That reinstatement could be made "upon the Insured furnishing evidence of insurability, satisfactory to the Company". And also, "This contract cannot be varied or altered, nor its applications or conditions waived or extended in any respect, except by written agreement of the Company, signed by two of the following officers, viz: The President, a Vice President, Secretary and Actuary."

[6] The evidence shows, without conflict, that Delford Hale had no authority, either actual or ostensible, to reinstate Van Antwerp under the policy, and it therefore becomes immaterial, whether the application for reinstatement and health certificate was signed March 21, or March 31, 1939, or whether the promise of the agent to advance the amount of the premium was made on either of those two days. The promise to advance the money was a personal matter between the agent and insured, and certainly in no way bound the respondent.

We will now consider the effect of the signing and mailing of the application for reinstatement, and health certificate, with the premium, and as to whether that operated as a reinstatement of the lapsed policy, or whether there remained something to be done by respondent, before the lapsed policy became reinstated. Appellant cites a number of authorities in support of his position, that the rights of the insured to reinstatement must be governed by the original policy of insurance, and cannot be varied by the application for reinstatement. While we have heretofore discussed the provisions of the application for reinstatement, under the head of ostensible agency, in determining whether the insured believed, or had reason to believe, that the agent had power to reinstate him, we shall, in considering this phase of the case, confine ourselves solely to the provisions of the policy itself. The policy contained this provision:

"Should this policy lapse by reason of any default, it may be reinstated at any time within five years from the date of default, upon the Insured furnishing evidence of insurability satisfactory to the Company, and upon payment of all over-due premiums, and upon payment or reinstatement of any indebtedness under the policy at the date of default, with interest on such over-due premiums and indebtedness at a rate not to exceed six per cent. per annum from date of default." (Italics ours.)

[7] Counsel on both sides have shown great diligence and research in presenting to the court all cases which might have a bearing on the controversy here involved. But we believe the case of Greenberg v. Continental Casualty Co., 24 Cal.App.2d 506, 75 P.2d 644, 645, is decisive of the issue before us. In that case the insured sent his premium in three days after the expiration of the days of grace. This premium was returned with the statement that the policy had lapsed. The insured thereupon mailed to the company an application for reinstatement, accompanied by an affidavit of his physician, as to his good health, and tendered the defaulted premium. The application for reinstatement was rejected by the company. Action was then brought by the insured for breach of contract, to reinstate the policy. Judgment went for defendant, which judgment was affirmed by the higher court. The policy of insurance in that case contained the same identical words as the policy now before us, that, in order to be reinstated, the insured must furnish "evidence of insurability satisfactory to the Company". It was there said:

"No question of public policy or valid statutory regulation is involved. The law applicable to the disputed questions is solely the law of contracts, and in that connection it is elementary that parties to a contract are entitled to have the agreement enforced according to its terms. * * * Conceding, but only for the purpose of analysis, that the meaning of the word 'insurability' is uncertain, nevertheless the contracting parties agreed, as the memorandum of their agreement clearly and unequivocally reveals, that the evidence of such 'insurability' must be 'satisfactory to the company.' By agreement of the parties to the contract the right and responsibility of determining the question as to whether the 'evidence of insurability' was satisfactory, was imposed upon and vested in one of the parties to the agreement. * * * The contract in question clearly provides, as above stated, that what shall constitute 'satisfactory evidence' is a question for the company to determine. It is purely a private matter addressed to the discretion of those officers of the company charged with the responsibility of determining such question, and is in no sense that judicial discretion which appellate courts have the authority to review. In the final analysis, whatever the word 'insurability' means, the contract provides that the evidence thereof must be 'satisfactory to the company.' That question having been determined by virtue of and according to the clear and unequivocal terms of the agreement, there is nothing, under the circumstances presented herein, for judicial determination."

The case of Broughton v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 5 Cir., 71 F.2d 821, 823, is almost identical with the one now before us. The policy in that case contained the same identical wording excepting that the word "Society" was used instead of "Company". It was there said: "After the policy lapsed, the insured was not entitled to have it reinstated by merely executing a health certificate, although on a form sent him for that purpose, and tendering the premium. The contract plainly provided that the evidence of good health should be satisfactory to the company. Until evidence of insurability was furnished and accepted the policy was not reinstated."

In the case before us the application for reinstatement and the health certificate was not received by the company until after the death of the insured, was never acted upon, and the lapsed policy was never reinstated.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Insurance ⇐665(3)

Evidence held to establish that when executing application for automobile liability policy warranting that there had been no previous insurance or cancellations, applicant knew that such statement was not true, and hence could not recover on the policy for expenses of defending suit and judgment rendered against applicant.

2. Insurance ⇐136(2)

Where automobile liability insurers sent policy to their agent for delivery to insured, but before actual delivery notified agent that they would require indorsement suspending coverage whenever automobiles should be operated by insured's son, and insured refused to sign rider thus restricting coverage, there was "constructive delivery" of the policy, and liability attached under the policy when it was forwarded from home office.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Constructive Delivery".

3. Insurance ⇐285½

Where there was constructive delivery of automobile liability policy, making liability attach when policy was forwarded from home office, but insurers subsequently demanded indorsement suspending coverage when the automobiles should be operated by insured's son, and insured refused to sign the rider and policy was returned to insurers and marked "cancelled," there was a "cancellation" of the policy, precluding insured from recovering on policy subsequently obtained from another insurer pursuant to application warranting that there had been no previous insurance or cancellations.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Cancellation".

4. Trial ⇐139(1)

A directed verdict is proper unless there is substantial evidence tending to prove, in favor of party against whom direction is given, all the controverted facts necessary to establish his case.

Appeal from the Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Orlando H. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by J. W. Shnell against the Globe Indemnity Company, to recover expense of defending suit for damages arising out of an automobile accident, and amount of judgment rendered against plaintiff in such suit. From a judgment on a directed verdict for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Murchison & Clopton, Mort L. Clopton, and Bruce Murchison, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Eugene S. Ives, of Los Angeles (Harold L. Watt and Carol G. Wynn, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Appellant herein, the "named insured" in a policy of automobile liability insurance issued by respondent, brought the instant action to recover the expense incurred by him in defending a suit for damages arising out of an automobile accident as well as the amount of a judgment rendered against him in such suit. At the conclusion of the trial, the court directed the jury to return a verdict for respondent. From the judgment entered pursuant thereto, this appeal is prosecuted.

Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to appellant, it appears that on January 8, 1936, appellant visited the office of Mr. Evans, an agent of Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York and the Niagara Fire Insurance Company of New York, and ordered a policy of insurance upon a Ford automobile, as well as upon a Packard automobile owned by him. About January 15, the policies were prepared and forwarded to the agent, Mr. Evans, for delivery to appellant, but before delivery had been made, the insurance companies on or about February 26th, notified Mr. Evans that they would require on both policies, and also on a policy previously issued covering an Oldsmobile owned by appellant's daughter, endorsements suspending coverage whenever such automobiles should be operated by appellant's son, Rex Shnell. Upon being informed of this action by the companies, appellant agreed to such endorsement as to the Oldsmobile and the Packard, but declined the Ford policy on such terms. The Ford policy was never delivered to appellant, but was returned by the agent to the companies and marked "cancelled". No premium was ever collected therefor, nor was the policy ever countersigned by the agent.

On March 21, 1936, appellant visited the Santa Monica office of E. Broox Randall & Sons, Inc., a general agent of respondent Globe Indemnity Company, and discussed the subject of insurance upon the Ford automobile with Henry T. Brantly, a "soliciting agent" of respondent company.

For the purposes of this appeal, based as it is on a directed verdict, it must be assumed that appellant (as he testified) made a full disclosure to Mr. Brantly of the facts concerning his previous application to the Fidelity and Niagara companies, and their refusal to insure appellant's cars while they were being operated by his son

Rex. At any rate, the outcome of this conversation was that Mr. Brantly filled out and appellant signed an application for insurance to become effective at noon of that day, the pertinent portion of such application being as follows:

"I warrant the following statements concerning my car and base this order thereon. * * *

"Previous carrier None

"Any previous cancellations? No. * *"

On March 27, 1936, appellant's Ford automobile while being operated by his son, Rex Shnell, was involved in a collision resulting in the death of Rex and injury to the occupants of the other car. Respondent refused to defend the action brought against appellant, served notice of rescission and tendered him the amount of the premium, which appellant refused to accept.

The policy issued pursuant to the application contained among others the following provision:

"In consideration of the premium specified and the statements contained in the Schedule of Statements made part hereof, and warranted by the insured to be true, the Company agrees. * * *

"Schedule of Statements. * * *

"11. No company has cancelled any automobile policy of the Named Insured, or refused to issue automobile insurance to the Named Insured during the past year." (Italics added.)

[1] There was no error on the part of the trial court in directing a verdict for respondent. While it must be assumed that appellant in his conversations with the agent Brantly made full disclosure of the facts concerning his previous application to the Fidelity and Niagara Companies, the conceded facts are that when he executed an application for insurance whereby he warranted there had been no previous cancellations, he knew that such statement was not true. This is revealed by appellant's own testimony on cross-examination, when, after testifying concerning his procurement of two other policies on his Packard and Oldsmobile automobiles, he testified:

"Q. By Mr. Kidd: And on or about the same time, you were offered a policy by these same two insurers through E. J. Evans, covering this same Ford automobile with an endorsement on the policy to the same effect, that is, that that policy would not cover you or anyone else while that Ford automobile was operated by Rex Shnell, isn't that true? A. Mr. Evans advised me that the policy was written that way.

"Q. And you said what? A. I told him to return it; I couldn't use it.

"Q. Why did you tell him that? A. I didn't want that kind of a policy.

"Q. You wanted one to cover Rex Shnell while he was driving the car? A. I wanted it to cover anyone.

"Q. Including your son? A. Yes.

"Q. And counsel has agreed that your son did drive that Ford automobile? A. Yes, at times.

"Q. Yes, at times. And at that time you refused that policy, did you? A. Yes. I told Mr. Evans to return the Ford policy. I couldn't use it. I didn't want that kind of a policy. I wanted it to cover anyone, including my son Rex Shnell. My son did drive that Ford automobile at times. At that time I refused that Ford policy. By that time I mean that my recollection is that the Ford policy was taken up some time before March 10th, but I am not sure. I am not sure of the date of the discussion with Mr. Evans on said notification from him about the Ford policy. I am speaking of the Ford policy. Whenever in my testimony I refer to the Ford automobile, I am referring to the same car that was later insured with the Globe Indemnity Company.

"Q. And you think you had a discussion with Mr. Evans prior to March 10, 1936— A. I had a notification—

"Q. Please wait until the question is finished. With reference to this Ford policy which had been issued by the Fidelity and Casualty Company and the Niagara Fire Insurance Company—A. I was notified that that was the case.

"Q. That notification is in writing? A. No, sir. * * * I didn't like to sign the rider on the Packard policy * * * limiting the policy so that it wouldn't cover Rex Shnell, but I took it. I signed the endorsement myself. I can't recall about the Oldsmobile. I never told the Globe Indemnity Company about that transaction, about the Oldsmobile policy and that the coverage on same had been amended so as not to apply to my son. I never discussed that with them. I never told the Globe Indemnity Company about that transaction, the Packard policy I am referring to, and that the coverage on the same had been amended so as not to apply to my son. I never saw any endorsement on the Ford policy. I never saw the policy at all. To my knowledge I never wrote a check in which the amount of premium on the policy on the Ford car was included in some other amount.

"Q. By Mr. Kidd: Did you tell the Globe Indemnity Company anything with reference to the driver's license of your son Rex Shnell having been revoked for one year or any other period. * * * Did you ever tell Mr. Brantly about any of these matters I have been asking you about, to-wit: that the Fidelity and Casualty Company had put a rider on your Oldsmobile policy, and the same kind of a rider on the Packard policy, to-wit: that the policy would protect neither of them while being driven by Rex Shnell? A. Not about the Oldsmobile, but in talking about the prior coverage, I told him something about the other.

"Q. Did you tell Mr. Brantly anything about your son's driver's license being revoked for a year or a year and a half? A. Yes, I discussed it with him. * * *

"Q. And you told him about what? A. He asked about prior coverage on the car and I told him that I had gone to another insurance company, another insurance agency, and they wanted to restrict the policy and I refused to take it and told them to return it."

With reference to appellant's contention that the policy ordered from the Fidelity and Casualty Company by him for the Ford automobile (which is relied upon by respondent to show previous insurance) never became effective because it was never delivered to him and was never countersigned, it should not be overlooked that appellant was thoroughly conversant with the insurance business, having been formerly engaged in that line for some thirty years, fifteen of which were spent in southern California. That he considered the policy of the Fidelity and Casualty Company effective is confirmed by his statement, to-wit: "On or about January 8 of 1936 I obtained insurance on this Ford automobile, and this insurance was cancelled about a month later without cause and without listing any cause for the cancellation. I had had no other insurance and had made no other application for insurance upon this car."

The Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York and the Niagara Fire Insurance Company also recognized an outstanding liability under this policy from the date of its issuance on January 8, 1936, until the date of its cancellation on March 9, 1936, which is evidenced by a letter from Mr. McKeegan, manager of the automobile department of such carriers, addressed to his Los Angeles office under date of February 26, 1936, to-wit: "There has now come to our attention another policy for J. W. Shnell, number CA213055 effective January 8, 1936, covering a 1930 Ford Coupe. The investigation which the Fidelity and Casualty Company made indicates very clearly this Ford is the automobile which Rex Shnell operates. How this policy could have been sent to our office with the knowledge that the agent had of the objection raised by the Fidelity and Casualty Company is something we cannot understand. Clearly, if this Ford Coupe is still operated by Rex Shnell, the policy will have to be returned for cancellation."

[2, 3] In this case it must be held that the policy of insurance originally issued upon the Ford automobile, and in connection with which appellant refused to sign the rider, was both delivered and in effect up to the time of its cancellation after appellant declined to accept a rider thereto. Certainly there was constructive delivery, because the insurance carriers in sending the policy to their agent did not intend that he should keep it for them, but on the contrary he held it for the insured. This being the case, liability attached under the policy when it was forwarded from the home office. Hill v. Industrial Acc. Com., 10 Cal.App.2d 178, at pages 183, 184, 185, 51 P.2d 1126, and cases therein cited.

[4] It is well established that a directed verdict is proper, unless there is substantial evidence tending to prove, in favor of the party against whom the direction is given, all the controverted facts necessary to establish his case. 24 Cal. Jur., 913, 914, and authorities there cited. A review of the record herein results in the conclusion that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of appellant, if such a verdict were rendered.

We find no merit in appellant's contention that the trial court erred in receiving in evidence respondent's exhibits G, L, O and P.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WARD, Justice.

This is an appeal by plaintiff, an employee of defendant company, from a judgment in favor of the latter entered upon a directed verdict. The trial court held that an accident which resulted in personal injuries to plaintiff was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the industrial accident commission.

At the time of the injury, plaintiff was employed as a janitor on one of the steamships owned and operated by defendant company, this ship being at that time moored at pier 32, which, together with the adjacent pier 30, had been assigned to defendant company by the state board of harbor commissioners in consideration of the payment of rent. The portion assigned did not include premises beyond the boundary of the pier or wharf, that is, beyond the interior enclosed by doors, which separate those premises from outside territory. The pier entrances face on a strip of pavement approximately 60 feet in width known as the bulkhead. When the piers or wharves are congested, this bulkhead is commonly used to facilitate the handling of incoming and outgoing cargoes. It is likewise used by trucks, drays, cabs and private vehicles of persons having business with the defendant company in approaching and leaving the piers. Stevedores, seamen, passengers and visitors are permitted to park on the bulkhead, which is also used by pedestrians. Adjoining the bulkhead to the west, and running parallel thereto, is the main thoroughfare or public street called the Embarcadero, which is about 200 feet in width and which takes care of the ordinary everyday commerce of the community. On the Embarcadero, also, are tracks for the operation of trains. Separating the bulkhead from the Embarcadero is a low curb except at spaces about 36 feet in width provided as entrances to the piers, at which places the Embarcadero and the bulkhead are practically on a level. It is by crossing the bulkhead at these points that access from the Embarcadero to the various piers is gained. A large number of special officers are employed by defendant company on the piers, part of their duties being to direct and control traffic on the bulkhead, keep the entrances to the piers free from interference, and generally to see that the movement of vehicles in this area proceeds smoothly. On occasions there is a double line of such unbroken traffic along the bulkhead for a half mile.

On the morning of the accident there does not seem to have been any great congestion of vehicular traffic. However, the bulkhead was crowded with stevedores on their way to work. Plaintiff arrived at the waterfront at about 7:45 A. M. in a taxicab. His time for commencing work was 8 A. M. The taxicab came to a stop on the bulkhead almost immediately in front of the entrance to pier 32, and plaintiff started to alight. He had one foot outside the taxicab when a car owned by defendant company, and being operated by another of its employees in the course and scope of his employment, backed into the taxicab, and plaintiff's foot was caught between the door of the cab and the door sill, and injured.

[1] It was stipulated that defendant company had qualified as a self-insurer of its employees under the terms of the workmen's compensation and safety act. The question involved, raised in the answer of defendant company, is whether the injury may be said to have occurred on the premises of the employer, thus bringing it within the class of injuries compensable exclusively under such act, or whether plaintiff has a cause of action in a civil suit against the employer. Subject only to exceptions not pertinent to the present appeal, the industrial accident commission has exclusive jurisdiction to determine the compensation benefits to employees injured in the course of their employment. The findings of the commission are, however, reviewable by the courts. Labor Code, § 3600, St.1937, p. 269; Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 200 Cal. 579, 253 P. 926; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 P. 398; San Francisco S. Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 321, 149 P. 586; Fitzpatrick v. [2, 3] This question of jurisdiction, the test of which is found in the nature of the action and the relief sought (Silverman v. Greenberg, 12 Cal.2d 252, 83 P.2d 293), is a matter that must be passed upon by the court. It has been suggested that in this case, depending as it does upon factual matters and not entirely upon allegations in the pleadings, the question of fact should have been submitted to the jury, and upon its finding thereon the court should have ruled accordingly.

The defense of lack of jurisdiction may not be determined by a jury; it is purely a legal matter. To submit to a jury facts tending to prove or disprove jurisdiction, would inevitably lead to a lack of uniformity of remedy. However, in this case there is no dispute as to the facts. In such case the question of jurisdiction is one of law for the sole determination of the court. In Re Application of Tassey, 81 Cal.App. 287, 290, 291, 253 P. 948, 949, the court said: "There is some confusion in discussing jurisdiction on account of the fact that there are cases in which the jurisdiction of the court depends upon the existence of certain facts. In that case the court has jurisdiction to determine those facts, even though the determination of those facts in a certain manner ousts it of further jurisdiction to proceed in the case." In Gill v. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., 209 Mo.App. 63, 236 S.W. 1073, 1076, it was said: "It was proper for the court to refuse defendant's instruction No. 4, because it is for the court, and not the jury, to determine the question of jurisdiction." In Murphy v. Campbell Soup Co., D.C., 44 F.2d 214, 215, the court said: "Whether the necessary jurisdictional facts exist is a question which certainly ought to be triable by the court; and this is the practice in analogous matters. In the federal courts jurisdiction often depends on a particular state of facts being shown. * * * Such questions are uniformly determined by the court." Tomson v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Ass'n, 88 Neb. 399, 129 N.W. 529; State v. Coleman, 58 R. I. 6, 190 A. 791, 109 A.L.R. 787; Estate of Paulsen, 179 Cal. 528, 178 P. 143.

[4] In Dolese Bros. v. Tollett, 162 Okl. 158, 19 P.2d 570, appellant contended that the jurisdiction of the action was in the state industrial commission and not with the trial court. At page 571 of 19 P. 2d the court said: "A trial court is required to determine the legal question of whether or not it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action presented to it for determination. * * * It is neither authorized nor required to submit to a jury the question of whether or not it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action." The suggestion that the jury should have been permitted to pass upon the undisputed facts or to draw inferences therefrom—which would in effect have been a determination of the jurisdiction of the court—is untenable. When jurisdiction of a subject-matter depends upon a fact, it is the duty of the court to determine that fact upon the evidence pro or con.

We will now consider whether appellant was injured as the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by defendant company. Attention has been called to two outstanding California cases, Ocean Accident, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 173 Cal. 313, 159 P. 1041, L.R.A.1917B, 336 and Judson Mfg. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 300, 184 P. 1.

In the Ocean Accident Company case, the deceased employee was an engineer on a fishing tug. During a storm the tug had been moved from its usual docking position and placed temporarily alongside a schooner. In turn, the schooner lay next to a steamer moored to the dock. To go ashore from the tug it was necessary to pass over both vessels. The employee adopted this means of going ashore, and the accident occurred at about four o'clock in the morning while he was attempting to return to the tug by the same route. While he was on shore, however, the tug had been moved to its usual berth, of which fact the employee was unaware. He had already crossed the steamer and the schooner when he discovered that the tug had been moved, and, in retracing his steps in order to return to the wharf, he fell between the schooner and the steamer and was drowned. The commission's award of death benefits was reversed.

In the Judson case an employee proceeding from his home to a factory by way of a path crossing a railroad right of way, which path constituted the sole means of ingress and egress to his place of employment, was struck and killed by an engine. The accident occurred within a reasonable time of his commencing work; that is, about five minutes before the employee was to start his regular shift; he was approaching by the usual path leading directly to the only entrance used by employees. An award by the commission was affirmed.

The employee in the Ocean Accident Company case was overdue in reporting for work. He did not investigate whether the tug was moored at its proper berth, but sought to reach it, where he evidently thought it was, by crossing the vessel and the schooner. In the parlance of the sea, he was "off his course". It was upon his return trip to the wharf after he had learned of the removal of the tug from the side of the schooner, that the employee fell between the vessels and was drowned. The court commented upon the fact that the employee knew the location of the tug's regular berth, and that, without special instructions, it was his duty to report there at the usual time.

The holding in the Ocean Accident Company case is in effect that until an employee is about to use an instrumentality specifically connected with his place of work, an accident befalling him does not arise out of and in the course of his employment. The fall between the schooner and the vessel was not directly related to the means of approach to the tug, such as a gangplank or ladder connecting the wharf with the vessel, nor was it a path or entrance constituting the only means of access to his place of employment. It was held that the employee must proceed "to use some instrumentality provided, by means of which he immediately places himself in a position to perform his tasks". [173 Cal. 313, 159 P. 1044, L.R.A.1917B, 336.] The decision uses this language: "* * * going to or returning from his work, and it matters not in this respect whether his journey takes him over public roads or private ways."

In the Judson case, decided three years later, referring to the Ocean Accident Company case, the court at page 303 of 181 Cal., at page 2 of 184 P. said: "In the case last cited we find a statement to the effect that all those accidental injuries which occur while the employe is going to or returning from his work are excluded from the benefits of the act. This sweeping dictum was not necessary to the decision of the case. The accident there considered occurred, it is true, while the deceased was attempting to reach his place of employment; but the mode of ingress which he undertook to use was not one provided and required by his employer, it was in no sense a part of the premises where his work was to be performed, and, finally, it was not in fact a mode of ingress to his work at all." The court also said: "The right to compensation is by no means restricted to those cases where the injury occurs while the employe is actually presently manipulating the tools of his calling. It would be unnecessary to the decision of this case to attempt to formulate a precise and comprehensive definition of the term 'service,' as used in the statute now under consideration. It seems to us, however, that when an employe has arrived at the premises of his employer, and is thereon for the purpose of immediately commencing his actual work, he is performing service incidental to his employment. The facts stated above show that as between the employer and his employes the path across the Southern Pacific Company's right of way was in fact a part of the employer's plant, and that at the time of his death Gallia was there solely in the line of his duty as an employe. It would be a harsh and indefensible rule that would withhold compensation from an employe engaged in traversing a dangerous pathway in his employer's building on his way to his own particular place of work therein, on the ground that he had not yet entered upon the real work of his employment. We can perceive no difference in principle between such a case and the case at bar." In the matter of the entrance to the place of employment, and in the time of arrival for duty, the facts of the Judson case are similar to those of the instant case.

In the Judson case, as in the instant one, the employee was outside the actual area of his place of work. In both, the employee was within reasonable distance of its actual and only place of ingress and egress. The only difference between the facts of that case and this is that in the former, the approach by the employee was along a so-called private path, while in the present, it was across or over a public way, which at various times was predominantly used by the defendant company, and during such times was under the supervision of the company's private police. We use the term "private police" in accordance with the evidence, which shows that a special agent of defendant company commanded and directed "fourteen special officers" "on * * * and outside of the piers" in the "regula- on of traffic".

On the morning of the accident, automobiles were parked on the bulkhead to the north and south of the entrance to piers 30 and 32, and vehicles of persons having business on the wharf, as well as stevedores and other employees of defendant company, were in or near the driveway and upon the bulkhead awaiting admittance to the pier at 8 o'clock. The special agent stood at the entrance watching traffic on and off the wharf. He did not see the accident, but was at the scene thereof about ten seconds afterward and observed the position of the two automobiles. He at once took charge of the injured plaintiff directed his removal to the wharf to be put under the care of one of the defendant company's doctors, and investigated generally the circumstances of the accident.

[5] Unless the duties of employment require in their performance the use of a public road by an employee, an injury received by him thereon may not be said to have occurred in the course of or arising out of his employment. In coming to work, this rule applies, but it is not so harsh as to prohibit benefits to an employee who finds it necessary to cross public property used by the public but in fact "dominant as to user in the employer, servient to its purposes, and intimately associated with its plant as a part of its necessary establishment". Judson Mfg. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra. It is true that the language just noted is taken from a case wherein the road was private; the property of a third party. What difference could there be between such a private road, and a public road over which an employer exercised dominion at the time of the accident? As an employee of defendant company, plaintiff herein had business on the driveway or runway. He was there to report for work through the only entrance provided for employees at that hour. The presence of vehicles and pedestrians near the entrance was a danger and a hazard created by defendant company. It was the rule of the company that ordinary delivery trucks and employees should await the hour of 8 o'clock before entering the wharf. It is true that the accident occurred before actual working hours, but it was necessary that appellant should await that hour. Whether he was standing on the bulkhead or seated in an automobile, or, as in this case, was partly within and partly without a taxicab, makes no difference in so far as the creation of the hazard by the defendant company is concerned.

[6, 7] In Jimeson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 23 Cal.App.2d 634, 638, 639, 73 P.2d 1238, 1240, the court said: "* * * the rule is well settled that an employee, in going to work, comes under the protection of the act when he enters the employer's premises or upon the means provided for access thereto, though the premises and such means of access are not wholly under the employer's control or management." This and similar cases must be decided upon the peculiar facts of each case. It is sufficient if a substantial causal connection be established between the employment and the injury to the employee, though it need not be the sole or proximate cause. Cudahy Packing Co. v. Parramore, 263 U.S. 418, 44 S.Ct. 153, 68 L.Ed. 366, 30 A.L.R. 532. The test in this case is whether appellant, through the hazard created by defendant, was injured as any ordinary member of the public, or whether his injury was due to his employment by defendant company. If the latter, the Workmen's Compensation Act, St.1917, p. 831, is applicable. The facts of this case answer the question. Appellant's appearance on the bulkhead was due solely to his employment; he was obliged to be there. The time of his arrival would not necessarily indicate that his purpose was to loiter, or that he was there for pleasure. The injury was caused by a risk arising from the condition of the entrance to the place of his employment. In the Cudahy case, supra, 263 U.S. at page 424, 44 S.Ct. at page 154, 68 L.Ed. 366, 30 A.L.R. 532, the court said: "The fact that the accident happens upon a public road or at a railroad crossing and that the danger is one to which the general public is likewise exposed is not conclusive against the existence of such causal relationship, if the danger be one to which the employee, by reason of and in connection with his employment, is subjected peculiarly or to an abnormal degree" The injury herein was not received as the result of an ordinary street risk of an employee on the way to work. The cause of the injury emanated immediately from the hazard of plaintiff's employment and not from some independent danger caused by a third party. Lumbermen's M. C. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 134 Cal.App. 131, 25 P.2d 22.

State ex rel. v. Clearwater Timber Co., 47 Idaho 295, 274 P. 802, 66 A.L.R. 1396, relied upon by appellant, is not in point. In that case the employer had no control over the means of travel, or of the public crossing whereon an employee was killed. The affirmance of the judgment in this case will not cause a conflict with the holding in McGrew v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 18 I.A.C. 137. In the McGrew case, the applicant for compensation slipped on a wet and slippery sidewalk in front of a public school. Applicant's employer had assumed some control over the sidewalk, but it was in the form of a prohibition against vending, smoking and advertising, which had nothing to do with the accident. In addition, the slippery sidewalk was not a hazard created by the employer. Neither will the case of Moore v. Sefton Mfg. Corporation, 82 Ind.App. 89, 144 N. E. 476, relative to an employee's injury during the noon hour on his way to a restaurant, be in conflict. The opinion in that case, page 477 of 144 N.E., sets forth the well recognized rule in the following language: "This is not a case where the employe was injured in going to or returning from his work upon the employer's premises, or on the only way available for that purpose, or where he was injured during an interval of leisure which occurred in the course of his employment." In Balboa A. P. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 35 Cal.App. 793, 171 P. 108, the employee was loitering on a street and assumed a risk common to all passing the crossing.

[8] If a portion of a public thoroughfare adjoining an employer's premises is necessarily used by an employee in reaching his work, and this portion is rendered hazardous by the carrying on of the business of the employer—here a traffic congestion on the bulkhead adjoining the defendant company's place of business caused by the arrival and congregation of numerous persons, passenger vehicles and merchandise trucks awaiting admittance to the piers—an injury suffered by the employee through that hazard may be properly characterized as one received within the zone of his employment, and arising out of and in the course of such employment. Industrial Commission of Ohio v. Barber, 117 Ohio St. 373, 159 N. E. 363; Cudahy Packing Co. v. Parramore, supra; De Constantin v. Public Service Commission, 75 W.Va. 32, 83 S. E. 88, L.R.A.1916A, 329; Bountiful Brick Co. v. Giles, 276 U.S. 154, 48 S.Ct. 221, 72 L.Ed. 507, 66 A.L.R. 1402; Starr Piano Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 433, 184 P. 860; Pacific Elec. Ry. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 137 Cal.App. 245, 30 P.2d 444; Black v. Herman, 297 Pa. 230, 146 A. 550; LeBlanc v. The Ohio Oil Co., 7 La.App. 721; Globe Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 208 Cal. 715, 284 P. 661.

In this case the testimony is sufficient to warrant the directed verdict and the judgment entered.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDERSON et al. v. STUMP.

Civ. 6297.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 6, 1941.

Hearing Denied April 5, 1941.

1. Trial ⇐165

A "motion for nonsuit" is in effect a "demurrer to the evidence" and court must assume that all evidence received in plaintiff's favor relevant to issues is true.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Demurrer to the Evidence" and "Motion for Nonsuit".

2. Trial ⇐165

On motion for nonsuit, all presumptions, inferences, and doubtful questions must be construed most favorably to plaintiff's case, and conflicting evidence must be disregarded.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⇐18(9)

Where defendant physician pursuant to statute was called as an adverse witness in malpractice action and his testimony was material on motion for nonsuit, plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of any favorable testimony given by physician irrespective of whether it involved expert testimony or that only of a layman. Code Civ.Proc. § 2055.

4. Physicians and surgeons ⇐18(9)

In malpractice action where it was alleged that physician in making vaginal examination of plaintiff failed to take proper precautions, as result of which plaintiff suffered severe streptococcic infection, whether glove used by physician in making a vaginal examination was sterilized, and whether physician wore a sterilized gown or made examination clothed only in street clothes, was for the jury, and granting of a nonsuit was error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; Albert F. Ross, Judge.

Action for malpractice by Sidney Anderson and others against Francis M. Stump. From a judgment of dismissal entered by the trial court after granting a motion for nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed and remanded.

T. F. Peterson, of Eureka, and H. L. Preston, of Ukiah, for appellants.

Hadsell, Sweet, Ingalls & Lamb, of San Francisco, and Paul A. Brunk, of Crescent City, for respondent.

MONCUR, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs have appealed from a judgment of dismissal entered by the trial court after granting a motion for nonsuit. Plaintiffs' complaint was in three counts, alleging negligence on the part of the defendant physician in his treatment of plaintiff Doris Anderson. The complaint sets forth the usual allegations as to the plaintiffs engaging the defendant to attend Mrs. Anderson; that she was pregnant and shortly to be delivered of a child; and that she placed herself under the care of the defendant in the Knapp Hospital in Crescent City.

In the first cause of action it is alleged in general terms that the defendant, through his carelessness and through his want of skill, caused her to suffer from a serious streptococcic infection, and that her mental suffering was aggravated by defendant's claim that she was suffering from a pre-existing gonorrhoeal infection.

In the second cause of action it was alleged that Mrs. Anderson was placed in an unsterile bed and her pelvic regions were not sterilized. The complaint alleged that when defendant arrived at the hospital, he made a vaginal examination of Mrs. Anderson, without proper or any precautions; that as a result she suffered a severe streptococcic infection, and that her condition was aggravated by defendant's false claim that she was suffering from a pre-existing gonorrhoeal infection.

In the third cause of action it is alleged that plaintiff wife placed herself entirely under defendant's care and direction; that the result stated above followed, and that the result was such as did not occur when a physician used proper care.

Defendant answered, admitting his professional capacity, and denying all of the other allegations of the complaint.

The trial was had before a jury, and at the conclusion of plaintiffs' case in chief, the trial court granted a nonsuit as to all three causes of action, upon the ground that no negligence proximately causing Mrs. Anderson's injuries was proven against the defendant.

The testimony adduced on behalf of plaintiffs tended to prove the situation as follows: In July, 1934, defendant attended Mrs. Anderson at the birth of her first child, a daughter, who was four and one-half years old at the time of trial. No untoward results were experienced in her accouchement at that time, except that she developed hemorrhoids, and was operated upon for that condition by defendant early in 1935. That she has always been in good health, and was a vigorous, athletic young woman. She consulted defendant on February 22, 1936, with regard to her pregnancy, and made arrangements with him to attend her at her confinement. Mrs. Mary Haskill, Mrs. Anderson's mother, came from her home in Camas, Washington, to stay with her daughter. During the period of about ten days immediately before her confinement, Mrs. Anderson was in close touch with defendant, and was examined by him on several occasions. That up to that time her condition was reported as satisfactory in all respects by defendant, and he told Mrs. Haskill there was nothing to worry about. She went to the hospital about ten o'clock on the night of July 4, 1936, was undressed and put to bed, given a routine enema and the pubic hairs shaved. Defendant arrived some two hours later and made a vaginal examination with a gloved hand. He was wearing his street clothing. The bed linen was neither changed nor sterilized, and no other precautions were taken. Mrs. Anderson was not washed or scrubbed. She was taken to the delivery room immediately thereafter, and in about an hour and a half her baby was born, without untoward event.

On the evening of July seventh she became violently ill, and by nightfall was in a serious condition. Defendant gave her a foreign protein injection of serum, which raised her temperature, then caused a severe chill. In about a week an abscess on the right side of the pelvic region developed. She was treated for this condition at the hospital for nearly three weeks and then allowed to return to the apartment where she had been staying in Crescent City, and where she remained for ten days longer.

Later when she was ready to leave the apartment with the intention of going to Camas, Washington, she learned from her husband that the defendant contended she had been suffering from gonorrhoea. On going to defendant's office, and inquiring about the gonorrhoea infection, this conversation occurred:

"Q. What was the conversation you had with Dr. Stump? A. I asked him if gonorrhoea was the cause of my having this infection. He says 'Oh, just forget about it; you have not got it now and I would not want to break up your home'."

[1, 2] The foregoing is not a statement of all of the evidence. Under the well-established rule relative to the granting of nonsuits we have stated the evidence most favorable to plaintiffs and disregarded conflicting evidence, as it was the duty of the trial court to do. "A motion for a nonsuit is in effect a demurrer to the evidence, and the court must assume that all the evidence received in favor of the plaintiff relevant to the issues is true. All presumptions, inferences, and doubtful questions must be construed most favorably to the plaintiff's case. The rule is so well settled that it is not necessary to enlarge upon it." Richardes v. Richardes, 211 Cal. 392, at page 394, 295 P. 816, at page 817.

It is the contention of defendant that there was no testimony of experts establishing the proximate cause of the infection which resulted from any action upon the part of Dr. Stump in connection with the birth of the child. Appellant contends that under the authorities of this state such expert testimony, under the circumstances shown herein, was not necessary, or if it was, it was established through the testimony of Dr. Stump by plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state.

Appellants cite in support of their contention the cases of Barham v. Widing, 210 Cal. 206, 291 P. 173, and Inderbitzen v. Lane Hospital, 124 Cal.App. 462, 12 P.2d 744, 13 P.2d 905. The case of Barham v. Widing, supra, was an action for damages for malpractice, wherein the defendant, a dentist, was charged with negligence in extracting a tooth, and in the use of the hypodermic needle which was employed in that operation an infection of the jawbone resulted. In that case both the defendant dentist and his nurse testified they sterilized the hypodermic needle and the plaintiff's gum. Plaintiff stated he did not remember their doing so; the infection developed at the site of the injection.

In that case [210 Cal. 206, 291 P. 177], the Supreme Court quoted with approval the following statement of Mr. Justice Thompson in the original decision in the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, 288 P. 716: "It was not necessary for any dentist or physician to state that the conduct of the defendant was negligent or in conflict with the usual established practice of the profession in that vicinity to administer a local anesthetic for the purpose of extracting a tooth without sterilizing the needle, or the flesh into which it is inserted. The court will take judicial knowledge of the necessity to use ordinary care to procure sterilization under such circumstances. This case was tried upon the theory that everyone concerned recognized this duty. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the evidence will support the judgment in this regard." Barham v. Widing, supra.

In the case of Inderbitzen v. Lane Hospital, supra [124 Cal.App. 462, 12 P.2d 747], it is said: "While it is the general rule that the propriety or impropriety of particular medical treatment can only be established by expert medical testimony, this rule is subject to the exception that, if the particular matter is one of general knowledge, expert evidence is not necessary." Also it is said in that case: "We will likewise take judicial knowledge of the danger of infection to a woman about to give birth to a child from a vaginal examination performed with unsterilized hands."

[3] Defendant was called by plaintiff, as we hereinbefore stated, under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. During the trial the question arose as to whether, upon a motion for nonsuit, plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of everything favorable to them gained from examining defendant under that section. Having in mind the fact that Dr. Stump was a practicing physician and was engaged by Mrs. Anderson for the specific purposes of her confinement, it is obvious that he became a material witness in the case. Therefore, it appears clear that under the very circumstances of his employment plaintiffs would be entitled to the benefit of any favorable testimony given by him in the case irrespective of whether it involved expert testimony or that only of a layman. In the case of Dempsey v. Star House Movers, Inc., 2 Cal.App.2d 720, 38 P.2d 825, 826, it is said: "While evidence of the defendant under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, is not binding on the plaintiff, nevertheless it is evidence in the case, to be considered together with any other evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff when the court is determining a motion for nonsuit."

Considered in the light of the decision in the Barham v. Widing case, supra, a portion of which we have hereinbefore quoted, the question as to whether, at the time the vaginal examination was made of Mrs. Anderson, the glove worn by Dr. Stump was or was not sterilized, is quite material, as is also that as to whether the doctor wore a sterilized gown or made the examination clothed only in his street clothes. The following is the defendant's testimony in that respect:

"Q. When you gave her this examination you spoke of, how did you proceed? A. I usually just take off my coat, scrub up my hands, put on a gown, ward gown—

"Q. I am not asking what you usually do, I am asking you what you did on this occasion? A. That is what I did on this occasion.

"Q. Tell us again: You scrubbed your hands, is that right? A. Scrubbed my hands, and removed my coat and vest—scrubbed my hands, slipped on a ward gown, they call it—and then scrubbed up and sterilized my hands.

"Q. You never had on gloves? A. Not before my hands were sterilized. I did at the examination.

"Q. Where did you get these gloves? A. The nurse gave them to me.

"Q. In the room where the lady was in or in the wash room? A. I am not positive about that. They give them to you occasionally in the room and occasionally in front of the room.

"Q. In front of the room? A. Yes.

"Q. What do you mean by that? A. The room is just across the hall from the scrub-up room. She sometimes meets you at the scrub-up room as you come out; sometimes at the door; and sometimes in the room.

"Q. Which one of those places did she give you the glove or gloves on this occasion? A. Well, I have no record of that and I can't say.

"Q. You have no record and no memory, is that right? A. I don't remember those things; it is three years—

"Q. I am asking you do you remember? A. I told you I don't remember.

"Q. Isn't it a fact you only had one glove on? A. That's all you put on.

"Q. All you put on? A. All we ever use at such a time.

"Q. What hand did you have the glove on? A. My right—I am right-handed.

"Q. Did you put the glove on your hand or did the nurse put it on? A. I usually put them on.

"Q. Is that the recognized practice in Del Norte county among physicians—that the doctor himself puts the gloves on? A. Yes.

"Q. That is the practice, is it? A. Yes.

"Q. Isn't it the practice that the nurse brings the gloves to the bedside, sterilized, and puts them on the doctor's hands? A. No, sir.

"Q. That never happens? A. It does at times.

"Q. If you don't know where you put the gloves on, how are you so positive she didn't put them on? A. The thing I do not remember—and I think probable—I was waiting for her, and while I was waiting I was getting ready—and I put them on myself in cases of that kind.

"Q. You put them on yourself? A. I frequently do.

"Q. Where did you get the gloves? A. They have a supply of them in the sterilized dressing room.

"Q. I am asking you where you got the gloves? A. I got it out of the supplies supplied by the hospital.

"Q. Are you positive of that? A. Positive.

"Q. You put it on before you came into the room? A. I may have; I would not say I did or not.

"Q. What is your best judgment on it? A. We do it either way.

"Q. In this particular case. It is three years ago as you say. Have you any better recollection as to whether inside or outside? A. I can't say; I might put it on outside or not.

"Q. Are you positive you put it on yourself? A. Yes.

"Q. Walked out of the sterilization room, or whatever you call it, into where this lady was? A. Yes.

"Q. Went through the door? A. Yes.

"Q. How did you open the door? A. Usually back in and push the door open.

"Q. Which did you do in this case? A. Backed in and pushed the door open.

"Q. Are you positive of that? A. Positive.

"Q. You are positive you backed in the door? A. Yes.

"Q. Where did you get the smock or gown you call it? A. Out of the hospital supply.

"Q. Same place you got the glove? A. Yes.

"Q. When did you put that on? A. Before scrubbing.

"Q. Before scrubbing? A. Yes.

"Q. When you came into the room did you have this smock and glove on—both on? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Now, doctor, if you went into that room and examined that lady with your street clothes on and only one glove on, would that be the recognized practice in such cases in Del Norte County? A. No, sir. * * *

"Q. And where was this glove that you made this vaginal examination with—where did you sterilize that? A. They have this auto-clave. That is sterilized under steam pressure.

"Q. Did you see it sterilized? A. I know it was.

"Mr. Preston: I move that go out as not responsive to the question.

"Witness: No, I didn't watch them sterilize them; I know it was sterilized.

"Q. Did the nurse give it to you or did you get it from the place where it stays? A. I presume I got it.

"Q. You got it? A. I think I answered that before. * * *

"Mr. Preston: It is a fact, isn't it, that at this stage or condition of Mrs. Anderson, just before or after childbirth, she is much more susceptible to infection than otherwise? A. Yes.

"Q. Your answer is yes? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Great care should be exercised at that time to prevent infection? A. Yes."

[4] The foregoing quoted testimony particularly considered in connection with the question as to whether the glove used was or was not sterilized, and with all of the other circumstances shown by the evidence and especially the circumstance that the infection developed within the vagina, the question as to whether the glove used was properly sterilized, or was sterilized at all, became one peculiarly within the province of the jury to determine, as did also that as to whether defendant wore a sterilized gown or his street clothes.

In support of the order granting the motion for nonsuit, defendant cites the cases of Ewing v. Goode, C.C., 78 F. 442; Louden v. Scott, 58 Mont. 645, 194 P. 488; Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642; McGraw v. Kerr, 23 Colo.App. 163, 128 P. 870, 873, these citations being cited particularly in connection with the contention that nowhere in the record is there any evidence that any act or omission of the doctor caused the streptococcic infection disclosed by the evidence. However, the contentions in this respect we deem completely answered in the cases of Barham v. Widing, supra, and Inderbitzen v. Lane Hospital, supra. A further discussion of said cases cited by respondent is not considered necessary for the purpose of this opinion.

The complaint, as stated, is in three counts, all relating to the same transaction or event, and the evidence applies to all three counts. We are of the opinion that the evidence, together with the reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom, presented a case for the determination of the jury. It is our conclusion that the motion for a nonsuit should have been denied upon all three counts of the complaint.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: THOMPSON, Acting P. J. TUTTLE, J.

HICKS v. OCEAN SHORE R. R., Inc., et al.*

Civ. 10883.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 6, 1941.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing March 8, 1941.

Hearing Granted April 5, 1941.

1. Workmen's compensation ⇐2134

Under Workmen's Compensation Act providing that where employer fails to secure payment of compensation injured employee may bring action at law for damages, and that in such action it is presumed that the injury to the employee was a direct result and grew out of the negligence of the employer, and that burden of proof is upon employer to rebut presumption of negligence, statutory presumption is sufficient to support verdict for employee because that presumption is itself "evidence". St.1937, p. 271 et seq., §§ 3706–3709.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Evidence".

2. Workmen's compensation ⇐2134, 2141

Under Workmen's Compensation Act provision that if an employer fails to secure payment of compensation injured employee may bring action for damages, and that in such action employer is presumed to be negligent, and that burden of proof is upon employer to rebut such presumption, statute in effect declares that such presumption is "substantial and satisfactory evidence" of fact in issue and, though it is permitted to rebut the presumption, this merely creates a conflict for the jury to determine and leaves no debatable question for the appellate court on appeal from judgment for employee. St. 1937, p. 271 et seq., §§ 3706–3709.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Substantial and Satisfactory Evidence".

3. Evidence ⇐15, 23(1)

It is common knowledge that a person only 13 years of age is not permitted to enlist in the navy, and that a person only 16 years of age is not permitted to marry in California without his parents' consent.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇐2122

In action by employee for damages resulting from negligent injury against an employer who had failed to secure compensation, proof that since plaintiff's discharge from the navy he had used 11 different names and aliases and that he had sued under a name different from those which he used when he had enlisted in the navy, when he was married and when he had been employed, excused an earlier discovery of plaintiff's true age and showed proper diligence on part of defendants who moved for a new trial on ground of excessive damages resulting from plaintiff's misrepresentation of his age. St.1937, p. 271 et seq., §§ 3706–3709.

5. Trial ⇐114

When counsel for either party states as a fact a matter presumably within his knowledge, but not within the knowledge of his adversary, the latter may assume that the fact is correctly stated.

6. Stipulations ⇐7

Where counsel for plaintiff stated that plaintiff was 20 years of age at a certain time and procured a stipulation from opposing counsel to that effect, plaintiff who knew that he was older should in fairness to court and his own counsel have corrected the error and under the circumstances the stipulation was not binding upon opposing counsel. St.1937, p. 271 et seq., §§ 3706–3709.

7. Workmen's compensation ⇐2136

In action by employee for damages against employer who had failed to secure compensation, evidence showed that plaintiff throughout the trial misrepresented to the jury his earnings, his earning capacity, both before and after the injury, and the extent and nature of his injury, as well as a deliberate and continued endeavor to aggravate and exaggerate the injury. St.1937, p. 271 et seq., §§ 3706–3709; pp. 278, 283, §§ 4451, 4660.

* Subsequent opinion 117 P.2d 850.

8. Workmen's compensation ⇐2135

In action by injured employee against employer who had failed to secure compensation, where throughout the trial impression was given that defendants had deliberately refused to secure compensation in order that they might escape liability to any injured workman, exclusion of evidence to show that defendants had been covered by insurance until 4:00 p. m. of the day before the accident and had been assured by their broker that they would be fully covered by a new policy was error. St.1937, p. 271 et seq., §§ 3706–3709; pp. 278, 283, §§ 4451, 4660.

9. Evidence ⇐155(1)

When counsel states to the jury facts as facts presumably within his own knowledge and these facts are highly prejudicial to the other side, he cannot fairly object to proof that those facts are not true on the sole ground that such facts are not material.

10. Workmen's compensation ⇐2121

In action by injured employee against employer who had failed to secure compensation, verdict for $8,500, plus $1,700 as attorney's fees was required to be set aside as excessive and as resulting from prejudice of jury and willful and deliberate misrepresentations of material facts by plaintiff. St.1937, p. 271 et seq., §§ 3706–3709; pp. 278, 283, §§ 4451, 4660.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by James P. Hicks against the Ocean Shore Railroad, Incorporated, and others, for damages for injuries under special provisions of St. 1937, p. 271 et seq., §§ 3706–3709, providing for action by employee where employer has failed to secure compensation. From a judgment for plaintiff for $8,500, and $1,700 attorney's fees, the defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed, with directions for a new trial on the matter of damages alone.

Keyes & Erskine, Anthony S. Devoto, and A. P. Black, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Gardiner Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff sued for damages for injuries incurred during the course of his employment with defendants. Compensation for such injuries had been awarded and paid, but the suit was maintained under the special provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (later incorporated into sections 3706-3709 of the Labor Code, St. 1937, p. 271 et seq.), where the employer had failed to carry compensation insurance. The trial was by jury, which returned a verdict of $15,000. Upon a premature motion for a new trial the verdict was ordered reduced to $10,000. Upon a second and proper motion for a new trial the verdict was ordered reduced to $8,500, and, in addition thereto, the plaintiff was awarded $1,700 as attorney's fees. The appeal is taken from this judgment, and from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. It is presented on four volumes of typewritten transcripts of 2233 pages, with five volumes of printed briefs covering more than 3700 pages.

Plaintiff had been employed by the Adams Construction Company in the operation of a power shovel under a contract with defendants for operations leading to clearing away rock and dirt from the face of a tunnel on the railroad right of way which had been out of operation for many years. On June 24, 1936, the contract with the Adams Company was terminated, and on the following day the defendants took over the operations with the same equipment and employees. On June 30th the plaintiff was injured when his right hand became enmeshed in the unguarded gears of the shovel. The plaintiff gave different versions of how the accident occurred—first, that he left his seat in the front part of the machine, intending to go to the rear to look at the carburetor; second, that, as he had his head out one of the windows watching a rock slide, he was struck on the head by a falling rock, knocked unconscious, and then fell inside the cabin and regained consciousness when his hand struck the gears. Some 2,000 pages of the reporter's transcript is filled with testimony relating to the physical conditions of the territory in which the work was being done and particularly with the danger, known to both employer and employee, from slides due to the loose rock on the banks under which the work was being done. We do not state the facts of this phase of the case because, as will be seen, they are not material to the issues of this appeal. The plaintiff offered evidence that he was thirty-two years of age at the time of the injury, was married and had a daughter fourteen years old at the time of the trial; that both wife and daughter were dependent upon him for support. He offered evidence of his physical injuries and of his earning capacity prior and subsequent to the accident. The defendants offered to prove that their failure to secure compensation insurance prior to the accident was not deliberate or wilful, but was an oversight. This offer was denied by the trial court. Upon the motion for a new trial the defendants offered evidence disclosing that the plaintiff had testified falsely as to his age, employment, and earnings. On this appeal he insists that his admitted perjury is beyond the cognizance of either the trial or the appellate courts.

The unusual character of the case is emphasized by these facts: The plaintiff appeared in the usual manner before the industrial accident commission and was awarded compensation for his injuries, all medical treatment, and hospitalization. This award called for a weekly payment to plaintiff of $27.50 during his disability, and he states that $2,114.50 had been paid by the defendants under this award, but, whether this was the amount paid at the time the complaint was filed, at the time of the trial, or when his brief was filed, he does not state. He does say that the award of the commission was "paid in full". In any event the award was made by the commission on the basis of the injuries suffered and upon the uniform standard for all such injuries. Then, because the defendants had failed to take out insurance, the plaintiff was permitted under the statute to sue for damages the same "as if this division (of the act) did not apply." By the terms of the act the "compensation" theretofore awarded and paid is to be deducted from the final judgment and the cause of action for damages is to be heard without regard to the provisions of the Labor Code. In the trial of the action special rules of pleading and practice are specified which are pertinent to the issues on this appeal.

Section 3706 of the Labor Code reads: "If any employer fails to secure the payment of compensation, any injured employee or his dependents may proceed against such employer by filing an application for compensation with the commission, and, in addition, may bring an action at law against such employer for damages, as if this division did not apply." Section 3708 reads: "In such action it is presumed that the injury to the employee was a direct result and grew out of the negligence of the employer, and the burden of proof is upon the employer, to rebut the presumption of negligence. It is not a defense to the employer that the employee was guilty of contributory negligence, or assumed the risk of the hazard complained of, or that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. * * *"

Section 3709 reads: "If, as a result of such action for damages, a judgment is obtained against the employer in excess of the compensation awarded under this division, the compensation awarded by the commission, if paid, or security is given for its payment and is approved by the court, shall be credited upon such judgment."

[1, 2] Plaintiff grounded his charge of negligence upon three specific acts—digging into the base of a high bank of material which had a known tendency to slip; failure to maintain lookouts to warn the operator of sliding or falling rocks; maintaining unguarded gears in the cab adjacent to the operator's seat. By the terms of the statute the defendants are presumed to have been negligent in all these particulars, as well as in any other which might support the verdict. With the burden upon defendants to rebut these presumptions it is apparent that there is no field for discussion of the evidence upon an appeal from the verdict. The only answer that can be made is that defendants were negligent because of the presumption. There is no question of reasonableness of the presumption, substantiality of the evidence offered, or fairness to the employer. He is presumed negligent, even though the injury was caused by the wilful and deliberate act of the employee contrary to all instructions of his employer and in the face of the utmost care on the part of the employer. We emphasize this feature because of the extended arguments of counsel on the issues of negligence, contributory negligence and assumption of risk. It is important also in relation to the insistence of the defendants that in many particulars the plaintiff testified falsely in relating the circumstances of the accident. All these questions are beyond the consideration of the court. All the testimony offered by plaintiff may be untrue, nevertheless, the presumption of negligence is all that is necessary to support the verdict, because that presumption is itself evidence. And when the statute declares that an issuable fact shall be presumed, it in effect declares that such presumption is substantial and satisfactory evidence of the fact in issue, and, though it is permitted to rebut the presumption, this merely creates a conflict for the jury to determine and leaves no debatable question for the appellate court. To illustrate the point—plaintiff claimed negligence because defendants failed to provide a safe place for him to work since the embankment was composed of loose material given to frequent slides. Defendants countered that the embankment was not dangerous and that its condition was well known to the employee and was perfectly safe when proper care was exercised by the operator of the shovel. But assumption of risk and contributory negligence are both barred as defenses to such an action, and the negligence of the defendants is presumed. The plaintiff claimed that defendants were negligent in failing to maintain lookouts to warn him when rocks were falling His second explanation of the accident was that, while he had his head out of the window watching a slide of rocks, one hit him on the head, rendering him unconscious. Hence, though the asserted negligence in failing to maintain lookouts had no proximate relation to the accident, the defendants are, nevertheless, presumed to have been negligent. His third charge of negligence is the failure to cover or guard the gears under the floor of the cab. Defendants countered with proof that the gears and the cab were maintained in the usual and approved manner, and that plaintiff had been warned specifically always to turn off the motor before leaving his seat in the cab. But contributory negligence is not a defense in such an action, hence the presumption of negligence still holds.

For the reasons given it would serve no purpose to analyze the mass of testimony offered by both parties on these various issues, or to discuss the attacks made upon the veracity of the plaintiff in his descriptions of the circumstances of the accident. And it would serve no useful purpose to discuss those cases where the reverse of this situation appears—where the verdict of the jury is against the presumption, and the question arises whether the evidence offered to rebut the presumption is sufficient and substantial. It is sufficient here that, under the express terms of the statute, the defendants are presumed to have been negligent, and that such presumption is sufficient to support the verdict as to this liability.

[3,4] The serious question relates to the amount of the verdict. The defendants assert that it is excessive and that the excess was procured by the false testimony and prejudicial misconduct of the plaintiff. The facts bearing upon this phase of the case are these: Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he was thirty-three years of age and testified that he had a wife and a fourteen-year-old daughter dependent upon him for support. When defendants questioned him as to when and where he was born the trial court sustained his objections to the inquiry. Mortality tables were given the jury showing the life expectancy of the plaintiff; evidence was offered showing that he could have done the same class of work in which he was engaged until he reached the age of fifty, and throughout the trial emphasis was given to his loss of earning power because of having been deprived of the ability to carry on such work for the period of seventeen years. On further detail of his loss of earning power the plaintiff testified that he had sought employment with the Associated Oil Company after the accident and had been refused because of his injured hand. In all of these instances the plaintiff was shown to have testified falsely when the true facts were discovered and presented to the court upon defendants' motion for a new trial. If plaintiff were thirty-three as he testified during the trial which was held in 1937 he would have been born in the year 1904. In the year 1917 he enlisted in the United States Navy under the name Prescott John Hicks. He would then have been but thirteen years of age. He was dishonorably discharged from the navy and was married in 1920 in the city of Fresno under the name of Jack P. Hicks, giving his age at that time as twenty-two years. If he had been born in 1904, as his testimony at the trial disclosed, he would have been but sixteen at the time of his marriage in 1920. It is a matter of common knowledge that he would not have been permitted to enlist in the navy at the age of thirteen, and would not have been permitted to marry in this state at the age of sixteen without his parents' consent. He may have misrepresented his age in both instances, but in this case he does not say so. He makes no denial of any of this evidence, insists that the court should disregard it though true in every detail, and argues that the affidavits showing these matters were technically insufficient because the affidavits did not affirmatively state that defendants had used due diligence in an endeavor to discover the evidence prior to the trial. The defendants showed that, since plaintiff's discharge from the navy, he had used eleven different names and aliases, and that he had sued under a name different from those which he used when he had enlisted in the navy, when he was married, and when he had been employed by the Associated Oil Company. These facts alone excused an earlier discovery and showed proper diligence on the part of the defendants. It was not necessary to repeat them in each of the affidavits filed. The defendants refer to numerous passages in the record where the age of the plaintiff and his prospect of earning eight dollars a day for seventeen years were impressed upon the jury. The instructions which directed the jury to take these factors into consideration leave no doubt as to the prejudice arising, and this alone may account for the excessive verdict.

[5, 6] We are not impressed with the argument of plaintiff that the defendants are bound by their stipulation as to plaintiff's age. The circumstances upon which this claim is based are not unusual. Counsel for defendants was examining the plaintiff as to his employment and earning capacity prior to the accident when the following colloquy occurred:

"Q. So, from July, 1924, until you went to work for Adams in September, 1935, you were in the employ either as the operator of a gasoline station or as a truck salesman for the Associated Oil Company, weren't you? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, you received as a salary, as Class C operator, when you were first employed in the Associated Oil Company, of $130, didn't you, approximately? A. I don't know.

"Mr. Johnson: Before counsel asks any such questions, inasmuch as he is doing the testifying now and not the witness, I think it would be fair for him to tell us the dates.

"The Court: Yes, I think so.

"Mr. Erskine: All right, I will say the date from July 10, 1924, until—

"Mr. Johnson: Some thirteen years ago, since the man was twenty years old.

"Mr. Erskine: That was on July 10, 1924—

"Mr. Johnson: Will you stipulate he was twenty years old—

"Mr. Erskine: All right, we will stipulate he was twenty years old."

When counsel for either party states as a fact a matter presumably within his knowledge, but not within the knowledge of his adversary, the latter may assume that the fact is correctly stated. In this instance it was the duty of plaintiff, in fairness to the court and his own counsel, to correct the error.

[7] The defendants assign as prejudicial and leading to the excessive verdict the frequent references to plaintiff's employment as a shovel operator at a daily wage of eight dollars. The jury was told that he had an actual annual income of $2,500, based on an uninterrupted employment for 312 days of the year. The only credible evidence was that his employment for many years was that of a truck driver at four dollars a day, and that he had been employed at the higher wage by a member of his family for a few weeks prior to the accident. The evidence discloses that throughout the trial the plaintiff misrepresented to the jury his earnings, his earning capacity, both before and after the injury, and the extent and nature of his injury. It also discloses a deliberate and continued endeavor to aggravate and exaggerate the injury.

[8, 9] Defendants argue that they suffered serious prejudice in the minds of the jurors in the ruling of the trial court denying them the privilege of meeting the charge that their failure to carry compensation insurance was deliberate and wilful. In the opening statement to the jury, and throughout the trial, plaintiff endeavored to prejudice the minds of the jury by references to the operations of the railroad company designed to escape liability "so that any workman or anyone else who might be injured would never be able to collect", and that this was done with full knowledge of the defendants that they were not insured. To offset the prejudice thus created the defendants attempted to prove that they were covered by insurance until 4:00 p.m. of the day before the accident and had been assured by their broker that they would be fully covered by a new policy. In sustaining the plaintiff's objection the trial court erred. Of course, the evidence was not admissible as an excuse for non-insurance, or as a bar to the action. The statute permits the action whenever an employer "fails to secure the payment of compensation". It does not require that such failure shall be wilful or deliberate, or designed to prevent recovery by an employee. But, being a penalty, intention is an essential element. And when the jury is asked to supplement the damages for personal injuries by a verdict in the nature of a penalty for wilful and deliberate misconduct—a verdict for punitive damages so to speak—the intention and good faith of the defendants become material. To the precise point presented here the answer is that, when counsel states to the jury facts as facts presumably within his own knowledge, and these facts are highly prejudicial to the other side, he cannot fairly object to proof that those facts are not true on the sole ground that such facts are not material to the case.

[10] From our review of the voluminous record the conclusion follows that the verdict is excessive and that it resulted both from the prejudice of the jury as hereinbefore indicated, and by the wilful and deliberate misrepresentations of material facts by the plaintiff. We are not unmindful of the cases cited by plaintiff, holding that the question of false swearing is one for the jury alone. We do not need to approve or disapprove the reasoning of those cases. The ruling here needs no authority to support it. When a party deliberately and wilfully misrepresents material facts, and such misrepresentations result in an excessive verdict in his favor, and, when confronted by the truth, he does not deny, a court would be impotent if it should agree with him that no remedy could be found.

For the reasons given, a new trial should not be had on the question of defendants' liability for damages. The new trial should be confined to the question of damages alone. Each party should bear its own costs of this appeal.

The judgment is reversed with directions for a new trial on the matter of damages alone.

ANDERSON v. STATE BAR.

L. A. 17689.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 17, 1941.

1. Attorney and client ⇐58

Suspension from practice of law for one year was proper punishment for attorney who retained and used clients' funds, and was not unreasonable because of extenuating circumstances, comprising illness of attorney's mother and straitened financial circumstances of attorney and repayment of money with interest. St.1939, p. 357, § 6101.

2. Attorney and client ⇐44(2)

Attorney's conversion of client's money to his own use is a serious charge, which ordinarily would merit disbarment. St.1939, p. 357, § 6101.

CARTER and HOUSER, JJ., dissenting.

Disciplinary proceedings in the matter of Stuart D. Anderson, an attorney, wherein the State Bar recommended that attorney be suspended from the practice of law for one year.

Order in accordance with recommendation.

Fred O. Reed, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Claude Minard, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Petitioner herein seeks a statutory "review" by this court of a disciplinary proceeding which was instituted against him as a practicing attorney at law in this state, and which resulted in a recommendation by the State Bar to this court to the effect that petitioner be suspended from the practice of the law for a period of one year. More particularly, the sole question that is presented herein relates to whether the said recommendation should be approved; or, in the event of its rejection,—by order of this court,— to what discipline petitioner should be subjected. The facts are not the subject of dispute by the interested parties. In substance and effect they are as follows:

Petitioner, who was admitted to practice in California in August, 1923, and who has practiced continuously since that date in the city of Los Angeles, was employed on July 26, 1934, by Jennie Coburn, Lois Coburn and Roy Coburn as their attorney in a condemnation action. He was paid the sum of $100 and, additionally, as compensation for his services he was to receive 25 per cent of any sum in excess of $908 which might be collected for his clients in the said condemnation proceedings. On December 11, 1936, he received a warrant from the county of Los Angeles in the sum of $908 and a warrant from the city of Long Beach in the sum of $204, in settlement of his clients' interest in the action. At about the time petitioner received the said warrants, his mother was taken seriously ill and required extensive medical care and treatment. Petitioner was without cash resources of his own with which to meet the entire cost of such treatment, and he thereupon cashed the warrants received on behalf of his clients and used the money to procure necessary medical care and attention for his mother. At that time petitioner was enjoying a good law practice and he expected to be able to replace the money so used by him. However, he did not notify his clients that he had received the warrants.

In February, 1940, Jennie Coburn learned of the fact that the said warrants previously had been delivered to petitioner and thereupon demanded payment from him. Shortly before that time, petitioner had been injured in an automobile accident, and on her demand that he pay her the money he explained that he could not make immediate restitution, but that he would make repayment of the entire sum, with interest, over a period of time. Unwilling to accept that arrangement, Jennie Coburn filed a complaint in that connection with the State Bar, and thereafter that body instituted the instant proceedings against petitioner. A short time later he borrowed sufficient money and repaid his clients the total amount of the said warrants, together with seven per cent interest thereon,— and making no deduction for the percentage on the $204 to which, as hereinbefore stated, he was entitled as attorney's fee.

At the hearing before the local administrative committee, petitioner frankly admitted his misconduct and expressed his regret at its occurrence. The said committee recommended a private reprimand; but by the board of governors of the State Bar it was recommended to this court that petitioner be suspended from the practice of law for a period of one year.

Notwithstanding the fact that petitioner does not dispute the facts disclosed by the record, but admits the truth of the very serious charge which was filed against him,—misappropriation of his clients' funds,—he seeks a review by this court upon the ground that the said recommendation of the board of governors is arbitrary and unreasonable.

[1] In support of that contention petitioner cites five cases, in each of which was involved a proceeding of a nature similar to that here under consideration, and wherein this court ordered a reduction of the degree of discipline which in each instance had been recommended by the board of governors of the State Bar: Mills v. State Bar, 211 Cal. 579, 296 P. 280, 297 P. 19; Herron v. State Bar, 212 Cal. 196, 298 P. 474; Peck v. State Bar, 217 Cal. 47, 17 P.2d 112; Egan v. State Bar, 10 Cal.2d 458, 75 P.2d 67 and Barbee v. State Bar, 213 Cal. 296, 2 P.2d 353. However, in each of the first four of the cited cases the discipline which was imposed by this court was the suspension of the petitioner from practice of the law for one year,—which is the identical measure of discipline recommended in the instant case by the board of governors. In other words, in the present proceeding the board of governors merely recommended the same discipline which this court had imposed in other proceedings for similar offenses. We are satisfied that in making the recommendation which was made herein the said board was mindful of the extenuating circumstances of the illness of petitioner's mother and of his straitened financial circumstances at that time, and that because of those factors it refrained from recommending the disbarment of petitioner.

[2] The charge which was made against petitioner—that of converting his clients' money to his own use—is a very serious one and ordinarily would merit the drastic measure of disbarment. Mills v. State Bar, 211 Cal. 579, 296 P. 280, 297 P. 19; Brown v. State Bar, 2 Cal.2d 533, 42 P.2d 306; Dalzell v. State Bar, 6 Cal.2d 433, 57 P.2d 1300; Padgham v. State Bar, 6 Cal.2d 504, 58 P.2d 633; Laney v. State Bar, 7 Cal.2d 419, 60 P.2d 845; Maggart v. State Bar, 7 Cal.2d 495, 61 P.2d 451; Glover v. State Bar, 13 Cal.2d 229, 89 P.2d 922 and Kennedy v. State Bar, 13 Cal.2d 236, 88 P.2d 920. Petitioner might legally have been charged with embezzlement and, in such event, admittedly having converted his clients' money to his own use, it is unlikely that he would have escaped conviction; and had he been convicted, under the provisions of section 6101 of the State Bar Act, St.1939, p. 357, he automatically and necessarily would have been subject to disbarment.

The good record previously held by petitioner together with the fact that he repaid, with interest, the entire sum due his clients, and the assumed fact that the pressure occasioned by his mother's illness was considerable, all justified the conclusion of the board of governors that —commensurate with the gravity of the admitted misconduct of petitioner—in determining the discipline to be imposed it should be as lenient as the circumstances would permit.

This court is satisfied that the recommendation which was made by the board of governors of the State Bar was proper. It therefore is ordered that petitioner be suspended from the practice of the law for one year commencing with the date of filing this decision.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

It is well established that in determining the question of what discipline should be imposed upon an erring or offending attorney, mitigating circumstances should be given great consideration,—such as the motives and purposes which actuated his asserted misconduct, his previous good record, his characteristics and nature, also testimonials with respect to his good character and reputation. Marsh v. State Bar, 2 Cal.2d 75, cases cited at page 79, 39 P.2d 403. It also is well settled that the discipline of an attorney, as contemplated by the provisions of the State Bar Act, is not punitive in character. Its primary object is the reformation rather than the punishment of the offender. A disciplinary proceeding is designed to effect that end and —for the protection of the courts, the legal profession and the public—to consider and determine whether the said offender may be deemed fit to continue as a practitioner of the law and as an officer of the court. Marsh v. State Bar, supra, and cases there cited.

Although in the present case the gravity of petitioner's offense cannot be minimized, it also appears that he has suffered greatly. The tarnishment of his record, the mental torture which must have followed from his inability to re-establish his practice while laboring under the burden of his practiced deceit, his anxiety for his mother, and his own physical injuries, together with the added stigma of the disciplinary proceeding, have apparently combined to drive him to the acute realization that no circumstance, however necessitous, will justify an act of dishonesty or breach of trust. If—as is believed to be the fact—his lesson has been sufficiently severe to effect a permanent strengthening of his moral fiber, the imposition of a period of suspension from practice would serve no good purpose and might jeopardize his present and future livelihood as well as the safety of the one dependent upon him.

It would seem clear that the punishment which petitioner has already received, with the additional rebuke of a public reprimand, will suffice to deter him henceforth from yielding to any temptation, even under pressure of dire distress, again to wander from the path of moral rectitude.

In determining the degree of discipline which should be administered or prescribed in proceedings of this character, this court may be guided by the peculiar facts and circumstances of the individual case. Under such circumstances,—viewed in the light of the primary purpose to be effected by such discipline, as hereinbefore outlined,—it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question whether the degree of discipline here fixed conforms to that imposed in cases cited in the briefs as similar in point of fact to this case.

In my opinion, a public reprimand administered to petitioner should constitute sufficient discipline.

FORBES v. BOARD OF MISSIONS OF METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH et al.

L. A. 16488.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 17, 1941.

Rehearing Denied March 17, 1941.

1. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

Where husband and wife conveyed realty owned in joint tenancy to church mission board, reserving a life estate to themselves or the survivor, and at same time an agreement was executed wherein mission board agreed to educate a relative of grantors for the ministry should grantors die before his education was completed, deed to mission board was not a strict "deed of gift" but was a conveyance to the board in part, at least, in "consideration" of board's agreement to supervise and, under certain contingencies to finance education of grantor's relative, and grantors received some benefit from grant and their promise was, therefore, presumed to be a "joint and several obligation". Civ.Code, § 1659.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Consideration", "Deed of Gift" and "Joint and Several Obligation".

2. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

In absence of evidence that offer by husband and wife to convey property owned in joint tenancy to church mission board, in part consideration for board's agreement to supervise education of relative if grantors should die before relative's education was completed, was a joint offer, presumption was that it was "joint and several". Civ. Code, § 1659.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Joint and Several".

3. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

Even if offer of husband and wife to convey realty owned by them in joint tenancy to church mission board, partly as a gift and partly for a "consideration" from which they derived a benefit, was a joint offer, the death of husband before offer was accepted by board did not release wife in whom, on husband's death, title to the whole property became vested. Civ.Code, § 1543.

4. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

Where husband and wife offered to convey realty owned in joint tenancy to church mission board, reserving life estate to themselves or the survivor, and also executed an agreement wherein board agreed to educate a relative of grantors for the ministry if grantors should die before his education was completed, evidence held insufficient to sustain finding that offer was contingent on its acceptance and execution of proposed agreement by board before death of either husband or wife.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1008(1)

The question as to what was a reasonable time for church mission board to accept offer of husband and wife to convey jointly owned realty to board, partly for certain consideration and partly as gift, was a question of fact to be determined by trial court.

6. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

Where husband and wife who conveyed realty owned in joint tenancy to church mission board reserving a life estate to themselves or survivor, and at same time executed an agreement requiring board to educate their young relative for the ministry should they die before his education was completed, held that even if agreement was required to be accepted by board within reasonable time so that wife, after husband's death could have declined to accept the agreement because of delay, where wife made no objection to the delay, received the agreement, and gave her written receipt therefor, she thereby "waived" any right to complain of the delay.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waived".

7. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

In action to set aside a grant deed, evidence held not to support finding that wife who could not speak English and who was one of two grantors of property owned in joint tenancy conveyed to church mission board was ignorant of, and was misled and deceived as to, her rights after husband's death and, therefore, was not barred or "estopped" by laches, limitations or otherwise, from seeking to obtain cancellation of conveyance.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estopped".

8. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

In action to set aside grant deed and to quiet title to land conveyed by husband and wife and owned in joint tenancy to church mission board reserving life estate to themselves, finding that wife, who could not speak English, was prevented, after husband's death, from consulting other persons in regard to her rights under the agreement, was not sustained by evidence.

9. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

In suit to set aside deed of property, jointly owned by grantors, to church mission board reserving a life estate to grantors or the survivor, evidence held to establish that wife, who survived husband and who did not speak English and understood it very little, thoroughly understood the purpose and effect of the deed and assented to the transaction with full knowledge.

10. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

Where wife, who could not speak English and could not readily understand it, with full knowledge of what she was doing joined husband in executing deed conveying jointly owned realty to church mission board, reserving a life estate to grantors or to the survivor, and also executed agreement requiring board to educate a young relative for the ministry should they die before his education was completed, wife had no legal right to complain of the conveyance to the board or to ask that it be returned to her after husband's death. Civ.Code, § 1659.

11. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

Where husband and wife conveyed realty owned in joint tenancy to church mission board, reserving a life estate to themselves or to the survivor, and at same time an agreement was executed which provided that if it became necessary for grantors to sell the property or any portion thereof for purpose of purchasing necessaries of life, board would execute quitclaim deed conveying property so sold to purchaser, there was no obligation on board, even if a purchaser had been found and a demand had been made by wife after husband's death, to execute a quitclaim deed to purchaser or to give the property back, in absence of evidence that wife was in need of necessaries of life.

12. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

Where husband and wife conveyed realty owned in joint tenancy to church mission board, reserving life estate, and at same time an agreement was executed requiring board to educate their relative for the ministry should they die before his education was completed, and providing that if it should become necessary for grantors to sell the property or any portion thereof for purpose of purchasing necessaries of life, board would execute quitclaim deed to purchaser, the fact that after husband's death wife became ill in hospital and that relative gave up his education toward ministry, did not justify a demand for a reconveyance.

13. Husband and wife ⇐14(3)

An agreement executed by husband and wife, who conveyed jointly owned realty to church mission board, reserving a life estate to themselves or the survivor, requiring board to educate grantors' relative for ministry if they should die before his education was completed, could not be set aside in action by wife's executor on ground of fraud, undue influence, or on any theory of haste as a deathbed transaction, where, though husband died less than two months after its execution, the agreement was a consummation of a desire first expressed by husband over two years before and frequently repeated, and was the result of long negotiations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Francis J. Heney, Judge.

Action by Charles Forbes, as executor of the will of Erolinda Moreno Zapata, deceased, against the Board of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and another, to set aside a grant deed, to quiet title to realty, and for an accounting. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

For prior opinion see 104 P.2d 111.

Newby & Newby and Dee Holder, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bachtell & Clanton, Constance Leitch, S. N. Bachtell, and Caryl Warner, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, Justice.

This action is one to set aside a grant deed, to quiet title to the real property described therein, and for an accounting of the rents, issues and profits derived from said real property during the time the defendants were in the possession thereof.

The deed was executed by Apolonio Bailon Zapata and Erolinda Moreno Zapata, husband and wife, as grantors in favor of the Board of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and bore date April 23, 1932. The grantors were members of the Homer Toberman Mission in Los Angeles, a religious organization under the jurisdiction of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. They were much interested in the work of the local church. Mr. Zapata had been for several years president of the board of stewards, the local governing board of said church. Both Mr. and Mrs. Zapata were of Spanish descent. Mr. Zapata spoke and wrote English and followed the profession of teacher of Spanish. Mrs. Zapata did not speak English and understood the language only to a very limited extent. They had no children, and no relatives in whom they were particularly interested.

They were the owners as joint tenants of two pieces of improved real property in Los Angeles, which brought them in a substantial income. Some two years prior to the execution of said deed Mr. Zapata had spoken to Mr. Rameriz, the pastor of the local church, and stated that he and his wife had been thinking for some time about turning their property over to the church when they died. Mr. Rameriz told Mr. Zapata that he knew nothing about such matters, but would speak to Mr. Reynolds, the presiding elder of the church, concerning the matter. He mentioned to Mr. Reynolds the conversation he had with Mr. Zapata, but nothing was done in regard to the matter for some considerable time, when Mr. Zapata again spoke to Mr. Rameriz and inquired if he had done anything about having the property conveyed to the church. Mr. Rameriz replied that he had spoken to Mr. Reynolds and that was all he could do. Mr. Zapata then saw Mr. Reynolds and they had several conversations, in which Mr. Zapata said that he desired his wife to be the beneficiary of his property and to have all income therefrom during her lifetime, and that upon her death he wanted the church, the Board of Missions, to have the property. He said they desired to make a deed to that effect and asked Mr. Reynolds to secure an attorney to draw the necessary papers. As a result of this conversation Mr. Nathan Newby was consulted and engaged to prepare the legal papers required for the transfer of the property.

Prior to this time Mr. Zapata had frequently talked with Mr. Fitzgerald, a former pastor of the local church, in regard to conveying the property to the church, but Mr. Fitzgerald had said nothing about the matter to anyone. Mr. Fitzgerald had been a former pastor of the Homer Toberman Mission and an old acquaintance of both Mr. and Mrs. Zapata, but had retired from the pastorate in 1920, and since that time had no official connection either with the local church or the Board of Missions.

Mr. Zapata was greatly interested in a young boy who was then residing in his family by the name of Antonio Alberto Zapata. Mr. and Mrs. Zapata desired to assist in his education, provided he decided to study for the ministry, and to provide means for his education out of the proceeds of their property in case he had not finished his education before the death of both Mr. and Mrs. Zapata.

From the information furnished him by Mr. Zapata and Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Newby prepared three documents for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of Mr. and Mrs. Zapata to transfer their property to the Board of Missions. These documents were a grant deed, an agreement and a letter to Mr. Fitzgerald. The grant deed was to be executed by Mr. and Mrs. Zapata in favor of the Board of Missions, by which they conveyed their property to said board, reserving to themselves and to the survivor a life estate in said real property and the rents, issues and profits thereof. The agreement was between the Zapatas and the Board of Missions, whereby the latter agreed to supervise the education of Antonio Alberto Zapata, provided his education was not finished before the death of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Zapata, if he should desire to become a minister, and to devote one-half of the proceeds of the property conveyed to the board for the education of said Antonio Alberto Zapata. The letter to Mr. Fitzgerald was signed by Mr. and Mrs. Zapata, and directed him to hold the grant deed until the agreement was properly executed by the Board of Missions, and then to deliver the agreement to the Zapatas and file the deed for recording. The Board of Missions was a corporation organized and having its principal place of business at Nashville, Tennessee, and it was necessary to send the agreement to the board at Nashville, Tennessee, for its execution by said board.

After these papers were drawn, they were taken to the Zapata home on April 23, 1932, by Mr. Newby. Accompanying Mr. Newby were Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Dee Holder, the latter a notary public. Mr. Fitzgerald, who understood and spoke Spanish, read the papers and interpreted them from English to Spanish for Mrs. Zapata's benefit. Mrs. Zapata asked that a change be made in the agreement, so that it would provide that in case it should ever be necessary to sell the property, or any portion of it, for the purpose of purchasing necessaries of life for herself, the Board of Missions would join in a quitclaim deed to the purchaser. Due to this change in the agreement the papers were not signed on that date, but were returned to the office of the attorney. There the addition to the agreement asked for by Mrs. Zapata (being subdivision [4] hereinafter set out) was made, and on May 14, 1932, three weeks after the first visit, the papers were again taken to the Zapatas and submitted to Mr. and Mrs. Zapata. There were present at this meeting besides Mr. and Mrs. Zapata, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. E. B. Hughes, a notary public. The papers were again read to Mr. and Mrs. Zapata, translated by Mr. Fitzgerald as before, and were signed and executed, and the deed and agreement acknowledged before the notary by Mr. and Mrs. Zapata. They were then delivered to Mr. Fitzgerald, who, in accordance with said letter of instructions, was to hold the deed and send the agreement to the Board of Missions. On July 7, 1932, Mr. Zapata died. On December 8, 1932, the Board of Missions executed and acknowledged the agreement, and it was returned to Mr. Fitzgerald, who delivered it to Mrs. Zapata on January 3, 1933, the deed having been recorded on December 31, 1932. On November 14, 1935, Mrs. Zapata died and this action was instituted a short time thereafter by the executor of her last will and testament. The trial court made findings and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants, the Board of Missions and J. H. Fitzgerald, have appealed.

In support of the judgment it is first contended by the respondent that Mr. and Mrs. Zapata made a joint offer or proposal, which was intended to be accepted, if at all, during their joint lives, and that as the offer was not accepted until after the death of Mr. Zapata, the acceptance was ineffectual for any purpose.

[1] The deed executed by the Zapatas in favor of the Board of Missions was not a strict deed of gift, but on the other hand it was a conveyance to the board in part at least in consideration of the board's agreement to supervise and, under certain contingencies, to finance the education for the ministry of the youth Antonio. The agreement of May 14, 1932, after reciting the fact that the Zapatas had conveyed the real property to the Board of Missions, continues:

"Whereas, the parties of the second part (the Zapatas) desire that Antonio Alberto Zapata (born July 19, 1925, and a relative of the grantors) should be properly educated for the ministry in the event he is called, and when he arrives at the age of discretion desires to prepare himself for said calling; and

"Whereas, the parties of the second part desire the party of the first part (the Board of Missions) to supervise said education in the event they should die before said education shall have been completed,

"Now Therefore, It Is Agreed by and between the parties, as follows:

"(1) That during the life of the parties of the second part, or the survivor of them, the entire obligation for the education of said Antonio Alberto Zapata shall rest upon the parties of the second part, exclusively.

"(2) In the event the parties of the second part should die before the education of the said Antonio Alberto Zapata shall have been completed, the party of the first part agrees to supervise the ministerial education of the said Antonio Alberto Zapata, if he should desire to become a minister, and will expend at least fifty per cent of the net income derived from the property herein described and this day conveyed to the party of the first part, but shall not be compelled to expend upon the education of said Antonio Alberto Zapata any sum in excess of fifty per cent of the net income derived from said property, and the party of the first part shall be the sole judge of the school or schools in which the said Antonio Alberto Zapata shall be educated, and the amount that shall be expended upon his education.

"(3) In the event the said Antonio Alberto Zapata shall have reached the age of maturity, or his education shall have been completed prior to the death of the survivor of the parties of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be under no obligation to expend any sum on the education of the said Antonio Alberto Zapata, or for any other purpose, and may use the entire income for its own purposes.

"(4) In the event it shall become necessary for the parties of the second part, or the survivor of them, to sell said property or any portion of it for the purpose of purchasing the necessaries of life, but not otherwise, the party of the first part agrees to consent to said sale and to join in the execution of a quitclaim deed conveying said property so sold to the purchaser; provided, however, in the event of such sale, the party of the first part reserves the option to cancel this agreement upon conveying by quitclaim deed to the parties of the second part, or the survivor of them, the remainder of said property, if any."

Evidently each of the Zapatas was interested in the education of the youth Antonio, and the offer they made to convey said real property was at least in part consideration of the promise of the board to supervise his education. They each therefore received some benefit from the consideration under said grant deed.

"Where all the parties who unite in a promise receive some benefit from the consideration, whether past or present, their promise is presumed to be joint and several." Civil Code § 1659.

[2] There is not one word of evidence in this case that the offer of the Zapatas to convey their property was a joint offer. In the absence of such evidence, the presumption stated in the above section must control. Gummer v. Mairs, 140 Cal. 535, 537, 74 P. 26; County of Los Angeles v. Luscher, 58 Cal.App. 632, 634, 209 P. 899.

[3] But even if it were a joint offer, it is well settled in this state that the death or release of one joint obligor does not release the other. Civil Code § 1543; Bee v. Cooper, 217 Cal. 96, 101, 17 P.2d 740; Harrier v. Bassford, 145 Cal. 529, 533, 78 P. 1038; Elizalde v. Murphy, 146 Cal. 168, 171, 79 P. 866. This rule is peculiarly applicable in this case where the property was held in joint tenancy, and upon the death of Mr. Zapata, the title to the whole of the property became vested in Mrs. Zapata.

[4] Further reliance is placed by respondent in support of said judgment upon the finding of the trial court that the offer or proposal of the Zapatas "was contingent upon the same being accepted and the said proposed agreement executed by the defendant church in any event prior to the death of either the said Zapata or his said wife."

We fail to find any evidence in the record before us in support of this finding. The matter was not discussed by any of the parties present on the occasion when the papers were executed by the Zapatas, or on the prior occasion when the papers were presented to them, or on any other occasion when the question of said conveyance was being discussed. The evidence does show that Mr. Zapata made frequent mention to different members of the church of the wish of himself and wife to deed the property to the church, but on none of these occasions was any reference made to the matters embraced within the finding above quoted.

[5, 6] The court further found that the lapse of over six months between the offer or proposal and the date of the assumed acceptance thereof was unreasonable and therefore "said offer or proposal on behalf of said Zapata and wife, and each of them, was prior to the 8th day of December, 1932, (the date the Board of Missions executed and acknowledged the agreement) revoked * * * by the lapse of a reasonable time without communication of acceptance or acceptance of said offer or proposal by defendant church". Conceding that the question as to what was a reasonable time was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court, the delay of the Board of Missions in accepting the offer of the Zapatas might have furnished legal grounds for Mrs. Zapata to have declined to accept the written agreement of the board. However, she made no objection to the delay, received the agreement and gave to Mr. Fitzgerald her written receipt for the same. She thereby waived the right to complain of said delay. Parry v. Campbell, 72 Cal.App. 748, 753, 238 P. 127. The Zapatas knew that the deed would have to be sent to the Board of Missions at Nashville, Tennessee, and that the board would have to be satisfied with the character of the property conveyed to it before it would sign the agreement and accept the deed. There is absolutely no showing that Mrs. Zapata suffered any damage by the delay or that she expressed any dissatisfaction that the agreement was not delivered to her at an earlier date than that on which she received it.

[7] The court further found that after the death of Mr. Zapata "Mrs. Zapata was ignorant of her rights in connection with said transaction and repeatedly demanded of and from defendant Fitzgerald the return to her of the said proposed deed and agreement and information concerning her said rights, but to return the same or to truthfully inform her concerning her said rights, said defendant did not, but to the contrary, upon defendant church assuming to execute said proposed agreement, did assume to deliver said purported deed to defendant church and the same was recorded, as hereinbefore set forth, and during the remainder of the life of said Erolinda Moreno Zapata, and until her death on the 14th of November, 1935, the defendant Fitzgerald, as agent for defendant church corporation, and with the full knowledge, acquiescence and/or ratification of defendant church, and well knowing of her said ignorance in respect to her rights in connection with the matter and of her hereinbefore mentioned inability to read or write or converse in the English language, did designedly deceive and mislead her concerning her right of ownership of said real property free and clear from the effect of said purported deed and purported agreement and did designedly deceive and mislead her concerning her rights in connection with said transaction and the meaning of the language used in the said purported agreement and/or the effect on said transaction of the death of said Zapata and/or lapse of time intervening between said offer and attempted acceptance thereof by said church and did designedly prevent her from consulting any other person in regard to said foregoing matters, and as a result thereof, the court finds that the said Erolinda Moreno Zapata was misled and deceived thereby and never knew her rights in connection with said transaction and by reason thereof, during her lifetime, was prevented from taking any legal action for the protection and/or enforcement of her rights in connection with said transaction and/or said real property, and by reason thereof the court finds that the said Erolinda Moreno Zapata was not barred or estopped during her lifetime either by laches or the Statutes of Limitations or otherwise or at all from taking or commencing any appropriate legal action for the protection of her rights therein, and obtaining cancellation of said purported agreement and purported deed and/or obtaining a reconveyance of said real property to her."

We have searched the record in this case from one end to the other for the evidence to support this finding or some portion thereof, and as a result of our efforts we are compelled to say that there is a complete dearth of any evidence which directly or indirectly supports this finding, or any statement therein contained. When Mr. Fitzgerald received the agreement after its execution and acknowledgment by the Board of Missions, he gave it to Mrs. Zapata and recorded the deed in accordance with the written instructions given him at the time the deed was executed by Mr. and Mrs. Zapata. No question was raised at that time by Mrs. Zapata or by any other person as to the effect of the death of her husband, or the lapse of time between the execution of the deed and the return of the agreement by the Board of Missions. Mr. Fitzgerald was not a lawyer, and no claim is made that he had any misgivings as to the legal effect of the death of Mr. Zapata or the lapse of time upon the delivery of the deed and agreement. The matter was not discussed between him and Mrs. Zapata in any shape, form or manner. She accepted the agreement and signed a receipt therefor without a word of protest, and was perfectly satisfied with the whole transaction at that time. There was no attempt to deceive nor was there any deception, for neither Mrs. Zapata nor Mr. Fitzgerald had any thought that either the death of Mr. Zapata or the delay in the execution and delivery of the agreement would have any effect upon the validity of the deed.

[8] The same positive statement may be made in regard to the finding that Mr. Fitzgerald prevented Mrs. Zapata from consulting any other persons in regard to these matters. Mrs. Zapata had a copy of the agreement defining her rights in this transaction. She was free to submit this agreement to any person whom she might choose to consult. She had her friends. She attended church regularly and associated with her friends and acquaintances both inside and outside the church, and had ample opportunity to seek advice where and when and from whom she wished. Furthermore, there is not one word of evidence in this whole record that Mr. Fitzgerald ever directly or indirectly asked, or even suggested to her, that she should not consult others or seek advice from them respecting this or any other business matter in which she was interested. On one occasion when she was worrying about her property, a friend said to her, "Get the papers and I will have my friend read them and take them to an attorney and see what it is". This friend, who was a Spanish teacher, was called in and told Mrs. Zapata "what he would do." But instead of submitting the matter to an attorney, as she was entirely free to do, she called Mr. Fitzgerald, with the result that the matter was dropped.

Mrs. Zapata was apparently entirely satisfied with the conveyance she and her husband had made to the Board of Missions, at the time she received the agreement from Mr. Fitzgerald and for some considerable time thereafter. She subsequently, however, for some reason not clearly appearing from the evidence, began to worry about her property. Whether she was dissatisfied with the original transfer of the property to the board or whether she wished her property returned to her for other reasons, we are unable to determine. That she wanted her property back is clear, but the reason on which she based her demand is not clear.

[9, 10] As to the conveyance which she and her husband executed to the Board of Missions, we have already stated the circumstances surrounding and leading up to said transaction. That she thoroughly understood the purpose and effect of the deed by herself and husband to the Board of Missions is shown by the undisputed testimony of those present on that occasion. Both Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Reynolds, the latter then presiding elder of the church, understood and spoke the Spanish language, and they each testified that the contents of the deed, the agreement and the letter to Mr. Fitzgerald were correctly translated and explained to Mrs. Zapata before she executed them. That Mr. Fitzgerald's translation and explanation of the papers was honest and correct is further shown, we think, by the execution of these papers by Mr. Zapata. He was a Spanish teacher and was thoroughly familiar with both the Spanish and English languages, and was present during the entire time when the papers were being interpreted and explained to Mrs. Zapata. Without the assistance of an interpreter, he knew the contents of the documents before signing them. He, of course, above all others was interested in having his wife protected in this transaction, and it is unbelievable that he would have executed the papers if any misrepresentation had been made by Mr. Fitzgerald to Mrs. Zapata as to the contents and meaning of the documents she was to sign. She therefore assented to the transaction with full knowledge of what she was doing, and consequently had no legal right thereafter to complain of the conveyance of the property to the Board of Missions, or to ask that it be returned to her.

[11] Under subdivision (4) of the agreement it was provided that in case it became necessary for her to sell the property conveyed by her and her husband, or any portion thereof, for the purpose of purchasing the necessaries of life, the Board of Missions agreed to execute a quitclaim deed conveying the property so sold to the purchaser. Under this provision of the agreement she would have been entitled to a quitclaim deed in favor of a purchaser in case it was necessary for her to sell any portion of the property in order to provide her with the necessaries of life. It may have been and probably was under this right reserved in her favor, that she "wanted her property back". Aside from the fact that she found no purchaser for any part of the property, and therefore it was impossible for the Board of Missions to execute a quitclaim deed, as provided in said agreement, even if any had been demanded, there is no substantial showing that she was at any appreciable length of time in need of the necessaries of life. She on one occasion went "to the relief station to get help" and "secured something". Mr. Fitzgerald at her request went with her for the purpose of interpreting for her. Just how long she received help from the relief station is not shown; neither does it appear when she made this application for help, nor is it shown anywhere that she was in actual need of help at that or at any other time. When she was taken to the hospital in September, 1935, some two months before her death, she had $50 in money on her person, $185 in the savings bank account, and she had been receiving the rentals from the property ever since the death of her husband, which the plaintiff in this case testified were $125 per month. The evidence further shows that she paid no taxes on the property for a year before her death, so that she had practically the entire income from the rentals. The only condition under which she was entitled to a quitclaim deed to the purchaser in case she sold the property, or any part thereof, was that she should be in need of the necessaries of life; and as there is no evidence that she was in that state, there was no obligation upon the part of the Board of Missions, even if a purchaser had been found and demand had been made, to execute a quitclaim deed to said purchaser, or to have her property given back.

[12] A short time prior to her death Mrs. Zapata secured the services of a firm of attorneys. She was then in the hospital, but in full possession of mental faculties. These attorneys prepared a will in which the plaintiff herein was appointed as her executor. She evidently laid before her attorneys her grievances against the Board of Missions and the reason why she wanted her property back. As a result of this conference between her and her attorneys, the latter prepared a draft of a grant deed by the Board of Missions to Mrs. Zapata of the property which she and her husband had conveyed to the board. This draft of the deed was forwarded to the Board of Missions at its principal place of business at Nashville, Tennessee, accompanied by a letter containing the following statement:

"Mrs. Zapata is ill on her back in the hospital greatly in need of funds and inasmuch as the purpose of this agreement, i. e., providing for the education of the boy as a Protestant Minister, has failed, the boy having returned to his Catholic father, we are asking that you execute the enclosed deed conveying the properties to Mrs. Zapata in order that she may raise sufficient money to properly care for and maintain herself. Please send the deed to me when it has been executed."

From this letter we might rightly infer that the burden of Mrs. Zapata's claim for wanting her property back was that the "purpose of this agreement i. e., providing for the education of the boy as a Protestant Minister, has failed." No claim was then made that any unfair or fraudulent advantage had been taken of her by anyone in the procuring of the deed, or that she did not understand the contents of the papers when she signed them, or that she was then so greatly in need of the "necessaries of life" as to be entitled to a quitclaim deed to the property in favor of any purchaser.

It is true that the letter states that Mrs. Zapata was greatly in need of funds, but the demand for the deed was not placed on that ground, evidently for the reason that she then had $185 in the bank and was receiving the rentals from the property.

The material parts of the agreement, and particularly those parts referring to the education of the boy Antonio, are set forth above. A mere reading of these paragraphs of the agreement shows that they contain nothing which would justify the demand for a reconveyance of the property on the ground expressed in said letter. It might be well to state here, although the matter is of slight importance, that the boy Antonio was living with Mr. and Mrs. Zapata at the time the deed and other papers were executed. He was then about nine years old. At the time of the trial, December, 1936, he was being educated, with the consent of his father, under the direction of the Board of Missions in the Lydia Patterson Institute at El Paso, Texas. Evidently, the Board of Missions was carrying out its agreement in respect to the boy's education.

[13] Although the complaint alleged fraud on the part of the appellants in inducing the execution of the agreement, deed and letter of instructions to Mr. Fitzgerald, the court made no finding to that effect, and our review of the record convinces us that there was no evidence which would have supported such a finding. While the documents were executed less than two months before the death of Mr. Zapata, their execution was in no sense a deathbed transaction. On the other hand, it was the consummation of a desire first expressed by Mr. Zapata two years before, and frequently repeated by him to various persons, until finally Mr. Reynolds at Mr. Zapata's urgent solicitation, took the matter in hand and had the necessary papers prepared. It cannot be claimed that there was any undue haste on the part of any of the parties interested in the transfer of the property to the Board of Missions. It was the Zapatas, and not the Board of Missions, that insisted on the transaction being closed. A further circumstance evidencing the fact that the transaction was not a case where overzealous persons wrung from a dying man on his deathbed, as contended by respondent, a conveyance of his property, is that when the papers were first taken to the Zapata home and due to a suggestion of Mrs. Zapata, a correction was to be made in the terms of the agreement, they were not again taken to the Zapatas until three weeks after the first occasion.

The entire transaction from the beginning to the end was marked with due deliberation and every opportunity was given to Mr. and Mrs. Zapata to exercise their independent judgment before acting in the matter. The record is free from any evidence that any fraud or undue influence was practiced upon them or either of them to induce them to make the conveyance of their property to the Board of Missions. The findings leading to a contrary conclusion are unsupported by the evidence. For this reason the judgment should be and is reversed.

MARLOW et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

Sac. 5429.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 17, 1941.

1. Descent and distribution ⇐40

Where deceased left neither issue, spouse, parent, brother, sister nor descendant of deceased brother or sister, first cousins of deceased were entitled to take his estate to the exclusion of the children of the cousins' deceased sister. Probate Code, §§ 226, 253.

2. Certiorari ⇐60

Where even if all of petitioners' allegations were true, they had no beneficial interest in deceased's estate, motion to dismiss petition for writ of certiorari to set aside default entered against petitioners in heirship proceeding was granted. Probate Code, §§ 226, 253; Code Civ.Proc. § 1069.

Certiorari proceedings by Charles Donald Marlow and others against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles to have set aside a default entered against the petitioners by the Superior Court in the heirship proceeding in the estate of Michael F. O'Dea, deceased. On motion to dismiss.

Motion granted and certiorari proceeding dismissed.

Harry N. Dyke, of Rio Vista, for petitioners.

J. H. O'Connor, Co. Counsel, and J. F. Moroney, Deputy Co. Counsel (Salisbury, Robinson & Himrod, Faries & McDowell, Bailie, Turner & Lake, Freston & Files, Wayne R. Hackett, and Charles A. Loring, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

CARTER, Justice.

A writ of certiorari was granted by this court to consider another problem arising out of the heirship proceeding in the estate of Michael F. O'Dea, deceased. Respondent demurred to the petition and moved to dismiss the writ. The facts regarding the estate and the heirship proceeding generally are fully set out in Estate of O'Dea, Cal.Sup., 104 P.2d 368, and Henry J. O'Day and Genevieve O'Day Jensen v. Superior Court et al., Cal.Sup., 108 P.2d 889 (rehearing granted) and need not be related in any detail here.

The pertinent facts necessary to reach a decision in the instant case are as follows: The petitioners here filed a statement of heirship on March 21, 1940. Previous to this date, viz., on July 25, 1939, the superior court, in the estate of O'Dea, had made an order of default against "* * * all claimants who have not at this date appeared or entered petitions to determine heirship. * * *" On April 15, 1940, a motion to strike petitioners' statement of heirship was granted. On July 22, 1940, petitioners' motion to set aside the default above referred to and for permission to file a petition to determine heirship was denied by the superior court. Petitioners now, on writ of certiorari, ask this court to set aside the default entered against them.

[1] The petitioners' statement of heirship, as disclosed by the record herein, shows that they are claiming as children of one Elizabeth O'Day Marlow, deceased, who, in turn, was the daughter of one Michael O'Day, deceased. This Michael O'Day was the uncle of Michael F. O'Day, deceased, whose estate is now being administered in Los Angeles County. It is also shown on the face of petitioners' statement of heirship that two children of Michael O'Day (the grandfather of petitioners'), viz., Henry J. O'Day and Genevieve O'Day Jensen, are still living. From the "Genealogical Tree" attached to the petition or statement of heirship it is also shown that Michael F. O'Dea, deceased, left neither issue, spouse, parent, brother, sister nor descendant of a deceased brother or sister. Therefore, any claim of heirship made by petitioners, if their allegations are true, would necessarily fall under section 226 of the Probate Code. That section provides, in part, that "* * * the estate goes to the next of kin in equal degree, excepting that, when there are two or more collateral kindred in equal degree, but claiming through different ancestors, those who claim through the nearest ancestor must be preferred to those claiming through an ancestor more remote." But under the phrase "next of kin in equal degree, * * *" as defined by section 253 of the Probate Code and as interpreted by the cases of Estate of Nigro, 172 Cal. 474, 156 P. 1019, and Estate of Moore, 162 Cal. 324, 122 P. 844, Henry J. O'Day and Genevieve O'Day Jensen, as first cousins of Michael F. O'Dea, deceased, would take to the exclusion of petitioners. It is true that the above-cited cases interpreted subdivision 5 of Civil Code section 1386, which has since been re-enacted as Probate Code section 226 and the phrase "nor descendant of a deceased brother or sister, * * *" has been added. But that addition does not affect the interpretation as applied to the instant case because there are no descendants of deceased brother or sister involved here. The situation here is identical with Estate of Moore, supra, which held that a cousin was excluded by living nephews and nieces, with the exception that here the relationship of all parties is more remote.

[2] Section 1069 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that only a person beneficially interested may petition for a writ of certiorari. From the above discussion it may be seen that, even if all petitioners' allegations are true, they have no beneficial interest in the Estate of Michael F. O'Dea, deceased. This being true the motion to dismiss this petition for writ of certiorari must be granted. Ashe v. Board of Supervisors, 71 Cal. 236, 16 P. 783.

The motion to dismiss is granted and the proceeding dismissed.

AMES et al. v. EMPIRE STAR MINES CO., Ltd., et al.

Sac. 5246.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 31, 1941.

As Modified Feb. 6, 1941.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1941.

1. Mines and minerals ⇐15, 31(1)

Congress intended by the Mining Act of July 26, 1866, to recognize and give legal validity to all existing mining claims in accordance with local rules, customs, and regulations, including extralateral rights in those lands to which the rules and regulations applied. Act Cong. July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. 251.

2. Mines and minerals ⇐31(1)

Where mine owners located and mined vein running extralaterally under plaintiffs' land before passage of the Mining Act of July 26, 1866, they acquired legal title to those extralateral rights, provided the rights had not been previously conveyed away by the government, since the Mining Act could not operate to divest private owners of existing vested rights. Act Cong. July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. 251.

3. Public lands ⇐78

Under the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, which specifically excepted from its operation all mineral lands, Congress did not intend to vest in a grantee railroad title to any mineral lands of the United States. Act Cong. July 25, 1866, 14 Stat. 239.

4. Mines and minerals ⇐31(1)
Public lands ⇐78

The mineral subsurface of plaintiffs' land could not pass under the terms of the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, which specifically excepted all mineral lands from its operation, but it remained in the government, and mine owners who located and mined vein running extralaterally under plaintiffs' land before passage of the Mining Act of July 26, 1866, received full extralateral rights to mine therein by virtue of that act. Act Cong. July 25, 1866, 14 Stat. 239; Act Cong. July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. 251.

5. Public lands ⇐78

The Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, when it excepted mineral lands from its operation meant that title to all mineral lands should remain in the United States and that no rights to such lands could in any way pass to the grantee railroad, and that act alone cannot be the source of title to any mineral lands. Act Cong. July 25, 1866, 14 Stat. 239.

6. Public lands ⇐114(2)

A patent issued to railroad in 1880 by virtue of the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, could legally affect only nonmineral lands, and the theory which relates title back to the date of the act could not extend to all mineral lands excepted from the act in express terms, and hence title to such mineral lands could be acquired as against railroad after enactment of the act and at any time up to the date of the patent. Act Cong. July 25, 1866, 14 Stat. 239.

7. Public lands ⇐114(2)

The government cannot convey away lands which it no longer owns, and a patent cannot cut off previously existing vested rights in the patented property.

8. Public lands ⇐114(2)

Where patent secured by railroad in 1880 was issued under authority of the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, it could in no way apply to mineral land, title to which had been previously vested in others, and any authority it might acquire in the passage of time with respect to the nature of the land despite the limitations of the act could operate only against subsequently located claims. Act Cong. July 25, 1866, 14 Stat. 239.

9. Public lands ⇐114(2)

Where patent secured by railroad in 1880 and issued under authority of the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, which specifically excepted from its operation all mineral lands, determined that plaintiffs' land was agricultural land, patent applied only to surface of land and to that portion of the subsurface not already subject to existing extralateral rights, and whatever claims plaintiffs advanced to subsurface mineral lands would have to date from issuance of patent and not from date of act, and hence extralateral rights of mine owners who located and mined vein running extralaterally under plaintiffs' land before passage of the Mining Act of July 25, 1866, had already fully vested by virtue of that act when patent was issued. Act Cong. July 25, 1866, 14 Stat. 239; Act Cong. July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. 251.

10. Public lands ⇐52

Where land in question was still unsurveyed and sections of land to be granted still undetermined when 1853 federal act expressly excepting all mineral lands made a grant of certain sections of each township to the state for school purposes, no title could pass from the United States to the state to land determined to be mineral following survey in 1867, and mineral subsurface then subject to vested extralateral rights of adjoining mines could not pass to the state under the terms of the grant. Act Cong. March 3, 1853, 10 Stat. 244.

11. Public lands ⇐106(4)

Even if certification by the registrar of the United States Land Office on March 7, 1871, that there was no claim or filing on school land other than that of the state had the effect of a patent establishing the complete title of the state, its determination could be effective only against subsequently located mining claims and not against existing vested extralateral rights therein. Act Cong. March 3, 1853, 10 Stat. 244.

12. Mines and minerals ⇐31(1)

A mining patent issued in 1880 pursuant to the Mining Act of July 26, 1866, on the basis of an earlier location could not be limited by the Mining Act of 1872 which restricted future mining claims asserting extralateral rights to a maximum of 1,500 feet along the vein. Act Cong. July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. 251; 30 U.S.C.A. § 23.

13. Mines and minerals ⇐44

Where an additional length of mining claim asserting extralateral rights results from the consolidation of several original claims, the lines of the original claims need not be shown to establish the validity of an existing patent to the consolidated claim on collateral attack.

14. Mines and minerals ⇐55(7)

Where deed to plaintiffs from their immediate predecessor in title specifically reserved to predecessor, his successors, and assigns the right to follow a particular vein beneath plaintiffs' land and to mine therefrom, and by mesne conveyances defendants succeeded to predecessor's rights under that reservation, defendants had the right to follow the vein beneath the surface of plaintiffs' land.

15. Mines and minerals ⇐23(5)

Title to a mining claim does not terminate upon failure to perform manual labor, but the intervention of a third party and a relocation of the ground must occur before any forfeiture can take place.

16. Mines and minerals ⇐26

Where deed to plaintiffs from their immediate predecessor in title specifically reserved to predecessor, his successors, and assigns the right to follow a vein beneath plaintiffs' land and to mine therefrom, and by mesne conveyances defendants succeeded to predecessor's rights under that reservation, plaintiffs were precluded from taking advantage of any forfeiture and subsequent relocation of that claim.

17. Boundaries ⇐35(2)

The original location of a mine, particularly on government land, is within the scope of the exception to the hearsay rule that evidence of common reputation existing previous to the controversy may be introduced to prove the existence of boundaries and facts of a public or general interest more than 30 years old. Code Civ.Proc. § 1870.

18. Evidence ⇐333(1), 372(10)

Recitals in ancient deeds and statements in official documents kept as part of the regular function of the office by some department of the government or authorized by the legislature are admissible in evidence under an exception to the hearsay rule. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1920, 1924.

19. Evidence ⇐333(7)

Patent records containing abstracts of title to mining claims, recitals concerning location of claims in ancient deeds, verified statements concerning location and possession of mines, copy of articles of incorporation of early mining corporation, certified copy of minutes of meetings of miners, descriptions of claims by metes and bounds, registrar's final certificate of entry of patent, and field notes of survey and report of United States deputy mineral surveyor were "records kept in the usual course of business" by the General Land Office and were admissible as "official documents" to prove proper location and existence of mining claims. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1920, 1924.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Official Documents" and "Records Kept in the Usual Course of Business".

20. Evidence ⇐325

The official report of mineral resources of the public domain of the west published under the direct authority of Congress as an official report to the Secretary of the Treasury was an "official document" the contents of which were admissible to show the location and working of mines in pursuance to miners' rules and regulations then in existence. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1870, 1920, 1924.

21. Boundaries ⇐35(2)
Evidence ⇐361

Locations of mining claims could be proven by evidence of general reputation previous to the controversy, and hence defendants could introduce the History of Yuba County by Chamberlain and Wells (1879) for that purpose. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1870, 1936.

CARTER, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Warren Steel, Judge.

Suit by Worthington Ames and another against Empire Star Mines Company, Limited, and others, for an injunction to prevent defendants from following and mining a certain vein beneath the surface of plaintiffs' land and for an accounting of minerals previously extracted. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

This controversy is between the owners of mining property, known as the Pennsylvania and Jefferson mines, upon whose land there is the outcropping of a gold-bearing quartz vein, and the owners of non-mineral surface land, known as the Ames tract, beneath the surface of which this vein dips. The latter, as plaintiffs, brought suit for an injunction to prevent defendants, the owners of the Pennsylvania and Jefferson mines, from following and mining this vein some 500 to 1,000 feet beneath the surface of the plaintiffs' land, and for an accounting of minerals previously extracted. Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment of the superior court in favor of defendants.

The controversy turns upon the priority of title to the subsurface of the plaintiffs' land. Defendant mine owners claim the right to mine extralaterally beneath the plaintiffs' land by virtue of the Mining Act of Congress of July 26, 1866, 14 U.S.Stat. A.L. 251, which recognized and legalized the right of miners, in accordance with existing miners' rules and regulations, to follow a vein which had its apex upon the surface of their land as it dipped down extralaterally beneath the surface of adjoining government land. Plaintiffs trace their title back to the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, 14 U.S.Stat.A.L. 239, by which congress provided for land grants to the California and Oregon Railroad, later the Central Pacific Railroad, but expressly excepted mineral lands from the terms of the act. Plaintiffs contend that since this act was passed one day earlier than the Mining Act, the railroad received a fee simple title to the entire tract, surface and subsurface, so that the Mining Act passed the next day could in no way operate to confer upon the owners of adjoining mines the right to mine extralaterally beneath the land granted to the railroad.

On June 14, 1880, the Central Pacific Railroad, pursuant to its legislative grant, secured a patent to the Ames tract which transformed it from a "float" to an established title by the definite location of the railroad line. The patent stated that the Ames tract was agricultural land, and plaintiffs contend that this patent conclusively determined the character of the land as nonmineral, and related the title back to the date of the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866. A patent to the Pennsylvania claim was secured by the defendants' predecessors in interest on August 18, 1880, pursuant to the Mining Act of July 26, 1866. In 1872, congress passed another act relating to mines which provided that a mining claim, to secure extralateral rights, could equal but not exceed 1,500 feet along the vein or lode. 17 Stat. 91, § 2, 30 U.S.C.A. § 23. Plaintiffs assert that since the defendants' patent was secured subsequent to the passage of this act, it is subject to the provisions thereof, and therefore that the owners of the Pennsylvania claim, which is 1,540 feet along the vein or lode, are precluded from claiming any extralateral rights. No patent was ever secured to the Jefferson claim, which was apparently located at the same time as the Pennsylvania claim, abandoned, and subsequently relocated. The defendants show that they now in effect have full title to it. They also present in evidence the deed of the Ames tract to the plaintiffs from one Ebert, the immediate predecessor in title, which contains a reservation by him, as grantor, of the right to follow the Jefferson vein beneath the surface of the Ames tract and to mine therefrom. This right was subsequently conveyed by Ebert to the defendants.

Between the Ames tract and the Pennsylvania and Jefferson mines there is a narrow strip of school land granted to the state of California under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1853, 10 U.S.Stats.A.L. 244, and this grant also excepted mineral lands from its terms. Subsequent to its final survey in 1867, part of this land was conveyed to the defendants, the residue remaining in the hands of the state as school land. Plaintiffs contend that the state acquired a fee simple in this land, including the subsurface, so that defendants could have no extralateral rights therein and were thus effectively cut off from the Ames tract.

Defendants have presented evidence in the form of testimony of old settlers, abstracts of title, patent records, deeds, and government reports and surveys to prove the original location of both the Pennsylvania and Jefferson claims in accordance with the miners' rules and regulations prior to 1863; the working of these claims, including the subsurface of the Ames tract, prior to 1866; the securing of a patent to the Pennsylvania mine in 1880, with a continuous chain of title to this mine culminating in the present defendants; and the securing of full rights by defendants as against all existing claims on the Jefferson mine.

Plaintiffs contend, however, that defendants have not properly established the original location of the Pennsylvania and Jefferson claims, nor compliance by their predecessors in title with the miners' rules and regulations necessary to secure extralateral rights, nor what the rules and regulations were, maintaining that most of the evidence introduced by the defendants in these regards is inadmissible as hearsay.

[1, 2] It is clear that congress intended by the Mining Act of July 26, 1866, to recognize and give legal validity to all existing mining claims in accordance with local rules, customs, and regulations, including extralateral rights in those lands to which said rules and regulations applied. Lindley Mines, 3d Ed., §§ 40–46; Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U.S. 453, 25 L.Ed. 240; St. Louis Smelting Company v. Kemp, 104 U.S. 636, 26 L.Ed. 875; Morton v. Solambo C. M. Co., 26 Cal. 527. According to defendants' evidence the Pennsylvania and Jefferson mines clearly fall within the compass of the act, for prior to its passage their owners located and mined the vein running extralaterally under the Ames land. Under the act they acquired legal title to such extralateral rights provided such rights had not been previously conveyed away by the government, for the Mining Act could not, of course, operate to divest private owners of existing vested rights. Lindley, Mines, 3d Ed., § 611; Amador Medean Gold M. Co. v. South Spring Hill Gold M. Co., C.C., 36 F. 668; Davis v. Weibbold, 139 U.S. 507, 11 S.Ct. 628, 35 L.Ed. 238.

The plaintiffs contend that the government had previously conveyed away such rights. They cite the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, enacted one day earlier than the Mining Act, which conferred upon the California and Oregon Railroad, later the Central Pacific Railroad, title to land over which the railroad agreed to construct a line in the future. They argue that since in pursuance to this act the Central Pacific Railroad did locate on certain land, including the Ames tract, and secure a patent thereto, the full title in fee simple passed to the railroad as of July 25, 1866, and they regard the legal title as having accrued from that date. Wisconsin Central R. R. Co. v. Price County, 133 U.S. 496, 10 S.Ct. 341, 33 L.Ed. 687; Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, 142 U.S. 241, 12 S.Ct. 158, 35 L. Ed. 999; Jatunn v. Smith, 95 Cal. 154, 30 P. 200. It is their contention that the full title to the Ames tract was conveyed away prior to the passage of the Mining Act of July 26, 1866, so that the latter could in no way confer upon the adjoining mines extralateral rights in the Ames tract.

[3, 4] This argument might seem persuasive except for one vital factor. The Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, upon which the plaintiffs rely for their original title, specifically excepted from its operation all mineral lands. The terms of the act make it clear that congress did not intend to vest in the railroad title to any mineral lands of the United States. Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., 154 U.S. 288, 14 S.Ct. 1030, 38 L.Ed. 992; United States v. Sweet, 245 U.S. 563, 38 S.Ct. 193, 62 L. Ed. 473; Broder v. Natoma Water Co., 101 U.S. 274, 25 L.Ed. 790; Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Sanders, 166 U.S. 620, 17 S.Ct. 671, 41 L.Ed. 1139; McClintock v. Bryden et al., 5 Cal. 97, 63 Am.Dec. 87. The subsurface of the Ames tract being clearly mineral could not pass under the terms of the act but remained in the government, and the Pennsylvania and Jefferson mines received full extralateral rights to mine therein by virtue of the Mining Act of July 26, 1866. (Ibid.)

Plaintiffs cite Davis v. Weibbold, supra, and Amador-Medean Gold Mining Company v. South Spring Hill Gold Mining Co., supra, to uphold their proposition that the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, passed full title to the railroad at that time as against any subsequently accruing mining claims. These cases, however, hold only that at the time of final and definite location of agricultural or townsite land full title therein passes to the grantee as against any mineral rights not then known to exist but coming into being at a later time. In the present case there was no final and definite location of the Ames tract by the railroad until the securing of the patent in 1880. Under the act of July 25, 1866, it had merely a "floating grant" whereby it might secure title to land on which it subsequently located. When the Ames tract was finally and definitely located in 1880 its subsurface not only was known to be mineral but was subject to the vested extralateral rights of the adjoining mines. The holdings of the Amador-Medean and Davis cases thus clearly have no application here.

[5, 6] The patent which definitely located and established the railroad's claim stated that the Ames tract was agricultural land. Plaintiffs reason that this statement is conclusive as to the nature of the land since the time for coming in and attacking the patent has long since expired, and conclude that since the title to the land secured by the patent relates back to the date of the Railroad Grant Act, the full legal title to the Ames tract had vested in the railroad before the conferring of extralateral rights upon the mines. The act alone, however, cannot be the source of title to any mineral lands. As Justice Fields stated in Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., supra [154 U.S. 288, 14 S.Ct. 1031, 38 L.Ed. 992], the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, when it excepted mineral lands meant that title to all mineral lands was to remain in the United States, and no rights to such lands could in any way pass to the railroad. The patent issued to the railroad by virtue of the act can legally affect only nonmineral land, and the theory which relates the title back to the date of the act cannot extend to "all mineral lands" excepted from the act in express terms. It follows that title to such mineral lands could be acquired as against the railroad subsequent to the enactment of the Railroad Grant Act, and at any time up to the date of the patent. Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., supra; Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Sanders, supra.

[7] Hence, the contentions advanced by plaintiffs can be resolved into the theory that the patent to the railroad is conclusive as to the agricultural character of the land. In support thereof they cite Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 234 U.S. 669, 34 S.Ct. 907, 58 L.Ed. 1527; West v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U.S. 200, 49 S.Ct. 138, 73 L.Ed. 265; Davis v. Weibbold, supra. These cases, however, concern the rights of a mining claim coming into existence after the securing of the agricultural patent. They stand for the proposition that the patent is conclusive as to the character of the land as against mining claims subsequently located. Such a patent, however, issued merely on the basis of an ex parte hearing on behalf of the claimant to the land can in no way abrogate the existing vested extralateral rights of parties who had nothing to do with the proceedings. Lawson v. United States Mining Co., 207 U.S. 1, 16, 28 S.Ct. 15, 52 L.Ed. 65; United States Mining Co. v. Lawson, 8 Cir., 134 F. 769, 775, 776; Clark-Montana Co. v. Butte Co., D.C., 233 F. 547, 556; Butte Co. v. Clark-Montana Co., 9 Cir., 248 F. 609, 615; Lindley, Mines, 3d Ed., § 730, p. 1785. It is well established that the government cannot convey away land which it no longer owns and that a patent cannot cut off previously existing vested rights in the patented property. Reynolds v. Iron Silver Mining Company, 116 U.S. 687, 6 S.Ct. 601, 29 L.Ed. 774; Noyes v. Mantle, 127 U.S. 348, 353, 354, 8 S.Ct. 1132, 32 L.Ed. 168; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U.S. 488, 518–520, 7 S.Ct. 985, 30 L.Ed. 1039; Leavenworth, Lawrence & Galveston R. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U.S. 733, 23 L.Ed. 634; St. Louis Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U.S. 636, 641, 26 L.Ed. 875; Davis v. Weibbold, 139 U.S. 507, 518, 519, 11 S.Ct. 628, 35 L. Ed. 238. This principle is further supported by the California cases (Van Ness v. Rooney, 160 Cal. 131, 116 P. 392; Chicago Quartz M. Co. v. Oliver, 75 Cal. 194, 16 P. 780, 7 Am.St.Rep. 143; Brown v. Luddy, 121 Cal.App. 494, 9 P.2d 326) and by cases in other jurisdictions. Butte City Smokehouse Lode Cases, 6 Mont. 397, 401, 12 P.

858; Silver Bow M. & M. Co. v. Clark, 5 Mont. 378, 415, 5 P. 570; Talbott v. King, 6 Mont. 76, 9 P. 434; Kansas City Mining & Milling Co. v. Clay, 3 Ariz. 326, 29 P. 9; Loney v. Scott, 57 Or. 378, 112 P. 173, 32 L.R.A.,N.S., 466.

[8, 9] The patent secured by the railroad in 1880 was issued under the authority of the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, and could in no way apply to mineral land title to which had been previously vested in others. Any authority it might acquire in the passage of time as to the nature of the land, despite the limitations of the act, could operate only against subsequently located claims. Van Ness v. Rooney, supra; Brown v. Luddy, supra. Thus, the patent which determined that the Ames tract was agricultural applied only to the surface of the land and to that portion of the subsurface not already subject to existing extralateral rights. Lindley, Mines, 3d Ed., § 613, p. 1462. Whatever claims plaintiffs advance to the subsurface mineral land of the Ames tract would have to date from the issuance of the patent and not from the date of the Railroad Grant Act, and by the time of the issuance of the patent the extralateral rights of the Pennsylvania and Jefferson mines in the Ames tract had already fully vested by virtue of the Mining Act of July 26, 1866. There can be no objection to having the title to the surface in one person and the title to the subsurface in another, a practice recognized at common law and widely followed today. Lindley, Mines, 3d Ed., § 812.

[10] For the same reasons the state did not, as plaintiffs contend, acquire a fee simple to both the surface and subsurface of the strip of school land intervening between the Ames tract and the mining properties cutting off any extralateral rights the latter might claim in the former. When the act of March 3, 1853, (10 U.S.Stats.A.L. 244) made a grant of certain sections of each township to the state for school purposes, it expressly excepted all mineral lands. The land in question was still unsurveyed and the sections of land to be granted therefore still undetermined. Following the survey in 1867, no title could pass from the United States to the state to land determined to be mineral. West v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U.S. 200, 49 S.Ct. 138, 73 L.Ed. 265; United States v. Sweet, supra; Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., supra; Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Sanders, supra; Ivanhoe M. Co. v. Keystone M. Co., 102 U.S. 167, 175, 26 L.Ed. 126. The mineral subsurface, then subject to the vested extralateral rights of the adjoining mines, could therefore not pass to the state under the terms of the grant.

[11] Even if, as plaintiffs contend, the certification by the Registrar of the United States Land Office on March 7, 1871, that there was no claim or filing on this land other than that of the state had the effect of a patent establishing the complete title of the state, its determination could be effective only against subsequently located mining claims and not against existing vested extralateral rights therein. Saunders v. La Purisima, etc., Co., 125 Cal. 159, 57 P. 656, cited by plaintiffs concerned not only a subsequent claim but one with respect to the surface of the land. In contrast West v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U.S. 200, 49 S.Ct. 138, 73 L.Ed. 265, indicates that these certificates issued by the registrars of local land offices were unauthorized and of no binding effect.

[12, 13] Plaintiffs argue further that the Mining Act of 1872, by restricting future mining claims asserting extralateral rights to a maximum of 1,500 feet along the vein, precludes the patent to the Pennsylvania mine, secured at a later date, from encompassing extralateral rights based upon a greater length. The mining patent cannot thus be limited by that act, however, when issued in pursuance to the earlier act of July 26, 1866, on the basis of an earlier location. Lawson v. United States Min. Co., 207 U.S. 1, 28 S.Ct. 15, 52 L.Ed. 65; Carson City Min. Co. v. North Star Min. Co., C.C., 73 F. 597, affirmed 9 Cir., 83 F. 658; Pennsylvania Min. Co. v. Grass Valley Co., C.C., 117 F. 509. The plaintiffs themselves declare that a patent properly issued and in conformance with the provisions of an act of congress relates the title back to the date of that act. Furthermore, the additional length of the claim resulted from the consolidation of three original claims, the lines of which need not be shown to establish the validity of an existing patent to the consolidated claim on collateral attack. St. Louis Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U.S. 636, 26 L.Ed. 875; Tucker v. Masser, 113 U.S. 203, 5 S.Ct. 420, 28 L.Ed. 979; Peabody Gold Min. Co. v. Gold Hill Min. Co., 9 Cir., 111 F. 817.

[14] Defendants can establish their extralateral rights in the Ames tract as owners of the Jefferson mine as well as of the Pennsylvania mine. While the Jefferson mine was never patented and was subsequently abandoned and relocated so that it might be said to constitute a mining claim coming into existence after the issuance of the patent to the Central Pacific Railroad for the Ames tract (Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., supra), the deed of the Ames land to the present plaintiffs from Ebert, their immediate predecessory in title, specifically reserved to Ebert, his successors and assigns, the right to follow the Jefferson vein beneath the Ames land and to mine therefrom. By mesne conveyances, defendants succeeded to the rights of Ebert under this reservation, by virtue of which they clearly have the right to follow the vein of the Jefferson mine beneath the surface of the plaintiffs' land.

[15, 16] As for plaintiffs' contention that regular performance of annual labor is necessary to maintain a good title, it is well established that title to a mining claim does not terminate upon a failure to perform annual labor. The intervention of a third party and a relocation of the ground must occur before any forfeiture can take place. Lindley, Mines, § 651; Wilbur v. United States ex rel. Krushnic, 280 U.S. 306, 50 S.Ct. 103, 74 L.Ed. 445; Belcher Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Deferrari, 62 Cal. 160, 163; Emerson v. McWhirter, 133 Cal. 510, 65 P. 1036. Hence there are no grounds for attacking the validity of the Pennsylvania claim on this basis. The plaintiffs are precluded from taking advantage of any forfeiture and subsequent relocation of the Jefferson claim because of the reservation of mining rights in their deed to the Ames tract from Ebert.

It remains to consider plaintiffs' contention that the defendants have failed to prove the original location of the mining claims, their continued existence, compliance with the miners' rules and regulations, or what these rules and regulations were. The trial court found that the defendants' evidence established all these things; the question here turns on whether such evidence is hearsay as plaintiffs contend. Defendants introduced properly authenticated copies of deeds and other instruments now of record in the county recorder's office in Yuba county, patent records on file in the official records in the General Land Office in Washington, D. C., printed official reports of the "Mineral Resources" of the public domain of the west, published under authority of congress, and other historical material. This evidence was supplemented by the oral testimony of two old settlers that both the Pennsylvania and the Jefferson mines were in operation on the present location in the early 1860's. The case of Kent v. Snyder et al., 1866, 30 Cal. 666, which mentions in its statement of facts the location of the Jefferson claim by its original owners corroborates the existence of this claim prior to 1866.

[17, 18] It is a well established exception to the hearsay rule that evidence of common reputation existing previous to the controversy may be introduced to prove the existence of boundaries and facts of a public or general interest more than thirty years old. Code Civ.Proc. § 1870. The original location of a mine, particularly on government land, is within the scope of this exception (Muller v. Southern Pacific Branch Ry. Co., 83 Cal. 240, 23 P. 265; Simons v. Inyo Cerro Gordo, etc., Co., 48 Cal.App. 524, 192 P. 144.) Recitals in ancient deeds (Wilson v. Snow, 228 U.S. 217, 33 S.Ct. 487, 57 L.Ed. 807, 50 L.R.A., N.S., 604; Gabarino v. Noce, 181 Cal. 125, 183 P. 532, 6 A.L.R. 1433), and statements in official documents kept as part of the regular function of the office by some department of the government or authorized by the legislature are likewise recognized exceptions to the hearsay rule. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1920, 1924; Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. v. United States, 250 U.S. 123, 39 S.Ct. 407, 63 L.Ed. 889.

[19-21] The evidence introduced by the defendants is admissible to prove the proper location and existence of the mining claims under these exceptions to the hearsay rule. The patent records containing abstracts of title to the mining claims, recitals as to the location of these claims in several ancient deeds, verified statements as to the location and possession of the mines, a copy of the articles of incorporation of the early Pennsylvania mining corporation, a certified copy of the minutes of meetings of the Quartz Miners of Brown's valley, descriptions of the claims by metes and bounds, the registrar's final certificate of entry of the patent, and the field notes of survey and report of the United States deputy mineral surveyor on the Pennsylvania mine are clearly records kept in the usual course of business by the General Land Office and thus admissible as official documents. Culver v. Uthe, 133 U.S. 655, 10 S.Ct. 415, 33 L.Ed. 776; Galt v. Galloway, 29 U.S. 332, 4 Pet. 332, 7 L.Ed. 876;

People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 171. So too, the official report of the mineral resources of the public domain of the west being published under the direct authority of congress as an official report to the secretary of the treasury falls into the category of an official document, the contents of which are admissible to show the location and working of the mines in pursuance to the miners' rules and regulations then in existence. In addition, since these locations may be proven by evidence of general reputation previous to the controversy there is no reason why the defendants cannot introduce the History of Yuba County by Chamberlain and Wells (1879) for such a purpose. Code Civ.Proc. § 1936. Thus, the finding by the trial court that a valid location was made is a legitimate finding of fact supported by admissible evidence. Altoona Q. M. Co. v. Integral Q. M. Co., 114 Cal. 100, 45 P. 1047; Gruwell v. Rocca, 141 Cal. 417, 74 P. 1028; Harris v. Kellogg, 117 Cal. 484, 49 P. 708; Colman v. Clements, 23 Cal. 245; Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 P. 488.

The judgment is affirmed.

I dissent.

The majority opinion in this case is so lacking in logical reasoning and unsupported by authority that it can truthfully be said that it is basically unsound.

While my past experience as a practical miner and natural leaning toward the mining industry should cause me to favor the conclusion reached in the majority opinion. I am persuaded by considerations of both reason and authority that such conclusion is contrary to settled principles of law, sound reasoning, and every consideration of equity and natural justice.

The conclusion reached in the majority opinion not only renders insecure and subject to collateral attack every railroad patent in this State, but it places the same cloud upon every agricultural patent which has been issued within the last seventy-five years.

The gist of the majority opinion in this case is that the railroad company by its patent obtained title to the surface of the Ames tract only, and that the predecessors in interest of the mining company obtained title to the subsurface of said tract. In my opinion this view is palpably erroneous for the reason that it is the settled rule, and the authorities are uniform in holding, that a patent to a railroad company issued pursuant to the so-called Railroad Grant Acts conveys thereby a common law fee in non-mineral land. Lawson v. United States Mining Company, 207 U.S. 1, 28 S.Ct. 15, 52 L.Ed. 65; Amador Medean Gold Mining Co. v. South Spring Hill Gold Mining Co., C.C., 36 F. 668.

Section 829 of our Civil Code provides: "The owner of land in fee has the right to the surface and to everything permanently situated beneath or above it".

No attempt is made in the majority opinion to define the limits of the so-called surface and subsurface ownerships. Nothing is said therein to indicate whether or not it is meant that the owner of the surface may penetrate into the subsurface to any extent, or if so, to what extent; in other words, under this announced new doctrine, may the owner of the surface dig a post hole, a cellar, or sink a well? If he may do these things, how much further may he go?

The effect of the holding of the majority opinion is to grant to the owner of the Pennsylvania and Jefferson claims all of the mineral deposits which may be under the surface of the Ames tract whether or not the same constitute the extralateral dip of veins apexing on said claims; in other words, by holding that the railroad company got no title to the mineral deposited in the Ames tract because by its patent it simply got title to the surface of said tract, and that the predecessor in interest of the defendant got title to the subsurface of said tract, the plaintiffs in this action are deprived of the right to extract mineral deposits from said tract even though they have no connection or relation to the veins apexing on the Pennsylvania and Jefferson claims.

The majority opinion grants to the defendant much broader rights than those claimed by the defendant itself, as the right claimed by the defendant in this case is based exclusively upon the extralateral right doctrine and not otherwise.

The rights flowing from the extralateral right doctrine have many restrictions and limitations and certainly do not include the entire subsurface of the land into which veins may dip. First, some of those limitations are expressed in the law establishing and confirming such rights. In 30 U. S.C.A. § 26, it is provided in part: "The locators * * * shall have the exclusive right of possession * * * of all the surface included within the lines of their locations, and of all veins, lodes, and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes, or ledges may so far depart from a perpendicular in their course downward as to extend outside the vertical side lines of such surface locations. But their right of possession to such outside parts of such veins or ledges shall be confined to such portions thereof as lie between vertical planes drawn downward as above described, through the end lines of their locations, so continued in their own direction that such planes will intersect such exterior parts of such veins or ledges. Nothing in this section shall authorize the locator or possessor of a vein or lode which extends in its downward course beyond the vertical lines of his claim to enter upon the surface of a claim owned or possessed by another."

Second, it is elementary that to have extralateral rights in a vein, the apex thereof must be on the location. Costigan Mining Law, p. 409, et seq.; 30 U.S.C.A. § 26.

Third, the identity and continuity of the vein must be established and it must have an apex and a dip. As stated in Costigan on Mining Law, p. 410:

"The identity and substantial continuity of the vein from its apex down is essential to the existence of extralateral rights on the vein, and there are no extralateral rights unless the vein has an apex and a dip." And in this connection the presumption is that no dip exists. Costigan on Mining Law, p. 411; Lindley on Mines, 3d Ed., § 615.

Fourth, extralateral rights do not extend to secondary veins which cross the principal vein at right angles. Costigan on Mining Law, p. 440.

To say that the subsurface rights were acquired by the mining patentees is manifestly unsound. The most that they can claim are the extralateral rights and certainly such rights do not embrace all of the subsurface rights nor all of the right to all of the mineral under the surface of the Ames tract. This is forcefully illustrated by the rule that extralateral rights only extend along the dip of the vein, that is, continue only as long as the vein runs downward in its lateral extension. If it at any time runs parallel or upward then the extralateral rights cease. It is said in 40 Cal. Jur. 819: "An extralateral right applies to the vein only on its downward course or dip, outside the side lines, and does not authorize a locator to follow the vein on its course or strike outside the boundaries of the claim, as where it becomes flattened and extends from thence horizontally in a departure from the general plane of the vein, or for any considerable distance takes an upward trend."

In Tom Reed Gold Mines Co. v. United Eastern Mining Co., 24 Ariz. 269, 209 P. 283, 287, it is said:

"The authorities construing this section hold (1) that the vein to which this extralateral right is claimed must be followed on its 'course downward'; and (2) that the right attaches only to the identical vein which has its apex within the location, and not to another and different vein lying outside the vertical boundaries of the claim. Both these conditions must exist, and are independently essential to the right of extralateral possession and enjoyment. We treat of them in order:

"(1) The vein must be pursued on its course downward.

"In Steward M. Co. v. Ontario M. Co., 23 Idaho 724, 132 P. 787, it was said:

" 'Sometimes it may happen that the "downward course" of a vein will be perpendicular, and the vein will form a vertifical plane, but, as a rule, there is a deflection in the downward course of these mineral veins from the perpendicular, and we call this their dip; but still the course of the dip is always "downward," and, when the plane of the vein reaches the horizontal, then we have a blanket vein or lode, and on such a vein a locator has no extralateral right. * * * The Supreme Court always qualifies its holdings in this respect by the condition of the statute that the course between those vertical planes must be downward.'

"In Southern Nevada G. & S. M. Co. v. Holmes M. Co., 27 Nev. 107, 73 P. 759, 103 Am.St.Rep. 759, it was held:

" 'If the defendant entered upon a ledge having its apex within the exterior boundaries of plaintiff's location, and extracted ore therefrom between the planes drawn vertically downward through the end lines of said location, the right of the plaintiff to recover damages for such acts would not be affected by proof merely that the place from which such ore was extracted could be reached by going continuously through ledge matter from a ledge having its apex within the exterior boundaries of a prior location belonging to the defendant, but it must further appear that such passage from the apex of defendant's ledge is made continuously downward on the dip of that ledge, and if any portion of such passage must necessarily be made either upward, or laterally along the strike, then the plaintiff's right to recover is not affected.'

"See Lindley on Mines, (3d Ed.) §§ 319 and 589, and St. Louis M. Co. v. Montana M. Co. [9 Cir.,], 113 F. 900, 51 C.C.A. 530, 64 L.R.A. 207; Id., 194 U.S. 235, 24 S.Ct. 654, 48 L.Ed. 953.

"While the authorities which have passed upon the question are but few in number, there would seem to be no reason to doubt that the excerpts we have quoted state the true rule, which is that no extralateral right exists to a vein, lode, or ledge beyond the point where in its course outside the claim of apex it becomes flattened and extends from thence horizontally in a departure from the approximate general plane of the vein in its downward course, or for any considerable distance takes an upward trend."

Sixth, the holder of such rights has no general exploratory rights under another's land, and he cannot tunnel through the other's land to reach his vein, or as it is said in St. Louis Min. & Mill Co. v. Montana Min. Co., 9 Cir., 113 F. 900 at page 902, 64 L.R.R. 207 (affirmed: 194 U.S. 235, 24 S.Ct. 654, 48 L.Ed. 953):

"They are given the right of possession of the surface and of everything within their own claim, except the veins or lodes therein, which may have their apices in the surface of another claim, so as to give the owner of the latter extralateral rights, and they are given the right to follow outside of their side lines and into adjoining claims all veins or lodes which have their apices in their own claims, so as to confer extralateral rights. This is their right, and no more. There is no warrant for saying that they have any general right of exploration within land of an adjoining patented claim, whether upon or below the surface. The right of exploration is given for the purpose of making discovery of mineral. Of what avail would be the right of exploration if no benefit could be obtained from discovery made thereby? The ground covered by a subsisting, valid mineral location is open to exploration only by the owner thereof. The statute gives the appellants the right to follow the vein which they were seeking to reach by the tunnel, but it confers upon them no right to approach it from any point other than from the vein or lode itself."

It is a matter of common knowledge among persons familiar with mineral deposits, and I know from my own experience, that two or more distinct mineral deposits may exist in such close proximity that they may be covered by a single mineral location; hence, it is possible that there are mineral veins underlying the surface of the Ames tract which may or may not be subject to the extralateral right of mining claims located on adjacent land. By holding that the railroad company got title to the surface of the Ames tract only, the plaintiffs would be barred from extracting the mineral from said deposits under the rule announced in the majority opinion.

This doctrine of surface and sub-surface ownerships finds no support in the decided cases in this or any other country where the common law prevails. The only authority for it cited in the majority opinion is Lindley on Mines, 3d Ed., § 812. While the language used by this author in connection with this particular subject matter is very vague, he frankly states that it is a "radical doctrine".

I feel then that I am justified in saying that the majority opinion stands alone in the enunciation of this unsound and unsupported doctrine. In this respect it may be said that said opinion is a hybrid, and like the quadruped noted for its stubbornness, it is "without pride of ancestry or hope of posterity".

The specific question which we are called upon to determine in this case is whether the defendant has the right to follow a vein of gold-bearing quartz apexing on its mining claim which dips extralaterally from defendant's mining claim into plaintiffs' land, the eastern boundary of which is parallel with, but 200 feet west of the western boundary of said mining claim, where plaintiffs' title originated by virtue of the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, was confirmed by a patent issued to the Central Pacific Railway Company on June 14, 1880, and by mesne conveyances vested in plaintiffs.

No claim is made by defendant that either the railroad company or any of the government officials had any knowledge whatever that the Ames land contained a mineral deposit or that it was other than nonmineral land at the time the patent was issued. Said land was duly classified as nonmineral by the United States Land Office, and a patent therefor was duly and regularly issued pursuant to said Railroad Grant Act. The railroad company thereafter conveyed a fee title to said land to the predecessor in interest of plaintiffs, and this title was ultimately conveyed to plaintiffs.

The United States Supreme Court has uniformly held that there must be a time at which title to land must be settled, and has determined that said time shall be at the date of issuance of patent.

Since mineral lands are excluded from the grants in aid of railroads, before patent can issue to railroad lands, there must be a determination as to whether or not the land is mineral or nonmineral in character, that is, whether it is more valuable for mining or agricultural purposes.

The duty of making such a decision devolves upon the General Land Office, whose decision is in the nature of a quasi-judicial determination, and conclusive thereafter as against collateral attack.

As the majority opinion does not contain either a complete or correct statement of the facts of this case, I will make a statement of the essential facts before proceeding with a discussion of the legal principles applicable thereto.

This is an appeal from a judgment for defendant in an action in ejectment. Although plaintiffs asked for an injunction and accounting in the same action, it was agreed by stipulation of the parties that trial of the issue of damages should be held in abeyance until the question of title had been determined on appeal. Therefore, that question only is now before this court.

The action arose out of a dispute over the title to a vein of gold-bearing quartz which extends extralaterally under the land of the plaintiffs from an apex on mining claims in the possession of the defendant.

Defendant admittedly has been extracting the ore from said vein, and maintains its right to do so by virtue of its ownership of the apex of said vein within said mining claims.

The land belonging to the plaintiffs hereinafter called "the Ames tract", is described by legal subdivision as the S.W. ¼ of sec. 15, T. 16 N., R. 5 E., M. D. B. & M., situated in Yuba county, California. The inception of the Ames title is an act of Congress, effective July 25, 1866, 14 U.S. Stat.A.L. 239, granting to the California and Oregon Railway Company certain lands "to aid in the construction of a railroad". Mineral lands were excepted from this grant. Upon completion of the railroad, a map showing its location was filed in the United States Land Office, July 27, 1870. Thereafter, the Central Pacific Railroad Company succeeded to the rights of the California and Oregon Railway Company and received a United States patent for lands, including the Ames land, on June 14, 1880. Plaintiffs acquired title to the Ames tract through a deed from J. E. Ebert, who had succeeded to the railroad title.

The defendant's land is located in the S.E. ¼ of sec. 16, T. 16 N., R. 5 E., M. D. B. & M., which adjoins said sec. 15 on the west. It consists of two quartz mining claims, known as the Pennsylvania and Jefferson claims, which defendant holds under lease and option from the owners. These claims and the Ames tract are not adjacent, for a strip of school land two hundred feet in width lies between them. The claims, both four hundred feet in width, are located contiguously on a north and south vein of gold-bearing quartz, and have side lines substantially parallel with the section line between said sections 15 and 16. The Jefferson claim extends seven hundred fifty feet north from the south line of section 16. The Pennsylvania claim joins the Jefferson claim at its north boundary and continues northward for a distance of one thousand five hundred forty feet. The vein which extends throughout the length of these two claims dips extralaterally under the narrow strip of school land and continues into the Ames property.

The act of Congress under which defendant asserts its title to the Pennsylvania and Jefferson claims authorized the disposal of mineral lands from the public domain and became effective July 26, 1866, 14 U.S.Stat.A.L. 251. Complying with the provisions of this statute, one of defendant's predecessors secured a patent to the Pennsylvania mining claim. The first application for said patent was made in January, 1874, but because of adverse proceedings and a technical defect, this application was denied with leave to renew. The renewal was made January 22, 1880. Thereafter, on May 31, 1880, the local land office receiver at Marysville issued his receipt for money paid by applicant, and the register of said office issued his final certificate of entry. Patent to the Pennsylvania claim was issued by the United States government on August 18, 1880, to the Pennsylvania Mining Company, which company was incorporated in 1863.

The Jefferson claim is unpatented but held by location. Although the earliest recorded location of this claim apparently was made in 1891, defendant claims its predecessors have worked both the Pennsylvania and Jefferson claims since the early days of California.

The strip of school land which separates the mining claims from the Ames tract was granted to the state of California under the act of Congress dated March 3, 1853, 10 U.S.Stat.A.L. 244, which granted the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of each township for school purposes. The grant of these sections also was subject to the reservation of mineral lands. The lands were then unsurveyed, the survey of them being completed August 6, 1867. On May 22, 1882, the eastern one-half of the southeast quarter of section 16, in which were located the two mining claims, was conveyed by patents of the state of California to certain grantees, I. S. Belcher and W. C. Belcher, who later conveyed their titles under the state patents to the Pennsylvania Mining Company, a predecessor of the defendant.

In its statement of facts the majority opinion says: "On June 14, 1880, the Central Pacific Railroad, pursuant to its legislative grant, secured a patent to the Ames tract which transformed it from a 'float' to an established title by the definite location of the railroad line." Again later the statement is made that "In the present case there was no final and definite location of the Ames tract by the railroad until the securing of the patent in 1880;" and further that "The patent which definitely located and established the railroad's claim stated that the Ames tract was agricultural land." The first of these statements is to say the least ambiguous and the other two indicate a complete lack of understanding as to the time of the vesting of title to railroad land.

The securing of a patent has nothing to do with the actual vesting of title to railroad land. It is merely a confirmation of a title which has already vested. It is too well settled to admit of argument that grants in aid of railroads are grants made in presenti, and that where the line of such roads is not located the grant remains a float, but that when the route of the road is definitely fixed, the sections granted become susceptible of identification, and the title attaches to them and took effect as of the date of the grant cutting off all intervening claims. Wisconsin Central Railroad Co. v. Price County, 133 U.S. 496, 509, 10 S.Ct. 341, 33 L.Ed. 687; Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, 142 U.S. 241, 12 S.Ct. 158, 35 L.Ed. 999; Jatunn v. Smith, 95 Cal. 154, 30 P. 200. Confirmation of this title by patent also relates back to the date of the original grant, thereby cutting off all intervening rights.

The majority opinion states as a contention of the plaintiffs "that the full title to the Ames tract was conveyed away prior to the passage of the Mining Act of July 26, 1866, so that the latter could in no way confer upon the adjoining mines extralateral rights in the Ames tract." Then continues with "This argument might seem persuasive except for one vital factor. The Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, upon which the plaintiffs rely for their original title, specifically excepted from its operation all mineral lands. The terms of the act make it clear that congress did not intend to vest in the railroad title to any mineral lands of the United States. Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., 154 U.S. 288, 14 S.Ct. 1030, 38 L.Ed. 992; United States v. Sweet, 245 U.S. 563, 38 S.Ct. 193, 62 L.Ed. 473; Broder v. Natoma Water Co., 101 U.S. 274, 25 L.Ed. 790; Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Sanders, 166 U.S. 620, 17 S.Ct. 671, 41 L.Ed. 1139; McClintock v. Bryden et al., 5 Cal. 97." This much of the opinion's statement is true—that the Railroad Grant Act excepted mineral lands, and that congress did not intend thereby to vest in the railroad title to any mineral lands in the United States. But the next statement in the opinion is completely false and unsupported by the cases cited in its favor,—namely, that "The subsurface of the Ames tract being clearly mineral could not pass under the terms of the act but re- mained in the government, and the Pennsylvania and Jefferson mines received full extralateral rights to mine therein by virtue of the Mining Act of July 26, 1866."

In the Barden case, supra, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company claimed title to lands admittedly mineral in character not by virtue of a patent thereto, but on the ground that the lands were not known to be mineral until after the filing of its map showing the location of its road, and that therefore they passed to the railroad company at said time. The court held, and correctly so, that the time for final determination of the character of the land was not the date of the filing of the map of definite location, but the date of the issuance of patent thereto. In the present case, however, the railroad company secured a patent to the land in question. The Barden case, supra [154 U.S. 288, 14 S.Ct. 1038, 38 L.Ed. 992], stating that the plaintiffs therein had no cause for apprehending that its decision would lead to uncertainty of titles, proceeded to discuss the results which would obtain if a patent were issued:

"We do not think that any apprehension of disturbance in titles from the views we assert need arise. The law places under the supervision of the interior department, and its subordinate officers, acting under its direction, the control of all matters affecting the disposition of the public lands of the United States, and the adjustment of private claims to them under the legislation of congress. It can hear contestants, and decide upon the respective merits of their claims. It can investigate and settle the contentions of all persons with respect to such claims. It can hear evidence upon, and determine, the character of lands to which different parties assert a right; and when the controversy before it is fully considered, and ended, it can issue to the rightful claimant the patent provided by law, specifying that the lands are of the character for which a patent is authorized. It can thus determine whether the lands called for are swamp lands, timber lands, agricultural lands, or mineral lands, and so designate them in the patent which it issues. The act of congress making the grant to the plaintiff provides for the issue of a patent to the grantee for the land claimed; and as the grant excludes mineral lands, in the direction for such patent to issue, the land office can examine into the character of the lands, and designate it in its conveyance.

"It is the established doctrine, expressed in numerous decisions of this court, that wherever congress has provided for the disposition of any portion of the public lands, of a particular character, and authorizes the officers of the land department to issue a patent for such land upon ascertainment of certain facts, that department has jurisdiction to inquire into and determine as to the existence of such facts, and in the absence of fraud, imposition, or mistake its determination is conclusive against collateral attack." (Italics added.)

The cases cited in the majority opinion as authority for the statement that "the terms of the act make it clear that congress did not intend to vest in the railroad title to any mineral lands of the United States", support this statement with which I am in full accord. However, none of them is authority for the statement which follows to the effect that the subsurface of the Ames tract being clearly mineral could not pass under the terms of the act and remained in the government.

The case of United States v. Sweet, supra, involved a question as to whether 40 acres of land known to be valuable for coal before Utah became a State, passed to the State by a school land grant which neither expressly included nor excluded mineral lands. The court held that the grant was to be read in the light of the mining laws, the school land indemnity law providing for lieu selections where sections 16 and 36 were mineral, and the settled policy of congress respecting mineral lands, and concluded that the sections known to be mineral when the grant took effect did not pass under the grant.

In the case of Broder v. Natoma Water Co., supra, defendant's right to maintain a canal over the lands of the plaintiff was upheld although it was constructed over lands subsequently granted to a railroad company, by reason of the fact that congress had previous to the Railroad Grant act enacted a statute conferring on owners of such canals a pre-existing right. It does not appear, however, from a reading of the case that the railroad company's lands were ever patented to it.

The case of Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Sanders, supra, does not involve a case in which the railroad company ever obtained a patent to the lands in controversy. The question decided therein was merely that where, at the time of the definite location of plaintiff's road, applications of record were pending to purchase said lands, said applications were "claims" within the meaning of the granting act, which excluded therefrom lands "not free from pre-emption 'or other claims or rights,' at the time the line of the road was definitely fixed." [166 U. S. 620, 17 S.Ct. 673, 41 L.Ed. 1139].

McClintock v. Bryden et al., supra, is an early decision of this court holding that where a person settles on any of the mining lands of this State, he settles on there subject to the rights of miners, who may proceed in good faith to extract valuable minerals therefrom in the most practicable manner in which they can be extracted, with least injury to the occupying claimant, according to the express statutes of this State, even though the agricultural settler settled on the lands prior to said statute.

As can be readily seen none of these cases has any direct bearing on the case at bar. They are authority for the general propositions that mineral lands were excluded from a granting act and do not pass thereby to the grantee, but they in no wise militate against the decision in the Barden case, supra, that, when a determination has been made by the General Land Office that lands to which application for patent has been made are nonmineral in character, and has issued a patent pursuant to said decision, that said determination is conclusive, and that regardless of the fact that the lands may thereafter appear to contain mineral in paying quantities, a common law fee conveying title to the center of the earth has passed to the patentees. (Italics added.)

The majority opinion cites and relies upon the cases of Van Ness v. Rooney, 160 Cal. 131, 116 P. 392; Brown v. Luddy, 121 Cal.App. 494, 9 P.2d 326; and Chicago Quartz Mining Co. v. Oliver, 75 Cal. 194, 16 P. 780, as authority for its statement that "It is well established that the government cannot convey away land which it no longer owns and that a patent cannot cut off previously existing vested rights in the patented property." In this connection said opinion further states: "The patent secured by the railroad in 1880 was issued under the authority of the Railroad Grant Act of July 25, 1866, and could in no way apply to mineral land title to which had been previously vested in others. Any authority it might acquire in the passage of time as to the nature of the land, despite the limitations of the act, could operate only against subsequently located claims. Van Ness v. Rooney, supra; Brown v. Luddy, supra."

It is worthy of note that the last cited cases have not been cited or referred to in the voluminous briefs, petitions, or printed or oral argument presented to this court by the eminent counsel on either side of this case. These counsel, or at least some of them, are specialists in the field of mining law, and I feel justified in stating that if the principles of law announced in these cases had any relevancy or application to the legal problems involved in this case, or could possibly form the basis for a legal theory upon which this case could be decided, those cases and the principles of law enunciated therein would certainly have been called to the attention of this court by such counsel.

Aside from my own study and analysis of said cases, which has convinced me that they have no application to the legal problems involved in the case at bar, the failure of eminent counsel for defendant to cite or rely upon them as a basis for the determination of this case convinces me beyond the possibility of a doubt that said cases cannot be relied upon in support of the conclusion reached in the majority opinion in this case.

I have long been familiar with the case of Van Ness v. Rooney, supra. It arose in the county where I was born and raised and was the subject of much discussion there for many years; in fact, I called the same to the attention of the author of the majority opinion. The decision of this case, both by the trial court and this court, was predicated upon the proposition that a patent for land included in a railroad grant which expressly excludes and excepts from the lands described in the granting clause "all mineral lands, should any such be found in the tracts aforesaid" [160 Cal. 131, 116 P. 393], does not pass title to a mineral claim included therein which had been duly and legally located prior to the issuance of the patent. Obviously, such is not the problem involved in the case at bar. Furthermore, the case of Van Ness v. Rooney, supra, was decided by this court prior to the decision by the Supreme Court of the United States of the case of Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 234 U.S. 669, 34 S.Ct. 907, 58 L.Ed. 1527, which held that an exception inserted in patents issued under the Railroad Grant Act to the effect that if any of the lands described should be found to be mineral the same should be excluded from the operation of the patent is unauthorized and void, because the granting act, contemplated that the patents should effectually and unconditionally pass the title to the land granted. In my opinion the decision of this court in the case of Van Ness v. Rooney, supra, is in direct conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., supra, and the Van Ness case, supra, can no longer be considered an authority for the legal proposition decided therein.

The case of Brown v. Luddy, supra, follows the decision of this court in the Van Ness case, supra, and the conclusion reached by the District Court of Appeal in the Brown case, supra, is predicated almost entirely if not wholly upon the theory advanced by this court in the Van Ness case, supra. The factual situation in the case of Brown v. Luddy, supra, was however, quite different than that in the Van Ness case, supra, and there is no similarity between the facts in either of those cases and the case at bar. In the Brown case, supra, the plaintiffs' mining claim was located and had been in existence and was being actually operated at the time of the passage of the statute authorizing the issuance of the stock-raising homestead patent which was the basis of defendants' title in said case; said statute and the patent issued to Luddy expressly reserved to the United States "all coal and other minerals in the land". [121 Cal.App. 494, 9 P.2d 331.] This is quite different than the provision in the patent issued to the railroad company in the Van Ness case, supra, which excepted "all mineral lands". In my opinion the decision of the District Court of Appeal in the case of Brown v. Luddy, supra, announces principles of law much broader than was necessary to the decision of the legal propositions involved in said case, but in any event, it cannot be said to be authority supporting the position of the defendant here because the factual situation there was entirely different than that which obtains in the case at bar.

The majority opinion also cites the case of Chicago Quartz M. Co. v. Oliver, 75 Cal. 194, 16 P. 780, as announcing the same principle of law as that enunciated in the cases of Van Ness v. Rooney and Brown v. Luddy, supra. The first mention of the Chicago Quartz Mining Co. case by any of the counsel in the case at bar was on October 9, 1940, when this case was argued for the second time before this court. It was then called to the court's attention by counsel for defendant in an outline of oral reargument. The Chicago Quartz Mining Co. case holds that a patent issued by the United States Government to the Central Pacific Railroad Company for land included within the boundaries of the grant made to it by the Act of Congress of July 1, 1862, is not conclusive evidence that the land covered by the patent is nonmineral in character, and a person claiming the land under a subsequent mining patent may show that the land is mineral, and therefore excepted from the operation of the grant to the railroad company.

The decision in this case is in direct conflict with the now settled rule that the issuance of a patent to a railroad company under the Railroad Grant Act conclusively determines the nonmineral character of the land and that the provision in such a patent excepting mineral land therefrom is void and the title conveyed to the railroad company by such patent is a title in fee to nonmineral land. Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., supra.

It appears from the opinion of this court in the Chicago Quartz Mining Co. case that the mining company there was claiming under a patent to a mining claim issued approximately thirteen years subsequent to the patent issued to the railroad company, and there is no statement in the opinion of this court from which the conclusion can be drawn that the claim of the mining company to its mineral location antedated the patent to the railroad company. This case appears to have been decided upon the theory that the railroad company did not get title to the land embraced within its patent because the land involved in the action was valuable gold bearing mineral land, and known to be such at the time of the issuance of the railroad patent. As stated above, the decision of this court in the Chicago Quartz Mining Co. case is in direct conflict with decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and subsequent decisions of this court. See Paterson v. Ogden, 141 Cal. 43, 74 P. 443, 99 Am.St.Rep. 31; Jameson v. James, 155 Cal. 275, 100 P. 700.

The majority opinion makes the statement that "When the Ames tract was finally and definitely located in 1880 its subsurface not only was known to be mineral but was subject to the vested extralateral rights of the adjoining mines." I presume this statement must be interpreted to mean that, when the Ames tract was patented, its subsurface was not only known to be mineral but was subject to the vested extralateral rights of the adjoining miners.

The majority opinion does not, however, state by whom the subsurface of the Ames tract was "known to be mineral". Defendant claims to have known that the Pennsylvania mineral vein underlay the Ames tract at the time of its patenting. It does not appear, however, that such fact was known to anyone else. There is no doubt that the act granting land to the railroad companies excluded mineral lands. However, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that a secure title to such lands must vest at some time and has set that time as the date of the issuance of patent. It is necessary therefore, at that time, said court has held, that land should be determined actually to be mineral or nonmineral. Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., supra; Shaw v. Kellogg, 170 U. S. 312, 337, 18 S.Ct. 632, 42 L.Ed. 1050. Since the duty of determining the character of land devolves upon the General Land Office, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the persons to whom the land must be known to be mineral must be the officers of the Land Department in charge of the disposition of public lands. The court recognized that said officers might often from the information available to them determine lands to be nonmineral which in fact contained mineral in quantities sufficient to render the land more valuable for mineral than agricultural purposes; nevertheless, it has regarded the settling of the title to land at a definite date to be of such importance that if the land were not shown or known to be such by said officers at the time of patent, their determination at said time as to the nonmineral character of the land has, in the absence of fraud, been held thereafter to be conclusive. The Supreme Court of the United States expressed this view in Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., supra, 154 U.S. at page 329, 14 S.Ct. at page 1039, 38 L.Ed. 992, as follows:

"There are undoubtedly many cases arising before the land department, in the disposition of the public lands, where it will be a matter of much difficulty, on the part of its officers, to ascertain with accuracy whether the lands to be disposed of are to be deemed mineral lands or agricultural lands; and in such cases the rule adopted, that they will be considered mineral or agricultural as they are more valuable in the one class or the other, may be sound. The officers will be governed by the knowledge of the lands obtained at the time, as to their real character. The determination of the fact by those officers that they are one or the other will be considered as conclusive." That a patent is conclusive of the character of the land even where issued without hearing and determination on that point was settled in the Barden case, supra, where Mr. Justice Field said:

"It is true that the patent has been issued in many instances without the investigation and consideration which the public interest requires; but if that has been done without fraud, though unadvisedly, by officers of the government charged with the duty of supervising and attending to the preparation and issue of such patents, the consequence must be borne by the government, until, by further legislation, a stricter regard to their duties in that respect can be enforced upon them. The fact remains that under the law the duty of determining the character of the lands granted by congress, and stating it in instruments transferring the title of the government to the grantees, reposes in officers of the land department."

Likewise, in Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., supra, 234 U.S. at page 709, 34 S.Ct. at page 923, 58 L.Ed. 1527, the court said:

"Taking up the several questions in the light of what we have here said, we answer them as follows:

"1. Did the said grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company include mineral lands which were known to be such at or prior to the date of the patent of July 10, 1894?

"Answer.—Mineral lands, known to be such at or prior to the issue of patent, were not included in the grant, but excluded from it, and the duty of determining the character of the lands was cast primarily on the Land Department, which was charged with the issue of patents.

"2. Does a patent to a railroad company under a grant which excludes mineral lands, as in the present case, but which is issued without any investigation upon the part of the officers of the Land Office or of the Department of the Interior as to the quality of the land, whether agricultural or mineral, and without hearing upon or determination of the quality of the lands, operate to convey lands which are thereafter ascertained to be mineral?

"Answer.—A patent issued in such circumstances is irregularly issued, undoubtedly so; but, as it is the act of a legally constituted tribunal, and is done within its jurisdiction, it is not void, and therefore passes the title. (Noble v. Union River Logging Railroad, 147 U.S. 165, 174, 175, 13 S.Ct. 271, 37 L.Ed. 123, 126, 127), subject to the right of the government to attack the patent by a direct suit for its annulment if the land was known to be mineral when the patent issued. (McLaughlin v. United States, 107 U.S. 526, 2 S.Ct. 802, 27 L.Ed. 806; Western Pacific Railroad Co. v. United States, 108 U.S. 510, 2 S.Ct. 802, 27 L.Ed. 621). [See, also, West v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U.S. 200, 211, 49 S.Ct. 138, 73 L.Ed. 265].

"3. Is the reservation and exception contained in the grant in the patent to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company void and of no effect?

"Answer.—The mineral land exception in the patent is void.

"4. If the reservation of mineral lands as expressed in the patent is void, then is the patent, upon a collateral attack, a conclusive and official declaration that the land is agricultural, and that all the requirements preliminary to the issuance of the patent have been complied with?

"Answer.—It is conclusive upon a collateral attack."

Furthermore, lands must not only be "known" mineral lands, but must be known to be more valuable for mining than for agricultural purposes (Hunt v. Steese, 75 Cal. 620, 17 P. 920), and abandoned dry shafts on the land or the discovery of mineral in nonpaying quantities will not bring it within the "known" mineral classification. Brown v. Luddy, supra.
